

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

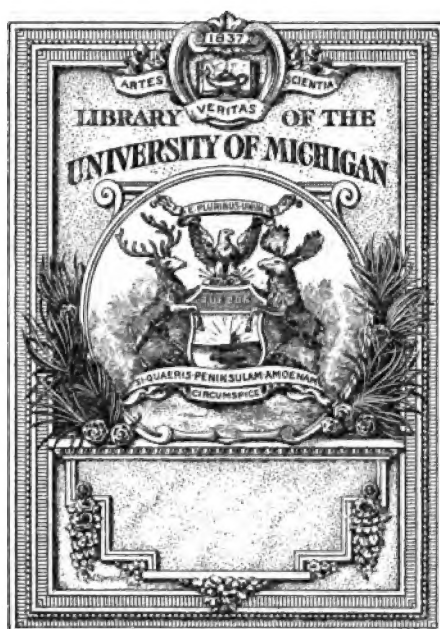

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

IN THE

SIXTH SESSION OF THE TWENTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, APPOINTED TO MEET 5 AUGUST, 1886, IN THE FIFTIETH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

FIRST VOLUME OF SESSION 1890-91.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 25th November, 1890.

THE PARLIAMENT, which had been Prorogued successively from the 18th day of August, 1890, to the 25th day of October, 1890, thence to the 25th day of November, 1890, met this day for the despatch of Public Business.

The Session was opened by Commission.

The HOUSE OF PEERS being met,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House,

"That Her Majesty, not thinking it fit to be personally present here this day, has been pleased to cause a Commission to be issued under the Great Seal, in order to the opening and holding of this Parliament."

Then, Five of the LORDS COMMISSIONERS—namely, the LORD CHANCELLOR, the EARL OF LATHOM, the

VOL. CCCXLIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

EARL OF COVENTRY, LORD BROWNLOW, and LORD KNUTSFORD—being in their robes, and seated on a form placed between the Throne and the Wool-sack, commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to let the COMMONS know, "The Lords Commissioners desire their immediate attendance in this House to hear the Commission read,"

Who being at the Bar, with their Speaker:—The Commission was read by the Clerk:—Then

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR delivered HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH to both Houses of Parliament, as follows:—

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"No change has taken place in the Foreign relations of this country during the short period which has elapsed since the close of the preceding Session. The securities for European peace appear to me to be undiminished.

"I have commenced negotiations with the King of Italy for the determination of the frontier which separates the territory under British influence in North-East Africa from that which belongs to the protected Empire of Abyssinia.

"A Treaty was signed on the 20th August, having for its object the ascertainment of the boundaries between British territory in Central Africa and the Portuguese Provinces of Angola, Gaza, and Mozambique. It has, however, not received the ratification of the King of Portugal; and, pending further negotiations, a temporary arrangement in regard to the most urgent questions has been concluded between the two countries, which will be laid before you.

"Negotiations have also been commenced in respect of the Newfoundland Fishery questions, and I trust that a settlement may be arrived at which will be satisfactory to all parties.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"The Estimates for the charge of the ensuing year will be submitted to you at the ordinary time. Strict economy will be observed in the preparation of them.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The general condition of Ireland has sensibly improved under the operation of the salutary legislation which you have applied to it. But I have learned, with deep regret, that a serious deficiency in the potato crop in certain parts of Ireland threatens the recurrence of one of those periods of severe distress to which the population of the Western Counties are peculiarly exposed by the industrial and economic conditions under which they live. I trust that the measures of my Government may mitigate the immediate evil, and diminish the probability of its return. It appears to me also desirable, for the increase of contentment and the diminution of political disturbance throughout Ireland, to take measures for augmenting the number of owners engaged in the actual cultivation of the land. A measure having this object in view will be laid before you.

"Proposals will again be made to you for remedying the difficulties which have arisen from the indirect incidence of Tithe Rent Charge upon the land in England and Wales.

"A measure will be submitted to you for facilitating the transaction in Scotland and Ireland of the more important stages of Private Legislation affecting those countries.

"Your attention will be invited to the expediency of alleviating the burden which the Law of Compulsory Education has in recent years imposed upon the poorer portion of my people.

"There are several other matters upon which legislation is desirable; but recent experience has rendered it doubtful whether the time at your disposal will, in your judgment, be sufficient for the consideration of many subjects of an important character beyond those to which I have referred. In case time for further legislation should be found, I have directed the preparation of Bills for the enactment of a reformed system of County Government in Ireland analogous to that which has been recently put in operation for Great Britain; for the establishment of District Councils; for the extension of facilities for purchasing small parcels of land in Great Britain; for amending the Law with respect to the compensation payable by employers in case of injury to persons in their employment; for consolidating and amending the Laws relating to Public Health; for the appointment of a Public Trustee; and for increasing the security of Friendly Societies and Savings Banks.

"In the discharge of the arduous duties which are assigned to you, I commend you heartily to the guidance of Almighty God."

Then the Commons withdrew.

House adjourned during pleasure.

House resumed.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

The QUEEN'S SPEECH reported by the LORD CHANCELLOR.

LORD WINDSOR (who wore the uniform of a Lord Lieutenant), in moving an Address of thanks in reply to Her Majesty's Gracious Speech, said: My Lords, I have been a very constant attendant at Debates in this House for a period of about 12 years, but I feel that the circumstances under which I come before you to-day are very different to those in which I have hitherto found myself placed. I am conscious that I stand in need of as full a measure of your Lordships' indulgence as it has ever been necessary for any noble Lord to ask for on previous occasions and under similar circumstances. In moving that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty in reply to Her Gracious Speech from the Throne, I should approach my task with more misgiving than I really do if it was not for two chief reasons. The first is my own personal conviction that the policy which is shadowed forth in the Queen's Speech, and which it is my privilege this evening to support, is a policy which is calculated to promote the real interest of this country both abroad and at home. The foreign policy of the country, under the direction of the noble Marquess, is one which commands both the respect and confidence of those nations with whom negotiations, involving some difficulty, have been carried on. As to the domestic policy of the Government, I am glad to see that it promises us a continuance of the firm and just administration of the law, tempered with a serious endeavour to effect such wise reforms as the nature of the circumstances of the present day under which we live demands. The second reason, my Lords, is my conviction that this opinion, which is held by noble Lords on this side of the House, is shared to a no small extent by noble Lords on the Benches opposite; to which I might add even a third reason in the nature of a suspicion that the criticisms which will probably be delivered by the noble Earl and his colleagues on the Front Opposition Bench will, in all likelihood, be directed to the fulfilling of their obligations as an Opposition rather than to any very serious attempt to persuade your Lordships that the policy of Her Majesty's Government is wrong. However that may be, I will proceed in introducing this Motion to the House to make a very few and brief remarks on one or two important matters which are mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. The first paragraph of Her Majesty's Gracious Speech deals in very short terms with the foreign relations of this country and the securities for European peace. It is a paragraph that we have been accustomed to see somewhat in this form on previous occasions, and it is one, perhaps, that we are apt to pass over without giving it any serious attention, but, with your permission, my Lords, I would draw attention for one moment to the meaning of this paragraph, and to the way in which it affects the country at this moment. My Lords, we have not had exactly a peaceful political autumn. In addition to the occasions upon which prominent Members of the Ministry have addressed meetings in different parts of the country, we have had a Mid Lothian campaign, and we have had a gathering of the Liberal Federation, and various other incidental opportunities for using strong language and of dealing hard blows; but in all the speeches that have been delivered, I certainly have not myself noticed any serious criticisms on the administration of the Foreign Office, with the one single exception of a criticism on the arrangements that have been made with regard to Malta. That was a criticism made by Mr. Gladstone in a speech which he made at Edinburgh at the end of last month. But may I now draw your Lordships' attention to some other things that Mr. Gladstone said with regard to our foreign policy? He referred to the arrangements in Africa, and he said that—"He thought those arrangements did the noble Marquess credit"; and he said that "He believed, on the whole, that the noble Marquess did the best the circumstances of the case permitted."

And, further, he said with regard to the Newfoundland Fisheries question and to the occupation of Egypt—

"We have carefully abstained from saying a single word which would create other difficulties for him either in the one or the other, and you may depend that so we shall continue to act."

I quote that desiring to give full credit to Mr. Gladstone for the attitude which he has adopted. But we have likewise had, not long ago, a speech from the noble Earl who leads the Party opposite in your Lordships' House, and we might, I think, have expected some remarks from him on foreign affairs; but certainly in the report that I saw I did not notice that he made any allusion whatever to that subject. It seems to me, my Lords, we are at least entitled to infer that criticisms if there are any to be made have not at any rate been considered of sufficient weight and importance to lay before meetings of the electors of the country; and we are likewise I think entitled to infer that if such be the opinion of the leaders of the Opposition the noble Marquess really has the confidence and support, in connection with foreign matters (taking foreign policy alone), of a large majority of the people. There is one thing that I would touch upon with your Lordships' permission which is intimately connected with the foreign policy of this country, but at the same time not strictly within the province of the Department of the Foreign Office. I allude to the national defences. I am very glad that Her Majesty's Government have proved to Parliament and to the country that this question is one which has received and is receiving their serious consideration; and I hope sincerely that they will not, for the sake of the passing popularity to be gained by an economical Budget, relax in any degree whatever their efforts to put the defences of this country on a thoroughly satisfactory and sure foundation. I am no alarmist, and I would utterly repudiate any feeling of what has been vulgarly called "Jingoism"—any desire to brag or to be offensive to our foreign neighbours in any way, but I really regard this as a policy of wise national insurance, which ought in no way to be neglected by any Government. My Lords, it is difficult to approach the two prominent main questions in the Speech from the Throne with becoming reticence, and in the general way in which they ought to be treated in the Debate on the Address. An Irish Land Purchase Bill and a Tithes Bill have already been before Parliament, and it is difficult not to look at these promised measures in the concrete form in which they were before the House of Commons last Session. The supporters of Her Majesty's Government had hoped that those questions would have been dealt with, and that those Bills would have been passed, last Session. For reasons that are perfectly familiar to your Lordships, and to which I need not refer, those hopes have not been fulfilled, but I trust that one advantage, at least, may prove to have been gained by this delay, and that is that the framers of those Bills and the Cabinet may have been able to make such alterations, additions, or amendments as further discussion and consideration may have suggested, and that in consequence the Parliamentary career this Session of those measures may be more rapid and more successful than it was last. I will not refer to the paragraph with reference to Ireland. It will be dealt with by the noble Lord who seconds this Motion much more ably and with much more knowledge of the subject than I can bring to bear upon it. I would only make this one general remark accounting for my hearty support of the policy of the Government, and that is that I feel it is far easier to make laws than to enforce them, and that it matters not how wise the laws may be that you have made, they are perfectly valueless unless they are obeyed. I would even go as far as to say that it would be better for a Government to know how to enforce the laws they have made, be they good, bad, or indifferent, than to fritter away their energies and stultify their actions by hesitation and scruples as to the perfection of the laws themselves. I hope, my Lords, that I may not be misunderstood. I would say this: Think well before you act, but, when you have decided, carry out your decision with all the energy, all the confidence that is in you. It is because I believe that Her Majesty's Government have already adopted this policy, it is because I believe that they intend to pursue it, and thus prevent the law in Ireland being a dead letter, that I so heartily support them. Though for a time they might lose the popular support, and I believe it would be only for a very short time if they lost it at all, they would by their action permanently strengthen the hands of authority, and for that reason alone they would have rightly earned the thanks of their successors, whoever they may be. My Lords, I would for one moment refer to the paragraph relating to the tithe question. Proposals will again be made to you for remedying the difficulties which have arisen from the incidence of tithe rent-charges upon the land in England and Wales. I cannot but feel that an artificial grievance has been forced up upon this question. That tithe is a part of rent, is, I suppose, an undeniable proposition; and certainly a proof of this lies in the fact that no serious proposal has ever been made to abolish tithe altogether, for the result would obviously be merely to put more rent into the pockets of the landowners; and that is very far from being the intention or desire of anti-tithe agitators. As to the tenants, it matters little to them whether they pay a certain amount into one or into two pockets. I cannot believe that any tenant would refuse to pay as rent into one pocket, what he now consents to give when he takes a farm and pays into two pockets. Therefore it is that I say it is a matter which really does not concern the tenants. I welcome any measure which will throw the responsibility of paying the tithe upon the shoulders of those who really have to bear it, and have always borne it. I cannot but feel that there is a political and sectarian attack made upon the Established Church in this particular. That it should come from those who think all religion superstition, and the teaching of dogmatic creeds as the dissemination of error, is not surprising; but it does surprise me that, side by side with those persons, and hand-in-glove with them, there should be so many religious and truly Christian men. I am far from saying that there are not many who live truly good and unselfish lives, whose religion is perhaps independent of dogma, and this is surely an intellectual position which it would be idle to expect even if it were desirable from those who have not specially trained their minds towards it. For the bulk of the people it unquestionably appears to me that if you reduce the power of Christian organisations in the country and limit their influence you are really depriving so many people of the real incentive to a higher moral life; and, therefore, I cannot help thinking that a grave responsibility rests upon the shoulders of those who truly estimate the value of Christian teaching, if they should endeavour to cripple the resources of the Established Church, and to devote to secular purposes what appears to be unquestionably the rightful property of the Church. My Lords, there is only one other Bill that I would say a few words about, and that is the measure for facilitating the transaction in Scotland and Ireland of the more important stages of private legislation affecting those countries. Your Lordships are all perfectly familiar with the working of Private Bill legislation. You are aware what pressure is put upon Private Bill Committees to save the expense of bringing witnesses from long distances and keeping them for a long time in London. I feel sure, therefore, that your Lordships will agree that Her Majesty's Government are taking a right course in promising to give their attention to this matter, and to save, if possible, some of the expense of Private Bill legislation as regards Scotland and Ireland. My Lords, I cannot sit down without thanking you for the kind indulgence you have accorded. I cannot say that it was unexpected, but I am none the less grateful, especially as I am painfully aware that it has been so little deserved. I beg to move the Motion which stands in my name.

Lord Windsor

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty as followeth :—

Most Gracious Sovereign,—

We, your most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament."

—(The Lord Windsor.)

LORD ARDILAUN (who wore the uniform of a Deputy Lieutenant), in seconding the Address, said: My Lords, I know that I might largely rely upon that wide and generous indulgence which you always extend to those who stand in the position which I have the honour to occupy to-day; but I will only occupy a very brief period of your time, and I trust that no apology will be necessary if I proceed at once with the few observations which I desire to make in seconding the Address upon those portions of Her Majesty's Gracious Speech which deal with Ireland, because that country will no doubt absorb a great portion of the time of this Session on which we are just entering, and also because in that country I have passed the greater part of my life, and trust if I am permitted to spend there the remainder of my days. I do not propose to weary you with lengthy statistics in order to prove that the task of the Government in establishing order in Ireland progresses steadily and that crime becomes daily less and less. I will, therefore, only read the following figures from the latest Returns: It appears that whereas the total number of agrarian crimes, exclusive of threatening letters, reported in the year 1886 was 632, that number has since annually diminished. Last year, 1889, it stood at 341; and the number reported for the last ten months—that is, from January 1st to October 31st, 1890, was only 244. So that we may fairly expect that at the close of the present year the calendar of agrarian crime will be less heavy by more than 50 per cent. than that of the year 1886 when the present Government took Office. But, my Lords, it is not necessary to convince ourselves by statistics. No one who reads the newspapers, and especially the Irish Nationalist newspapers, can fail to have been struck by the fact that while the agitators, high and low, are moving heaven and earth to persuade the people of this country, and especially the voters, that the whole Irish people are in a state of furious indignation under the bitter oppression of unjust laws—laws which they cannot and which they are told on high authority they ought not to obey—most of the Irish people show little signs of that furious indignation, except in a few exceptional localities, carefully chosen for the purpose, and even in those localities it is necessary for them to concentrate all their great powers of creating disturbance, and all their great dramatic talent for making use of that disturbance when created, aye, and large sums of money, too, to enable them to keep up any show of resistance to those intolerable laws. Certainly, so far as concerns that part of the country with which I am connected by property and by frequent residence, I am glad to be able to give a most satisfactory account. That district not many years ago had one of the saddest and darkest records of any in Ireland. Within it occurred the now historic persecution of Captain Boycott; within it occurred such awful murders as those of the unfortunate Lord Mountmorres, the Huddys, and others whose names I do not now desire to recall. And indeed, my Lords, if I refer to those terrible times, I do so solely for the purpose of contrasting them with the present happier state of things, and the promise of—as I trust—a brighter future. I am glad to recollect that those gloomy experiences were but an episode, a passing interruption of a better and happier state of things when the people followed their avocations in peace. I rejoice now to be able to say that the district of which I am speaking is as free from all crime as any parish in England or Scotland, and that the people are readily obeying the laws, and faithfully, I believe to the best of their ability, meeting their obligations. And, further, my Lords, I believe the people themselves are well pleased with this state of peace and repose. I am confident that so long as the laws continue to be firmly and fearlessly maintained—so long as agitators are restrained from arousing and terrorising into crime an excitable, but warm-hearted, peasantry, the people will follow their pursuits in peace, and the country will remain as free from crime as I well recollect it to have been before the Land League commenced its disastrous career. I have no doubt that many of your Lordships from other parts of Ireland could tell a similar tale. To anyone who has, during the last 10 or 12 years, watched the course of events upon the spot, it must be evident that from day to day, as the law is vindicated and its authority maintained, the waves of popular excitement calm down and the people soon forget the awful hurricane by which Irish society was only a few years ago swept. The truth is, that the vast majority of the Irish people desire peace—peace for the performance of their various duties and daily business—and that those cases of lawlessness of which we read in such places as Tipperary and a few other spots are not the outcome of unjust laws or tyrannical administration; they are the direct results of a deeply-planned agitation, carefully and theatrically worked up for a political purpose. I think, under those circumstances, we may all echo the words of Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech which record the steady improvement in the social condition of Ireland which advances so rapidly under the present Administration. I need not say how much this wonderful change is due to the great ability, courage, industry, and patience with which the present Chief Secretary for Ireland has fulfilled his difficult and thankless task. But, speaking as an Irishman, I hail even more heartily those portions of Her Majesty's Gracious Speech which promise generous measures for the immediate and material benefit, and for the lasting welfare of my fellow-countrymen. I will not now venture to occupy your Lordships' time by anticipating the detailed criticism of the Land Purchase scheme which must take place when the Bill is before us; neither will I venture to offer any argument in support of the general policy of largely increasing the number of peasant proprietors. I believe that it has been admitted by thoughtful men of all Parties and all classes, that in such a policy alone is to be found a lasting and permanent settlement of that disastrous struggle between the owners and occupiers of land in Ireland, which from generation to generation has been the ruin and the shame of our country. I will now only ask to be permitted to add my testimony to the large amount of evidence that already exists as to the great success of the efforts which have been already made in this direction. Some years ago—in 1886, I think—I sold to my tenants, under the Ashbourne Act, some portions of my property in the County Galway; and I am glad to be able to bear witness to the fact that the new proprietors on that and on several other estates of which I know have regularly paid their instalments, and I believe are well pleased with their new position. There is only one other point connected with this subject with which I will trouble your Lordships. I wish to say a few words in answer to a charge which has been often made, and made I think evidently not only with the purpose of prejudicing the Irish landlords as a class, but also the Government. It has been said that the object of the policy of Land Purchase is to enable the landlords to "pocket the plunder," as it is called, and to flee the country. Now, I desire most emphatically to repudiate that accusation. I know, on the contrary, of many landlords, who, unless they sell portions of their property, must leave the country, but who are desirous of remaining. I do not see why, if we enter into voluntary arrangements with their tenants for the sale of their estates or portions of them, that should be called "plunder;" but I desire to say on my own behalf—and I think I may speak in this matter on behalf of the vast majority of the Irish resident landlords—that we desire to live in our own country; and if we join in supporting a change in the relations which have hitherto so long existed between ourselves and our tenants, it is because those relations have been rendered difficult, and in some parts of Ireland precarious. On this account we are willing to substitute for them a new state of things under which Irishmen of every class may continue to live in their own country, but under conditions which shall be more permanent and happy. It is the proposal of the Government for dealing with the congested districts which claims the warmest gratitude of those who, like myself, have had opportunities of seeing the misery which inclement seasons from time to time bring upon those fringes of our civilisation. No one can help feeling the deepest sympathy for those poor people who inhabit the rocky and sterile coasts which all along the western seaboard of Ireland are visited by the fierce gales and drenching rain of the Atlantic; but they have hitherto been left hopeless and helpless. I hold that the Government have followed a wise and certainly a humane policy in proposing to establish and endow an independent Board, which shall not only study such difficult questions as emigration, migration, and the consolidation of holdings, but shall also forthwith proceed to consider how far they can render assistance to fisheries and other local industries. And I am glad to know that the vigour with which the policy of providing light railways has been pushed has brought hope and confidence to many a poor family whose outlook for the winter was desolate enough in view of the potato failure, which failure, by the way, seems to have lost all interest for the so-called "patriotic" party since it ceased to offer them a good opportunity for the furtherance of their political ambitions. It is still difficult to accurately estimate the extent of this misfortune, so capriciously has the blight fallen this year upon the various localities, farms, and even upon different parts of the same field; but, speaking generally, I would venture to predict that in many places the distress caused by it will be serious, and, in some, acute; but I do not think it will be anywhere so bad that the promises of vigorous assistance—which has been given by the Government—will not be able to grapple with it. I believe that a well-arranged system of light railways will prove to be the pioneer of comparative prosperity in many of those districts in the West which have hitherto seemed to stand still, or retrograde, while other parts of Ireland were improving. I have detained your Lordships too long, but I trust you will not charge me with egotism for having brought before you these views and opinions gathered from personal experience and observation; for I am confident that every one of your Lordships, to whatever Party you may belong, takes a deep and kindly interest in all questions which touch the material welfare and happiness of Ireland.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, for various reasons I do not propose to trouble you at any length. At the very beginning I am confronted with a difficulty—I admit a small difficulty. It has been my happy lot, not unfrequently, to compliment with well-deserved compliments the Mover and Seconder of the Address in this House, but I do not know that I have ever had to go so far in the chivalry of opposition as to complain of those speeches being too good or too full. I will explain my meaning. Since I have been in this House—now a good many years—I have never heard any criticism whatever with regard to the manner in which we debate the Address in Answer to Her Majesty's Gracious Speech from the Throne. But this has not been the case in another place. This is not an old grievance, but a recent grievance. One of the fruits of that obstruction which was brought almost to the perfection of a science by the Irish Members on the one hand, and by the Fourth Party, supported by other Conservatives, on the other, against the Administration of Mr. Gladstone, was a lengthy Debate on the Address. That was one of the means used. I think there has been a general feeling that it is desirable to shorten these Debates, and for that reason—although the noble Lords who moved and seconded the Address did not allude to the innovation—I have not any objection to make with regard to the form of the Answer being quite different to what it has previously been. It seems to me quite as business-like and quite as respectful to Her Majesty. But I think there has been some inconsistency shown in making that change. To that change I see no objection, because I imagine, notwithstanding the shortness of the Answer, it would be perfectly competent to myself or any other Peer to move an addition to the Answer if we thought fit. At all events, the intention is good, and I certainly desire to assist the Government in making whatever use of that change that may be possible. But it does not seem to me to be perfectly consistent with this desire to shorten the Debate, to introduce into the body of the Speech that which is of a somewhat controversial character, namely, the state of Ireland; and also to encourage the Mover and Seconder of the Address—I presume in the other House as well as in this—to touch upon almost every point—there was one exception to which I will afterwards allude—as has been done under the former state of things. It appears to me to be a sort of invitation to this House, which I do not think we shall take unfair advantage of, and to the other House also, to nullify the course which has been proposed. There is one point to which the noble Lords who moved and seconded the Address did not allude—I think very judiciously—namely, why we meet on this particular day, one of the last days of November. Last February I took the liberty of pointing out that Parliament was meeting at an unusually late period. No answer was given to that observation; but there is no doubt that the lateness of that meeting contributed, with other causes, to the complete legislative collapse which took place. When that collapse took place there was no doubt a good deal to be said for and against an Autumn Session, but I do not think that any of those persons who argued in favour of an Autumn Session imagined that it was going to be reduced to the smallest possible limits, and that there would be any serious hope in a period of not more than three weeks of making up for that with which more than six months had been inadequate to deal. There may be Party reasons for objecting to it, but why a Government with a large majority in both Houses, and with a sincere desire to press forward the measures which they propose, should always show a reluctance to meet Parliament I am unable to understand. It was different formerly. Lord John Russell always proposed to meet Parliament on the earliest possible day, and Mr. Gladstone always followed the same course; but what particular reason the present Government have for always postponing to the last moment the meeting of Parliament I will not attempt to explain. The first and principal portion of the Speech is devoted, as is the custom, to foreign affairs, and I must at once thank the noble Lord who moved the Address for the very handsome tribute which he paid to the attitude of the Opposition with regard to the administration of foreign affairs. Like everybody else—I am sure no one can doubt—I am delighted to hear the confidence with which peace is spoken of by the noble Marquess, and it is all the more consolatory because it seems to be in harmony both with the thoughts and actions of the other great Governments of Europe. Then with regard to other things, nobody who has been connected with the Foreign Office can fail to rejoice very much at the chance of our coming to an arrangement respecting the Newfoundland fisheries, and I certainly hope the noble Marquess will be able to carry out that arrangement. With regard to the negotiations with Portugal, I also, instead of wishing to criticise, entirely rejoice that after a very sharp and disagreeable conflict of feeling, the noble Marquess has adopted a modus vivendi, in which, I think, it is likely that the substantial merits of the case may be settled, and at the same time I hope that it may do away with the friction which to so great a degree has been created on this subject. Then with regard to the delimitation of colonial possessions of the European Powers, I am sure that that is a good thing in itself—of course it depends upon details into which I am not entering now, but in itself the thing is good, and the noble Marquess has had an opportunity of giving urbi et orbi, both to the city and to the universe, his views upon the result of that delimitation. With regard to the hostile tariff which has been lately passed by the United States, I entirely agree with the noble Marquess that we have no action to take with regard to that tariff, especially as it could only be done by the old, fatal, and useless tariff wars which I, for one, deprecate, and would regard with the greatest degree of apprehension. But I am not sure that I am at one with the noble Marquess as to the measures by which we are to neutralise in some degree the bad effect of that hostile tariff. I had an opportunity in public not long ago of saying that I firmly believed that this tariff was not owing to any hostile feeling on the part of the United States towards this country, but was partly due to electioneering questions, to the extreme popularity there of Protection, and also perhaps to capitalist and very powerful vested interests. I am exactly of the same way of thinking now, and I do not think that the reaction which seems to be taking place has anything to do with any interests they have with regard to our commercial prosperity or depression. But there is no doubt that this tariff will do harm. It will affect certain manufactures very much, and it seems manifest that such a tariff will do infinitely more harm to the United States themselves than to others. It will derange trade; it will be injurious to their agriculture, to their labourers, to their farmers, and to their artisans. To us there will be compensations. I have no doubt that they will fail in prohibiting trade, as this tariff proposes. This country, like America, must sell its extra produce, and in order to sell that produce it must buy the produce of other countries. Another consideration is that I do not think that any nation has ever succeeded in establishing very strong prohibitive duties without creating an enormous amount of smuggling, and if the Dominion would only take the course, which would be in their interest, of lowering their duties, I believe the amount of smuggling would be so enormous as in itself to very much counteract that tariff. It appears to me impossible to station along thousand of miles of frontier lynx-eyed Customs officers such as those who discovered the cigars and brandy which were lately so unfortunately placed in the middle of the noble Marquess's luggage. The noble Marquess laid great stress on the fact that "trade follows the flag." I am not so certain that trade does follow the flag. Trade follows the language and the habits of a race. Our trade, notwithstanding all our commercial difficulties with that country, has enormously increased with the United States, where certainly our flag does not float. On the other hand, it cannot be denied that our trade has greatly decreased with some portions of the Dominion and our Colonies, where our flag does float. In those places the flag has not removed obstacles to trade between them and the Mother Country. For those reasons I do not think we can look to the noble Marquess's remedy of annexing enormous territories occupied by uncivilised peoples as a means of meeting any hostile demonstration as regards the demands of our trade. The noble Marquess alluded to the Protectionist feeling of the whole world. It is very sanguine to say that, but it cannot obliterate altogether the importance of the change which is taking place in the United States at this moment. I have not the slightest doubt that the Protectionist feeling in Europe which has prevented their following our example in the direction of Free Trade has been very much owing to seeing so prosperous and free a country as the United States devoted to Protection and against Free Trade. I myself am sanguine that if a great change took place in that country it would react upon the feelings not only of the Americans themselves, but of the nations of Europe also. My Lords, I do not know that I have anything more to say upon foreign affairs. If I had, I should be prevented by the absence of a noble Friend (Lord Rosebery) who is suffering under one of the greatest misfortunes that can happen to a man. But, asking the indulgence of the House, I may, perhaps, allude to two questions which are not in the Queen's Speech. I have no right to complain of their omission from that document, still, they are questions of considerable importance, and I think possibly—I do not say certainly—Her Majesty's Government may give some explanation upon them. One of these questions is with regard to the great financial panic which occurred quite lately in the City. It seems to us who are not, of course, perfectly well-informed in the matter, that it has been met in a manner which is exceedingly creditable to the firmness, prudence, and liberality of the City itself. There is, however, one fact that needs explanation. It has also been stated in the newspapers that there were communications with the Government; but there were statements made with regard to that which are unintelligible, and cannot be true. One statement was that Her Majesty's Government, without giving a guarantee, stood behind the Bank of England to the amount of £2,000,000. That appears to me to be nonsense, and I cannot conceive how that can have been so. I do not know how far these communications were of a perfectly confidential character, or of a nature which Her Majesty's Government would do wrong to divulge. But it would be satisfactory, if that is not the case, if the noble Marquess would state the fact, and give us a little inkling of what the course was which Her Majesty's Government took on this important occasion. The other question is one of the most painful that I remember during my political life. It is the charges that have arisen with regard to an expedition in which great qualities of enterprise and of endurance were shown—charges so painful that I do not know how to allude to them. I do not know whether the Government have considered how far they are called upon to take steps with regard to these charges. I do not give any opinion upon the question whether they ought or ought not to take steps, but it would be satisfactory to know whether Her Majesty's Government have considered the subject, and how, if at all, they think they are called upon to deal with it. Then, my Lords, I come to the Bills which are promised. There are four of them. As I have already said, the noble Lords who moved and seconded the Address touched upon every point in Her Majesty's Speech with one exception, and I think they were perfectly justified in making that exception. They made no allusion to that bogus part of the speech. It is a perfect innovation for Her Majesty's Government in the Queen's name to introduce a whole list of measures with more or less popular titles without taking any of the responsibility which is usually incurred in naming the popular measures proposed to be introduced. I think the omission of the noble Lords was perfectly wise and perfectly justified; and necessarily any discussion upon my part of those important subjects, brought forward on so airy a foundation, would be entirely out of place, and could only be of the most academic character. The noble Lord the Mover said something about two Bills. I do not know what they are. Is the Tithe Bill the same as that of last Session, and is the Land Bill exactly the same as that to which so much attention was given last Session? I do not know whether the noble Marquess will think it right to give us any inkling as to how far they resemble those which came to grief last year. Then there is the question with regard to private legislation in Ireland and Scotland. I am quite sure we shall not oppose Bills if we see no objection to them. Unlike the obstruction which was offered to Mr. Gladstone's Administration, where obstruction was offered to every measure good, bad, and indifferent, whether the Opposition liked it or not, we do not oppose Bills, but we give facilities to them where we do not think they are subject to any fatal objection. As to the proposals with regard to free education I think I can answer for the Opposition being prepared to give that cordial support which they have always given, though that support depends, of course, on what system of free education is proposed to be established. I am afraid I cannot contribute anything further to the Debate, in regard to those four Bills of which at the present moment I really know nothing. Then there is the question which always crops up and stands in the way—the Irish question. During the short recess very heavy charges were brought against the Government as to the policy of the Tipperary prosecutions—how far they assisted in establishing order and the authority of the law. On this point there is a singular commentary in the coincidence that two men so very unlike in their politics and character as Her Majesty's Solicitor General and Mr. Labouchere both agree that those proceedings were a farce. Questions were raised as to the competency of the Judges, as to the sufficiency of their legal training, as to their independence, as to the action of the police, as to the action of the Divisional Magistrates—one individual being told that if he said anything which seemed to the Magistrate illegal that that would at once make him disperse the assembly—and as to the mode in which the Magistrates had been selected for the purpose of these trials—all sorts of questions in short, into which at this moment I do not propose to enter, and I will tell you why. Your Lordships may remember that last Session, in June, Mr. W. O'Brien brought before the House of Commons the subject of a certain meeting which he described as having been dispersed without notice and without invitation to disperse. Mr. O'Brien then described the violent charges of the police, in which a woman was struck on the breast. The Chief Secretary, relying upon official information which he had received, denied those statements, and the House of Commons, by the majority which the Government command, endorsed that denial. It happened that Mr. John

Morley, the late Chief Secretary, went to Ireland to judge for himself of the condition of the country, particularly with reference to the likelihood of a potato deficiency. He went, and while there with Mr. Dillon, who is being prosecuted in Tipperary, Mr. Illingworth, and other persons, saw what appeared to be a repetition of the charge made by Mr. O'Brien in the House of Commons in June. Mr. Balfour then did a thing which I think he must have done inadvertently and without thinking of it. He, in a public speech, intimated, not only to those whom he addressed, but to the Magistrate who was subordinate to him, that he had considered the matter, and that he had come to the conclusion that Mr. Morley's evidence was not worth anything. I am not going to argue whether Mr. Morley's evidence is worth anything, because, with the evidence of Mr. Illingworth, it will be given in a Court of Justice next week, and will be subject to cross-examination. In these circumstances I do not think it would be right for me this evening to introduce a discussion upon this important Irish question, more particularly as I do not wish to give an example to obstructionists in another place, but on the contrary desire to facilitate passing the Address as soon as possible. My Lords, I said I would be short in my remarks. I have not broken that promise; and in conclusion I can only say that I trust that this Session will be more bearing of good fruit than at present it seems probable that it will be.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I have the happiness to be in accord with the noble Earl in his criticism of the speeches of my noble Friends. I have heard, and the House has heard, them with very great pleasure, and though possibly they may coincide with the noble Earl in thinking that they were very full, I do not think they will coincide with him in thinking that they were too full. What my noble Friend who moved the Address said on the subject of his career in this House I hope I may interpret as a cry of penitence for not having more frequently given us the advantage of his assistance in council. At all events, he cannot plead in future that there is any doubt on our part of his fitness to address the public and ourselves with great advantage. To my noble Friend who seconded the Motion my thanks are due for the counsel and assistance which he and his friends have given to the Government and to the House on the grave questions with which he is, by his position, so specially familiar; and I hope that in the Irish Debates which are probably impending over us, and which may occupy much of our time and energy, we shall not lack the assistance, the guidance, and experience of my noble Friend. I feel, in discussing foreign affairs, that there is one circumstance which would hinder us—a circumstance which was referred to with his customary good taste by the noble Earl. We cannot now touch upon foreign affairs without feeling that they would have been spoken to with the greatest authority by a noble Earl who is absent from this House to-night, over whose hearth the bitterest sorrow has fallen that can befall a man; and in regretting his absence from this Debate from that cause I am sure every Member of the House tenders his earnest sympathy to one of its most distinguished Members in the terrible grief that has befallen him. The speech of the noble Earl might be conveniently summarised by this formula—"I could say something about some of the subjects which have been placed before us, but I would rather say nothing at all." The noble Earl referred to a succession of subjects on which he should like to have made some observations, but as he advanced towards the consideration of them he always saw good reasons for abstaining from saying more. I will not go into the politico-economical questions which the noble Earl raised. They could only be dealt with satisfactorily by an array of statistics which certainly I do not carry in my head. I think, however, he will find that the doctrine that the flag draws the trade is covered and supported by the documents which are annually laid before us. He talks of its being really the language that attracts the trade, but if we look at the trade of this country with India, and compare it with the trade that we carry on with other countries quite as rich and quite as vast, I think he will see that the political connexion with that country is a very powerful factor in the enormous commerce which we are enabled to derive from it. Although it is lamentably true that some of our colonies, not following our Free Trade example, have interposed the obstacles of tariff between us and them, which hinder our trade, yet I think it is the fact that our trade is increasing more rapidly with the Australian Colonies than with any other part of the world. I do not, of course, say that the trade of Africa will be an immediate compensation for what we may lose in consequence of the existence of Protectionist beliefs in America, but it is a motive for preventing territory from falling into the hands of other Powers, that those Powers will probably use the dominion which we concede to them for the purpose of crippling the trade that we otherwise should possess; and that seems to me a legitimate motive for the accession of territory which might otherwise be wanting when we consider how vast the territories of this country are. The noble Earl put two questions to me which I am afraid I cannot answer in a very satisfactory manner. He asked me with respect to the events which have recently taken place in the City of London. Undoubtedly it was the duty of a very able man, the Governor of the Bank of England, to whose prudence and strength of character I believe the City owes an incalculable debt of gratitude, to place himself in communication with the Government. If any action of the Government had taken place on those communications, it would have been my duty to lay it frankly and without reserve before Parliament. But I do not think that inchoate and contingent matters are profitable subjects of debate. They could not be explained without disclosing matters of a purely confidential character, and I say that we should only be doing harm and not good if we were now to unrip transactions which have now happily floated back into the past. With respect to Africa, of course there are no two opinions as to the horror of the matters upon which for the last fortnight or three weeks we have been fed almost every day. But I am not prepared to accept for Her Majesty's Government the duty of preserving life and property in the heart of Africa. I do not think it is any part of our duty to take any notice of those things as a Government.

I do not wish to lay down general rules, because events might happen which would set general rules at defiance; but I say that, as far as events have gone, there is nothing that would justify us in incurring the cost, the difficulty, and hazard of doing injustice, all of which evils we should incur in the search after results that we should be very unlikely to obtain. We are very unlikely to get at the truth, and we incur enormous risk of perpetrating injustice if we act on the imperfect information that we can obtain; and we must always remember that, while the principal actor—a very distinguished man, whose proceedings have first brought these matters to light—is not an English subject, the two men on whom the chief weight of those accusations has fallen have passed beyond the reach of all human jurisdiction. I think the noble Earl complained with respect to the time of the meeting of Parliament. He seemed to me to be very inconsistent. The last time we met was, I think, on the 11th of February. The noble Earl said that was much too late. Now we have met on the 25th of November, and yet the noble Earl says it is much too late. I fear the noble Earl will compel us to the somewhat Irish expedient of proceeding with the ensuing Session before the preceding Session has expired. The noble Earl, with a want of candour which is unusual in him, did not tell the House the real reason for the warmth of his feelings; he confided it to a meeting in the country, where he expressed the hope that Parliament might open a few days earlier in order that it might furnish materials for a speech. It was very cruel of us to disappoint the noble Earl, and I heartily sympathise with him, for I know of nothing more painful to a public man than that of having to make a speech and of having nothing to make it about. It is a lamentable position, however, in which all public men are sometimes placed, and it is one of the severest drawbacks to public life. But I must say that the noble Earl is a little exacting if he has not been able to make a speech out of all the events which have occurred during the last three weeks. I never remember a period in which more striking and powerful events have happened in a short space of time than the period which the noble Earl might have included in his survey. I do not understand the complaints of the noble Earl with respect to Ireland. He complains that the Chief Secretary should have beforehand said that Mr. Morley's evidence was worth nothing when Mr. Morley was going to give his evidence in a Court of Justice.

EARL GRANVILLE: It was not known at that time.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Then, of course, the complaint falls to the ground. I quite admit that a witness should be protected in the way the noble Earl suggests, and that his evidence should not be discredited beforehand; but it is on the condition that he confines his testimony to the one proper and judicial use. If he uses his testimony for platform material, and takes the things which he is about to swear to in a Court of Justice as missiles to throw at the head of a political opponent, it is a little too much to expect that the political opponent will not say that the missiles are worth nothing. I understand the noble Earl to lay down the doctrine that when a politician has denounced his opponent with all the vigour which a wealth of vituperation and vigorous imagination can confer, and afterwards says the events are going to be the subject of evidence in a Court of Justice, then his political opponent, who is the victim of that proceeding, is to be compelled to admit that these accusations are unjust. I am quite sure the noble Earl would not like to undergo that ordeal himself. I do not quite apprehend the full nature of the noble Earl's objection to the Tipperary proceedings. He said something about their being injurious to the cause of law and order and conciliation, and so forth. It is difficult to speak of the Tipperary proceedings, because they were cut off, as it were, in mid-life by a strange event which happened to two of the defendants. There is always some difficulty with Irish leaders. Their strong point just now is escaping. Some prefer to escape by water; some prefer fire-escapes. But if we may pass from the personal part of the matter affecting those two distinguished men who are now exhibiting the tyranny of their country in America, I only wish the House to think for a moment of

what this Tipperary business really is, and what crime it was of which those defendants were accused. It has been often said, and said most untruly, that we are stopping combination in Ireland while we do not stop combinations of working men who refuse to work in England. The comparison is an utter disfigurement of the truth, and is a great insult to the working men of England. The working men of England have combined to refuse to give that which they have a perfect right to refuse to give—their labour. The combination which has been compared with that combination, the combination in Ireland which goes by the name of boycotting, is a combination, not to give what a man has a right to give or to refuse at his pleasure—it is a combination not to pay just and honest debts—it is a combination to swindle, to steal. But these Tipperary proceedings are even worse than the ordinary combination to steal, if it is worse to combine to steal in order that you may oppress and coerce instead of combining simply to steal and to defraud; because the conspiracy for which these men have been condemned in Tipperary is this—they conspired not only to defraud a man of the debts to which he had a good right according to law, but they conspired to do so in order to punish him for exercising that which was undoubtedly his right—namely, buying an estate in another part of the country in open market. A more monstrous combination or conspiracy of coercion, tyranny, and dishonesty the annals of Irish disorder have not, I believe, produced. For that reason it was necessary that the prosecutions should take place. I do not deny for a moment that these prosecutions, if they could be avoided, are undesirable; but the first thing necessary is to maintain the rights of Her Majesty's subjects to possess their property and to exercise their avocations in Ireland, and, however long the process may go on, and whatever difficulties it may involve, you will never establish good government or restore prosperity in Ireland unless you rigidly determine to go on punishing by law those who conspire to commit frauds and to tyrannise over their neighbours. The noble Lord did not criticise the Bills which we have indicated in the Queen's Speech; he rather complained that we had not affixed to their names a general summary of their provisions. Such an arrangement would be inconvenient, impracticable, and might swell the Queen's Speech to an inconvenient size; and certainly I am unable to respond to his challenge when he suggested that I should now give an account of what these very complicated measures, which will be very shortly introduced, will contain. I will only say we entertain the hope that by increasing the number of those interested in the ownership of land in Ireland we may create a moral and political force which shall frustrate the efforts of future agitators to raise occupier against owner, and shall establish that balance of various interests in the midst of which every citizen may pursue his way and exercise his rights in peace.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I think the noble Marquess has a little misunderstood the position which my noble Friend intended to take with regard to these recent events in Ireland—I mean the Tipperary prosecutions, the conduct of the police, and the other matters to which he referred. What my noble Friend intended, I think, to convey was this, and I thought he did convey it very clearly to the House, that this would not be a proper opportunity for discussing those matters, for this obvious reason: that many of them have still to come before a Court of Justice in Ireland. And although there are matters which could be very properly discussed, it is very obvious that once you introduced the discussion it would be very difficult indeed to draw distinctions between the different matters. For instance, the conduct of the police has been very much impugned. Concerning that matter I do not desire to express any opinion in this House. It will shortly be inquired into in a Court of Law, and I think there could not be a reasonably impartial and effective discussion upon it now. We ought, of course, to be entirely untrammelled in discussing these various subjects. No doubt they may be brought forward at a future time if an opportunity should arise, and if we should think fit to do so. I do not desire to add anything more on the present occasion, but I thought it right to say a few words, as the noble

Earl said very little upon those subjects in his speech, and the noble Marquess has said little in reply. The noble Lord who seconded the Address very properly brought forward some interesting statistics, which I was glad to hear, with regard to the diminution of agrarian crime in Ireland. That must be a matter of satisfaction to us all, on whichever side of the House we may be; but he drew from that a conclusion which I thought dangerous. He implied from it that there is now political contentment in Ireland, and it appeared to me a very dangerous thing to measure political contentment by the amount of crime existing. It amounts to saying to the people, "If you do not commit crime you show that you are content with the political system under which you live." I am not for a moment arguing that the absence of agrarian crime is not a very favourable symptom, but I do urge that in a country situated as Ireland has been you should not connect contentment or agitation too closely with agrarian crime. Unfortunately these agrarian crimes have existed so long that we can hardly fix the date when they began. If you look back to the time before the Union you will find that agrarian crime was very rife. I am afraid it is much more due to what the noble Lord called "the perpetual contest or struggle that has gone on between the landowners and the tenants," than to the agitators, who have merely taken advantage of that unfortunate state of relations between the landlords and tenants in Ireland. I do not think, my Lords, there was anything else in the remarks which have been made on the present occasion which would make it necessary to add anything further.

LORD BRABOURNE: My Lords, the etiquette of your Lordships' House prevents a long Debate upon the Address such as usually takes place in the other House; and I should not have risen but for one circumstance which has occurred this autumn, and which, I think, we ought not to allow to pass without holding up to reprobation. We ought to earmark and stereotype in reprobation two lessons, which, for the first time in the history of this country, have been taught by an eminent statesman and leader of the Liberal Party. That statesman has deliberately told a portion of his fellow-subjects that if they had any love for their country and their family it was their duty to hate the law. That is one of the lessons which have been taught the public; and the other lesson taught by the same great leader is that there was no such thing as right and wrong in politics, but that it is the duty of a politician to ascertain on what side the majority is likely to be, and then to go with the majority without regard to principle. I think it would be a mistake if, on this first day of the meeting of Parliament, attention were not called to these new moral doctrines which, though they are taught by a leader of the Liberal Party, I venture to say are doctrines which will not be accepted by the people of this country at large, and which will not bring so much satisfaction even to those by whom they are taught as they seem to think possible. With regard to the business of the House, I would ask the noble Marquess what course of business will be proceeded with in reference to the matters which have been referred to, or whether your Lordships are to be troubled at present with any business at all?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I can only say that the course of business will at present depend upon the action of this House. I do not know of any business which is likely to arise among ourselves before Christmas, but of course if there should be any we shall be glad to discuss it. I am afraid there is still less likelihood of any business coming to us from another place. I think, therefore, until we are further informed, it is not desirable that we should meet every day; and my proposal, which I have mentioned to the noble Earl, is that on rising to-day we should adjourn for Public Business to Tuesday next.

On Question, agreed to, nemine dissente; Address ordered to be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 25th November, 1890.

The House met at half after One of the clock.

MR. SPEAKER'S ABSENCE.

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Speaker.

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners;—

The House went;—and having returned;—

NEW WRITS DURING THE RECESS.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER acquainted the House,—That Mr. Speaker had issued, during the Recess, Warrants for New Writs,—for South East Lancashire (Eccles Division), v. Honourable Alfred John Francis Egerton, deceased; for Universities of Edinburgh and St. Andrews, v. Moir Tod Stormonth Darling, esquire, one of the Senators of Her Majesty's College of Justice in Scotland.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887 (ARREST AND IMPRISONMENT OF MEMBERS).

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER acquainted the House that Mr. Speaker had received the following Letter relating to proceedings under "The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887," against certain Members of this House:—

Limerick,
24th Nov. 1890.

Sir,

I have the honour to report for your information that, on the 18th Sept. 1890, Mr. John Dillon, M.P., and Mr. William O'Brien, M.P., were arrested on Warrants charging them, 1st, with taking part in a criminal conspiracy; 2ndly, with using intimidation; and 3rdly, with inciting to intimidation, as defined in the second section of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887, and were on same date brought before me at Tipperary, when each of them was admitted to bail to appear at Tipperary Petty Sessions, on the 25th of same month, to answer to the said charges, which they accordingly did; but on the 10th October following, they failed to appear at the sitting of the Court, and have not since been made amenable.

I have also to inform you that Mr. Patrick O'Brien, M.P., was arrested on the 23rd September 1890, on a warrant charging him with similar offences, and was brought before me, at Tipperary Petty Sessions, on the 25th of same month, and was admitted to bail to answer to the said charges. I have to add that, at Clonmel, on the 10th instant, at an adjourned hearing of these charges, he was convicted by a Court duly constituted under the said Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887, of taking part in a criminal conspiracy, as defined in the second section of the said Act, and was sentenced to be imprisoned in the County Gaol at Clonmel for a period of six months without hard labour, and was committed on the same date to the said gaol for the said period.

Mr. Thomas J. Condon, M.P., was also arrested on the 25th Sept. 1890, on a warrant charging him with similar offences, and was similarly admitted to bail on the same date. The charges against him were dismissed on the merits at Clonmel, on the 19th instant.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your most obt. servant,

J. B. IRWIN, R.M.,

Chairman of the Court

The Right Honourable A. Peel, M.P.,

Speaker, House of Commons.

ELECTIONS.

Ordered, That all Members who are returned for two or more places in any part of the United Kingdom do make their election for which of the places they will serve, within one week after it shall appear that there is no question upon the Return for that place; and if anything shall come in question touching the Return or Election of any Member, he is to withdraw during the time the matter is in debate; and that all Members returned upon double Returns do withdraw till their Returns are determined.

Resolved, That no Peer of the Realm, except such Peers of Ireland as shall for the time being be actually elected, and shall not have declined to serve, for any county, city, or borough of Great Britain, hath any right to give his vote in the Election of any Member to serve in Parliament.

C

Resolved, That it is a high infringement of the liberties and privileges of the Commons of the United Kingdom for any Lord of Parliament, or other Peer or Prelate, not being a Peer of Ireland at the time elected, and not having declined to serve for any county, city, or borough of Great Britain, to concern himself in the Election of Members to serve for the Commons in Parliament, except only any Peer of Ireland, at such Elections in Great Britain respectively where such Peer shall appear as a Candidate, or by himself, or any others, be proposed to be elected; or for any Lord Lieutenant or Governor of any county to avail himself of any authority derived from his Commission, to influence the Election of any Member to serve for the Commons in Parliament.

Resolved, That if it shall appear that any person hath been elected or returned a Member of this House, or endeavoured so to be, by bribery, or any other corrupt practices, this House will proceed with the utmost severity against all such persons as shall have been wilfully concerned in such bribery or other corrupt practices.

WITNESSES.

Resolved, That if it shall appear that any person hath been tampering with any Witness, in respect of his evidence to be given to this House, or any Committee thereof, or directly or indirectly hath endeavoured to deter or hinder any person from appearing or giving evidence, the same is declared to be a high crime and misdemeanour; and this House will proceed with the utmost severity against such offender.

Resolved, That if it shall appear that any person hath given false evidence in any case before this House, or any Committee thereof, this House will proceed with the utmost severity against such offender.

METROPOLITAN POLICE.

Ordered, That the Commissioners of the Police of the Metropolis do take care that, during the Session of Parliament, the passages through the streets leading to this House be kept free and open, and that no obstruction be permitted to hinder the passage of Members to and from this House, and that no disorder be allowed in Westminster Hall, or in the passages leading to this House, during the sitting of Parliament, and that there be no annoyance therein or thereabouts; and that the Serjeant at Arms attending this House do communicate this Order to the Commissioners aforesaid.

VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS.

Ordered, That the Votes and Proceedings of this House be printed, being first perused by Mr. Speaker; and that he do appoint the printing thereof; and that no person but such as he shall appoint do presume to print the same.

PRIVILEGES.

Ordered, That a Committee of Privileges be appointed.

OUTLAWRIES BILL.

"Bill for the more effectual preventing Clandestine Outlawries," read the first time; to be read a second time.

NEW MEMBERS SWORN.

Sir Charles John Pearson, knight, for the Universities of Edinburgh and St. Andrews; Henry John Roby, esquire, for South-East Lancashire (Eccles Division).

JOURNAL.

Ordered, That the Journal of this House, from the end of the last Session to the end of the present Session, with an Index to the 146th Volume, be printed.

Ordered, That 750 copies of the said Journal and Index be printed by the appointment and under the direction of Reginald Francis Douce Palgrave, esquire, C.B., the Clerk of this House.

Ordered, That the said Journal and Index be printed by such Person as shall be licensed by Mr. Speaker, and that no other person do presume to print the same.

LIGHTHOUSE ILLUMINANTS (SOUTH FORELAND EXPERIMENTS).

Copy ordered—

"Of [further Correspondence on the subject of the Report made in 1885 by the Trinity House on the South Foreland Experiments on Lighthouse Illuminants, together with a Report from the President and two Fellows of the Royal Society to the President of the Board of Trade (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 60, of Session 1889).—(Sir Michael Hicks Beach.)

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 2.]

NOTICES OF MOTION.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Bill to provide further funds for the purchase of land in Ireland, to make permanent the Land Commission in Ireland, and to provide for the improvement of the congested districts; also a Bill constituting the Land Department, and to amend the laws relating to the purchase of land in Ireland.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Bill to make better provision for the recovery of tithe rent-charge in England and Wales.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): Bill to amend the procedure in regard to Private Bills relating to Scotland.

QUESTIONS.

THE EMIN PASHA RELIEF EXPEDITION.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the attention of the Government has been called to the revolting charges which have been made against the members of the Emin Pasha Relief Expedition; whether any of the persons charged with such barbarous conduct held commissions as officers in the Army; and whether the Government are prepared to appoint a Commission of Inquiry or to take any other steps to ascertain the truth of the extraordinary statements which have been so freely made?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Government are aware that very grave charges of the nature indicated have been made against members of the Emin Relief Expedition, notably against two who are dead, and incapable of answering for themselves. One of these gentlemen held a commission in the Army; but the Government were in no sense responsible for his selection as one of the staff of the expedition, or for the expedition itself. It is not, therefore, the intention of the Government to appoint a Commission of Inquiry.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I think it may be for the convenience of the House that I should at once indicate in general terms the arrangements the Government intend to propose in regard to the Business of the House during the course of the present Session. Obviously it would be most unfair to hon. Gentlemen if proposals were made at a later stage which interfered with the arrangements for Bills of which they may give notice. The Government feel that in asking the House to meet at this period of the year they are exposing

hon. Members to inconvenience which is only to be justified by the urgent necessity of passing the important measures of which my right hon. Friends have given notice. Under these circumstances, the Government think it will be for the convenience of the House that the whole time of the House shall be taken for the consideration of those measures until they have passed the stage of Second Reading and the Speaker is out of the Chair. The measure dealing with the anticipated distress in Ireland, to enable Railway Companies in existence to construct or take over proposals for the construction of railways in the congested districts of Ireland, we desire the House to consider before the Christmas Recess. As soon as the House has made progress in the direction I have indicated, the Government will be glad to meet what they believe will be the desire of the House—that is, adjourn for a reasonable holiday till after Christmas. I propose to move the Resolution for time as soon as the Address has been disposed of.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): Will the First Lord of the Treasury state when he will move the Resolution giving Bills which have attained certain stages precedence over other Bills? That has usually been done at Whitsuntide; but as Parliament is now meeting earlier than usual, I should like to know if it is intended to bring the Standing Order on the subject earlier into operation.

MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Gentleman did not give me notice of this question, and I have had no opportunity to consider it; but I think, if he looks at the almanac, Whitsuntide comes earlier next year than usual, and the matter is not, therefore, quite so urgent as he suggests. Any Bill to secure precedence has to be read a first and second time, and therefore the choice of facilities depends greatly on good fortune in the Ballot.

MR. LEA: But we must to-morrow fix the date for the Second Reading, and it is of no use choosing a date after the Standing Order is to come into force.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I think the hon. Gentleman will find, if he has the misfortune to be placed so low down in the Ballot as not to get a Second Reading till then, that he is hardly likely to get the subsequent precedence which he desires.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): What arrangement has been made for bringing in the Bills to-morrow? Will it be before the resumption of the Debate or after an early adjournment?

MR. CREMER: I should also like to ask for information as to the probable duration of the Christmas Recess? Will the House re-assemble about the middle of January, or at the end of the month?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: In reply to the hon. Baronet, I think it will be for the convenience of the House that an adjournment of the Debate should take place to-morrow shortly after 4 o'clock—[Opposition cries of "Three o'clock!"] —well, half-past 3, which is, I think, the usual course. With regard to the hon. Member's question as to the Christmas holidays, he will see that their duration must to a considerable extent depend upon the progress of business. I should hope that the progress I have indicated may be obtained, and, in that event, I should propose that the House re-assemble about the end of the third week in January—that is, about the 22nd.

QUEEN'S SPEECH.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER reported Her Majesty's Speech delivered by Her Chancellor (see page 2), and read it to the House.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

(5.40.) COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) (who was attired in the uniform of a Lieut.-Colonel of the Guards): Mr. Deputy Speaker, on the few occasions on which I have myself been present at the proceedings at the opening of Parliament I have noticed that the Mover of the Address has, almost without exception, asked for the indulgence of the House on the score of his not having addressed it before. Sir, I cannot lay any claim exactly to such a right to lenient consideration, but I would assure the House that it is in no spirit of self-reliance—it is in the full consciousness that I have nothing to trust to but the general forbearance of the House—that I rise to perform this duty which has been allotted to me. But I think I should be out of harmony with the feelings of every Member of this House if I did not take the first possible opportunity of referring to the reason why I have to address you, Sir, as the Deputy Speaker rather than Mr. Speaker himself. I think we all feel in this country that there is something in domestic sorrow that is so sacred that we almost hesitate to apply public reference to it. But I feel that I am on sure and safe ground when I say that the sincerest sympathies of every Member of this House are with the Speaker in the severe ordeal through which he is now passing, and that our warmest and heartiest hopes are extended to him that he may soon be relieved from the cloud at present darkening his house. If I may now refer to that duty to which I alluded—I have the honour of proposing to this House a resolution, different somewhat in terms from those previously moved on these occasions, and I think the House will acknowledge that this innovation is justified when it reflects that in recent times there has resulted from the previous practice considerable waste both of the time and the talents and the temper of the House. And this change has been foreshadowed by such high authorities as have spoken on this subject in years gone by. I may remind the House that as long ago as 1879 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian used these words:—

"If the speech itself is to be made the subject of lengthened and renewed debate and diversified amendment in this House it will become no better than a public nuisance, and it will be for the advantage of the country that it should be wholly discontinued."

I trust I may be allowed to express a hope that the experience of a past Session will not be repeated, and that under the influence of the comparatively simple Resolution with which it will be my duty to conclude my speech, this House will be able to proceed with as little loss of time as possible to the consideration of those important subjects of legislation which are to be proposed to it. In doing so it may well feel assured that it is doing its duty to those whom it represents here. Her Majesty in the Most Gracious Speech which she has addressed to us from the Throne refers to the existing state of her foreign relations, and I think that it will be with interest and satisfaction that we learn that negotiations have commenced with the King of Italy, and we shall look forward with hope to the speedy settlement of those negotiations, remembering as we do the friendly interest that this country has always taken in Italy, and the valuable example she now shows to us of the great value of close unity between all sections of the dominions of the King. Then, Sir, we may join in regret that His Majesty the King of Portugal has not yet been able to consent to the Treaty which was signed on the 20th of August; but I think we may look hopefully forward to the fact that the manner in which these negotiations were conducted will bring the question to a speedy and satisfactory solution. So far as this country is concerned, no doubt the negotiations will be conducted in a generous though firm spirit; and, as regards Portugal, we may hope that she will look back to the time when, if it had not been for British help and British alliance, for the leadership of British generals, and the gallantry of British soldiery, it would hardly have been that Portugal would have retained its place on the map of Europe. I think that the outcome of all these foreign relations must be essentially satisfactory to the country. They breathe an atmosphere of absolute peace, and, considering we are a nation to whom peace is of such intense value, I think we shall recognise with pleasure and with satisfaction the terms in which Her Majesty is able to refer to assured and continued peace in her Speech. And the satisfaction will not diminish because we feel that that peace has not been secured by any timorous concession, but by a policy of resolute and determined maintenance of the rights and dignity of this country, coupled as it always has been with a generous acknowledgment of the rights and ambitions of neighbouring nations. Her Majesty, in passing from the question of her relations with Foreign Powers, informs us that the Estimates for the ensuing year have been prepared with due regard to strict economy. On that point I have only to observe that I hope and trust that though the strictest economy may be—and ought to be—observed, yet that efficiency will be still more observed than economy. I hope and trust that this country will never consider that simple economy is the great aim and object of the Estimates, but that it will look rather to such a use of the funds and reserves of this country as will ensure durable, permanent, and satisfactory results. Her Majesty passes from the preparation of the Estimates to a reference to the existing condition of affairs within her own dominions, and I believe that all of us who can take a fair and dispassionate view of these matters will be able to echo and endorse the words in which Her Majesty refers to the general condition of Ireland. We learn that in Ireland a sensible improvement has taken place under the operation of the salutary legislation which has been applied to it. Comparing the year 1890 with 1886 I find that the general condition of Ireland presents these rather striking facts:—In 1890 there were 5,467 fewer paupers, there were 1,488 less indictable offences, 847 fewer committals, 394 fewer summary convictions, and 4,749 less people boycotted. There was £772,000 more in the Post Office Savings Bank, £2,796,000 more in the Joint Stock Banks, and an increase of £246,000 in railway receipts. The agrarian outrages were fewer by 292. This seems to me the shortest and simplest way in which to draw the attention of the House to the absolute accuracy of the words used in the Queen's Speech, and the fair description they give of the condition of Ireland. I hope I shall not be travelling too far beyond the limits assigned to me if I remind the House that in 1880 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, at Mid Lothian, referred to an absence of crime and outrage in Ireland "such as is unknown in the previous history of Ireland." Well, at the time the right hon. Gentleman used these words, I find that there was an average of 32 agrarian outrages every month in Ireland, and of 39 threatening letters. This year I find the agrarian outrages have fallen to an average of 24 per month, and the threatening letters to an average of 17 a month. I would only point this out that, if the right hon. Gentleman is going to verify the prophecy which he has lately addressed to the country—if it is correct that in a more or less short time he is to be returned at the head of a majority of this House—I think it will be the first duty he will have to discharge to give to the Administration which has preceded him a certificate couched in even warmer terms than those he found himself obliged to use in 1880. At all events it will be some satisfaction to us to know that under our administration such a state of things has been arrived at as will extract from the right hon. Gentleman such a certificate. I notice that Her Majesty, in pursuing her review of the existing condition of things in Ireland, brings to our attention the fact that she has learned with deep regret of the existence of a serious deficiency in the potato crop in certain parts of Ireland, and it threatens a recurrence of one of those periods of severe distress to which the West of Ireland is peculiarly exposed. There is not a thinking man in this House who will not learn this with the deepest regret, but at the same time I hope, though I do not wish for a moment to minimise the importance or the seriousness of this distress, still I may express a hope that it is not so widely spread as has been supposed. But whether the districts be broad or be narrow, whether large or small, I think it is a matter of satisfaction to find that the Executive are awake and ready to deal with it, and that they will not be slow to apply such measures as will reduce the distress which is here indicated. I hope that the construction of railways, and the opening up of the country by them and other means, will in itself furnish considerable employment for the poor of those districts. I will also express the hope that in whatever form relief may be given it will not be in the form of pauperising alms, but by supplying work of such a nature that the men in the country can get a good day's wage for an honest day's work, and that by honest industry on relief works they will be tided over the time of distress, and will be enabled in due course to return to their own industries, fortified and assured by the fact that, as long as England has the power and the right to help her, Ireland will never be left in the lurch in time of trouble. The Queen's Speech next alludes to those measures of legislation which it is thought most rightfully and usefully can occupy our attention, and we find in the forefront of the programme that the Irish Land Bill will again be introduced. I think we shall look with great satisfaction and great pleasure on the fact of the re-introduction of this measure. I am glad to see that the second phase in the programme of remedial legislation is likely so soon to be reached. I think that all of us who study or take an interest in this subject must acknowledge that the question of the dual ownership of the land is one that requires immediate attention in restoring contentment in Ireland. Whatever may be our feelings on this subject, we may congratulate ourselves that the first page in that remedial legislation—the restoring of order and the supremacy of the law—has taken place, and that there is now room to deal with the Land Question, and so bring us to the time when we can proceed with the granting of Local Government, the Bill for which is ready, and which needs only sufficiency of time to become a practical and accomplished measure. I hope this Bill will also deal in some measure with the question of the congested districts in Ireland. I hope that whatever is done for Ireland there will be no disposition on the part of English Members to be niggardly and too parsimonious in the way in which she is treated. I hope that, through English Members, Ireland will receive not only justice, but generous justice too. With regard to this Bill, I think it is of considerable interest that a great authority amongst the Irish people should refer to it in the terms which Sir Charles Duffy used in a letter to Archbishop Croke a month or two ago. He said—

“I am persuaded that if a native Prime Minister submitted to an Irish Parliament in its first Session a Bill framed on the same lines, it would be received with a burst of national enthusiasm. The measure aims to turn the Irish tenant into an Irish proprietor without subjecting him to a single unfair or burdensome condition. How is it possible to get anything better than this from any Legislature till the crack of doom?”

I feel that if the question is approached in a cordial spirit by the representatives of England and Ireland, a happy solution of this vexed question will be arrived at, and Ireland will be landed in a position of greater contentment and security. The next measure to which our attention is drawn is a pro posal for remedying a difficulty which has arisen through the indirect incidence of tithe rent charge upon land in England and Wales. I may express my humble hope that the measure to be introduced will certainly simplify the recovery of the tithe rent-charge, and I hope it will have the effect of removing friction, especially in Wales. I hope it will have the effect of doing justice to those clergymen who undoubtedly have had hard times, and have had reason to complain perhaps of the delay and hesitation as to legislation on this matter. Then as to the question of facilitating the Private Bill legislation in Scotland and Ireland, I think that will be very favourably received by both sides of the House. It will be, I presume, in the direction of relieving Parliament from some of those matters which can be better dealt with elsewhere. I hope all of us who are in earnest about making Parliament a useful institution will be glad to see that relief given, and those duties discharged where they can be discharged better perhaps than within these walls. The next paragraph invites our attention to the expediency of alleviating the burden which the law of compulsory education has imposed in recent years on the poorer portion of the people. This subject, I think, will be received by the country with great relief and great gratification. I think it has been felt that the time has come, or is at all events close at hand, when a measure in this direction would be acceptable, would be just, and most properly be looked for by the people of this country. I hope this measure will be one of real relief to the working classes, whether in town or country. I hope it will be a measure which will act advantageously upon the great question of education. I think there are many men in this House who look to the spread of education for the solution of some of those problems which legislation cannot, perhaps, so well deal with. Therefore, I hope, we shall find a very general support to a measure which has this for its object. There can be no question that the State will gain in proportion as the population within the State are better educated, and are free from the dangers which necessarily attend a want of education. I may also express a hope that in one or two particular points this measure will produce a great relief. I believe that with respect to the large towns the fact that there will no longer be the difficulty as to the payment of fees will bring about most certainly a much larger attendance of the children of the poor, and in other districts I hope one result will ensue, namely, the relief of parents unfortunately unable to pay the school fees from the painful necessity of applying to a relieving officer for the payment of those fees. I trust the parents will be relieved from a position which I know some of them feel most acutely, and that the children will be relieved from the taint of pauperism, which undoubtedly is a serious drawback to them, and militates greatly against the cause of education. These are the main measures to which our attention is specially invited. A list of contingent measures is shadowed forth, in many of which I take the keenest personal interest, but if the time of Parliament is not sufficient to enable us to reach them all, at least I think I may claim that in the proposals to which I have alluded there is an ample field for the useful spending of all the time which will be at our disposal between now and that holiday which we shall hope to reach some time in the course of the approaching summer. Without further reference to these contingent measures, I beg to be allowed to again centre and focus the attention of the House to those main and chief measures to which I have mentioned to allude. If this programme is brought to a completion, I do not think there is one earnest man in this House who would deny there would be undoubted advantages conferred by it upon the people of England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales. If hon. Members will take a short review of the position I hope they will recognise that there is no reason whatever why this programme should not be accomplished in its entirety, and why these measures should not all find their place upon the Statute Book. We, on this side of the House are most anxious to pass them. I can hardly believe that even those who are in opposition to us on many measures can seriously wish to oppose us on these. I have yet to learn that opposition in this House must be conducted on the principle of refusing support to good measures because they come from your

included in his survey. I do not understand the complaints of the noble Earl with respect to Ireland. He complains that the Chief Secretary should have beforehand said that Mr. Morley's evidence was worth nothing when Mr. Morley was going to give his evidence in a Court of Justice.

EARL GRANVILLE: It was not known at that time.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Then, of course, the complaint falls to the ground. I quite admit that a witness should be protected in the way the noble Earl suggests, and that his evidence should not be discredited beforehand; but it is on the condition that he confines his testimony to the one proper and judicial use. If he uses his testimony for platform material, and takes the things which he is about to swear to in a Court of Justice as missiles to throw at the head of a political opponent, it is a little too much to expect that the political opponent will not say that the missiles are worth nothing. I understand the noble Earl to lay down the doctrine that when a politician has denounced his opponent with all the vigour which a wealth of vituperation and vigorous imagination can confer, and afterwards says the events are going to be the subject of evidence in a Court of Justice, then his political opponent, who is the victim of that proceeding, is to be compelled to admit that these accusations are unjust. I am quite sure the noble Earl would not like to undergo that ordeal himself. I do not quite apprehend the full nature of the noble Earl's objection to the Tipperary proceedings. He said something about their being injurious to the cause of law and order and conciliation, and so forth. It is difficult to speak of the Tipperary proceedings, because they were cut off, as it were, in mid-life by a strange event which happened to two of the defendants. There is always some difficulty with Irish leaders. Their strong point just now is escaping. Some prefer to escape by water; some prefer fire-escapes. But if we may pass from the personal part of the matter affecting those two distinguished men who are now exhibiting the tyranny of their country in America, I only wish the House to think for a moment of

what this Tipperary business really is, and what crime it was of which those defendants were accused. It has been often said, and said most untruly, that we are stopping combination in Ireland while we do not stop combinations of working men who refuse to work in England. The comparison is an utter disfigurement of the truth, and is a great insult to the working men of England. The working men of England have combined to refuse to give that which they have a perfect right to refuse to give—their labour. The combination which has been compared with that combination, the combination in Ireland which goes by the name of boycotting, is a combination, not to give what a man has a right to give or to refuse at his pleasure—it is a combination not to pay just and honest debts—it is a combination to swindle, to steal. But these Tipperary proceedings are even worse than the ordinary combination to steal, if it is worse to combine to steal in order that you may oppress and coerce instead of combining simply to steal and to defraud; because the conspiracy for which these men have been condemned in Tipperary is this—they conspired not only to defraud a man of the debts to which he had a good right according to law, but they conspired to do so in order to punish him for exercising that which was undoubtedly his right—namely, buying an estate in another part of the country in open market. A more monstrous combination or conspiracy of coercion, tyranny, and dishonesty the annals of Irish disorder have not, I believe, produced. For that reason it was necessary that the prosecutions should take place. I do not deny for a moment that these prosecutions, if they could be avoided, are undesirable; but the first thing necessary is to maintain the rights of Her Majesty's subjects to possess their property and to exercise their avocations in Ireland, and, however long the process may go on, and whatever difficulties it may involve, you will never establish good government or restore prosperity in Ireland unless you rigidly determine to go on punishing by law those who conspire to commit frauds and to tyrannise over their neighbours. The noble Lord did not criticise the Bills which we have indicated in the Queen's Speech; he rather complained that we had not affixed to their names a general summary of their provisions. Such an arrangement would be inconvenient, impracticable, and might swell the Queen's Speech to an inconvenient size; and certainly I am unable to respond to his challenge when he suggested that I should now give an account of what these very complicated measures, which will be very shortly introduced, will contain. I will only say we entertain the hope that by increasing the number of those interested in the ownership of land in Ireland we may create a moral and political force which shall frustrate the efforts of future agitators to raise occupier against owner, and shall establish that balance of various interests in the midst of which every citizen may pursue his way and exercise his rights in peace.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I think the noble Marquess has a little misunderstood the position which my noble Friend intended to take with regard to these recent events in Ireland—I mean the Tipperary prosecutions, the conduct of the police, and the other matters to which he referred. What my noble Friend intended, I think, to convey was this, and I thought he did convey it very clearly to the House, that this would not be a proper opportunity for discussing those matters, for this obvious reason: that many of them have still to come before a Court of Justice in Ireland. And although there are matters which could be very properly discussed, it is very obvious that once you introduced the discussion it would be very difficult indeed to draw distinctions between the different matters. For instance, the conduct of the police has been very much impugned. Concerning that matter I do not desire to express any opinion in this House. It will shortly be inquired into in a Court of Law, and I think there could not be a reasonably impartial and effective discussion upon it now. We ought, of course, to be entirely untrammelled in discussing these various subjects. No doubt they may be brought forward at a future time if an opportunity should arise, and if we should think fit to do so. I do not desire to add anything more on the present occasion, but I thought it right to say a few words, as the noble

Earl said very little upon those subjects in his speech, and the noble Marquess has said little in reply. The noble Lord who seconded the Address very properly brought forward some interesting statistics, which I was glad to hear, with regard to the diminution of agrarian crime in Ireland. That must be a matter of satisfaction to us all, on whichever side of the House we may be; but he drew from that a conclusion which I thought dangerous. He implied from it that there is now political contentment in Ireland, and it appeared to me a very dangerous thing to measure political contentment by the amount of crime existing. It amounts to saying to the people, "If you do not commit crime you show that you are content with the political system under which you live." I am not for a moment arguing that the absence of agrarian crime is not a very favourable symptom, but I do urge that in a country situated as Ireland has been you should not connect contentment or agitation too closely with agrarian crime. Unfortunately these agrarian crimes have existed so long that we can hardly fix the date when they began. If you look back to the time before the Union you will find that agrarian crime was very rife. I am afraid it is much more due to what the noble Lord called "the perpetual contest or struggle that has gone on between the landowners and the tenants," than to the agitators, who have merely taken advantage of that unfortunate state of relations between the landlords and tenants in Ireland. I do not think, my Lords, there was anything else in the remarks which have been made on the present occasion which would make it necessary to add anything further.

LORD BRABOURNE: My Lords, the etiquette of your Lordships' House prevents a long Debate upon the Address such as usually takes place in the other House; and I should not have risen but for one circumstance which has occurred this autumn, and which, I think, we ought not to allow to pass without holding up to reprobation. We ought to earmark and stereotype in reprobation two lessons, which, for the first time in the history of this country, have been taught by an eminent statesman and the Bright clauses of the Land Act of 1870; it has been twice affirmed by Parliament in what are known as the Ashbourne Acts, and it is, of course, recognised in the comprehensive scheme dealing with the question of land purchase in Ireland introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in 1886,* and again last Session, when the Government Land Bill was read a second time without a Division. If, then, the principle is one on which all are agreed, surely the wisdom of Parliament ought to be able to devise a modus vivendi in matters of detail, and so secure the passing of a measure which, in the language of the Speech from the Throne, is “Likely to lead to an increase of contentment and the diminution of political disturbance throughout Ireland.”

There is one part of what I may call the positive portion of the Speech from the Throne to which my hon. and gallant Friend has not referred. It is the proposed measure for facilitating the transaction in Scotland and Ireland of the more important stages of private legislation affecting those countries. No one can doubt that the present system is both costly and inconvenient, and it is to be hoped that the new proposals may meet with general approval. There is no portion of Her Majesty's Speech which affords more food for reflection than that which introduces what I may describe as the contingent portion of the Speech. All the subjects included in this contingent portion are important, and many of them are urgent. It is of the utmost importance that an Act should be passed reforming the system of County Government in Ireland upon principles similar to those which have proved so satisfactory in England and Scotland; it is desirable that the Local Government of those latter countries should be perfected by the establishment of District Councils, and that increased facilities should be given for the acquisition of small parcels of land in Great Britain. The remaining subjects which are referred to are of an even more urgent character and are certainly of vital moment to the wage-earning classes—I mean the amendment of the law of employers' liability, the consolidation and improvement of the law relating to the public health, and, above all, the encouragement of thrift amongst them by increasing the stability of Friendly Societies and Saving Banks. It is indeed strange that there should be any doubt at all that measures apparently so non-contentious should be passed into law. I echo the hope that we are about to enter upon a new era, that the universal desire for information so apparent in previous Sessions may prove less general and less inquisitorial, and that the stern sense of public duty which has hitherto impelled some hon. Members to the frequent delivery of long, eloquent, and discursive orations may be lulled to rest. In the closing words of Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech the duties assigned to us are described as arduous. Doubtless they are so, but their arduous character might be greatly diminished, if not altogether removed, if the House of Commons could be induced to approach the consideration of the several measures which are foreshadowed in Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech in a critical, yet a generous and conciliatory, spirit—measures which I firmly believe, if passed into law, will greatly tend to promote the welfare, the happiness, and the prosperity of the people. I beg to second the Address which has been moved by my hon. and gallant Friend.

(6.30.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I think that my first duty on the present occasion is one that will find an echo—that the words I shall use in relation to it will find an echo in every breast. The language employed by the hon. and gallant Gentleman who moved the Address was received by the House in a manner which not only well justified him in the course which he took, but must assure the right hon. Gentleman who fills with so much dignity and effect the Chair of this House that he has our deepest sympathy in the heavy trial which he is now undergoing. The hon. and gallant Gentleman who moved the Address of thanks and the hon. and learned Gentleman who seconded it have both of them abundantly proved their capacity for the discharge of the important duties committed to them by the Government. They approached the Motion for the Address in an attitude different from that which has been assumed by Movers and Seconders upon former occasions; but I do not intend at the present moment to discuss the change which has been made on the advice of the Government in the form in which the House is invited to consider the Gracious Speech from the Throne. I will only observe that it appears to me that the assumption that no Amendment can be moved to the Address excepting a single Amendment may be found to have an effect that will become perceptible in the tone of the speeches of the Mover and Seconder—that is to say, the effect of giving to them a more warmly laudatory character towards the Government and the measures to be introduced than has been customary on former occasions. I do not know that that will be a very great evil, but that, I think, is one amongst the contingent results of the change that has been adopted. Some words of mine have been quoted on the subject of the Debate on the Address, and I do not question their accuracy, nor do I wish to recede from the sentiments they were intended to express. I think that the prolongation of Debates on the Address has been the cause of great public inconvenience, and before I sit down I hope to say a word or two on the subject. As for myself I have for a long series of years done my best to expedite the proceedings of the House on the Address, and I am of opinion that in the absence of very grave and serious issues, of a vital or broad character, regarded as being fraught with vital consequences by a large portion of the House, it is well that we should take most serious note indeed of the contents of the Speech that Her Majesty may be advised to address to us, but that we should not make its topics the subject of prolonged consideration and debate at that stage. On that principle I have acted myself, and I ought to act upon it upon the present occasion, but I am bound to say that I take that course under difficulties considerably enhanced in consequence of the notice given by the leader of the House to ask for the time of the House until a stage has been reached in the prosecution of certain important measures, or rather groups of measures. I shall, however, go over the topics of the Speech in a manner which I hope will not tend to give rise to the prolonged discussion which I have on former occasions regarded as in the nature of public inconvenience. As usual, the Speech begins by a general reference to the peace of Europe, which, I think, is not a subject upon which it is possible to enter with edification in any detail. We are then informed of several matters, the first relating to certain negotiations with the King of Italy, the second relating to negotiations with Portugal, and the third relating to negotiations on the Newfoundland fishery question, all of which I may compress and bracket together in a single observation. We shall seek no opportunity of captious criticism upon any of these subjects, and we shall give credit to the Government for its good intentions, and even for its performances, until we find cause to question them upon serious and practical ground. But I will notice one or two subjects which do not appear in the paragraphs of the Speech. Nothing is said upon the subject of the question which has arisen with America in regard to the Behring Straits. I take it that I may assume on that account that nothing is in the mind of the Government of a menacing or formidable character, nothing that is likely to interfere with the maintenance of the most friendly relations with that great people of our own blood and kin on the other side of the Atlantic. I intimate no misgiving on the subject; I suggest, on the contrary, that my assumption is the just inference from the silence of Her Majesty's Gracious Speech on this topic, and possibly it may be confirmed by some brief words from the leader of Her Majesty's Government. There is another matter of a painful character which I do not feel able to pass by in silence, although I have no intention of making it a subject of censure upon the proceedings of the Government. I do not say that it was their duty to introduce into the Speech from the Throne on this occasion any notice of the deplorable proceedings which from time to time, and at rather short intervals, we are compelled to take notice of in certain portions of the Turkish Empire. But these events make a deep impression upon the heart and mind of the people of this country, and it is certainly right—I will not say now for Ministers—but it is certainly right for independent Members of Parliament to speak of them in such a manner as will tend to convince the Ottoman

Government that if that Government attaches any value whatever to the moral support or sympathy of this country, it has need to take more care than it has hitherto shown in order to convince the people of this country that that sympathy, if granted, would not be thrown away upon unworthy subjects. I confine myself to expressing an earnest hope that the Government will lose no opportunity which their just influence in Europe may secure for them, either of representing the true state of the case to the Ottoman Government, or of endeavouring to produce, if need be through the influence of other Powers as well as of this country, some impression upon the mind of that Government that may tend to bring about a better state of things and to destroy the force of that unhappy belief that I think the people of England think themselves compelled to entertain from painful experience that the professions, the general declarations, of the Porte with respect to the condition of the people are really of no value, and that nothing but acts of a positive and definite character can avail to inspire into the mind of this nation any desire or disposition whatever to attach value to the continuance of the Ottoman rule in those regions. I am sure there is no disposition unfriendly to that rule; but the desire of the people of this country, I think, is that that rule should be made tolerable to the people over whom it is exercised, so that it may have some promise of permanence in itself and may avoid, without offence to the conscience of Europe, of which of late there has been so much. I do not expect or demand too much from the Government, but I think it might be possible for them to assure the country of their sympathy in desiring that good government and lamenting that it does not exist. Beyond that I do not go. I feel that there is strong objection to threats that are not likely to be fulfilled, and a loss of self-respect in continually addressing persuasive representations to a Power which you have good reason to believe regards them as so much waste paper or wasted breath. Therefore I think it is desirable that it should be understood that a strong feeling prevails in this country as to the circumstances which are from time to time brought to our notice. I am now coming to another matter, simply for the purpose of putting a question to the Government. I cannot say that I expected to see in the Speech from the Throne any reference to all the painful disclosures and painful controversies and contradictions which have appeared in the public journals in such rank abundance within the last few weeks with reference to the circumstances attending the famous expedition of Mr. Stanley. But it is quite obvious that some of these circumstances, through the action of individuals, tend somewhat to compromise the general reputation of this country for humanity. Now I am not minutely acquainted with the position in which the Government has been in relation to that expedition, but I feel that something is to be desired in respect to the repute and credit of England as a humane and Christian country with reference to these controversies, and I should be very glad to know from the Government whether their relations with Mr. Stanley's expedition have been such as are likely to make it their duty to take any step at all either in regard to the 'clearing up of the truth or the adoption of any other measure with reference to this subject. I think the right hon. Gentleman will feel that I am justified in putting an inquiry within these limits. I shall only say a very few words upon the question of the condition of Ireland. The hon. and gallant Gentleman was extremely courteous in his references to myself—and I can assure him that the very last object of desire to a person in my position, when following the Mover and Seconder of the Address, is to find himself in any kind of conflict with them—but the hon. and gallant Gentleman quoted what he thought were certain words of mine delivered in 1880, which, I think, might lead to an erroneous impression; and as he made them the foundation of rather an important argument, I should be glad to know from what source those words were obtained, and whether they were quoted from the authorised edition of my speeches, which, if not verbally accurate, has undoubtedly gone forth to the world with my general sanction. I confess I was under the impression that the words were not quoted from the authorised Report. I do not think the words accurately described the state of Ireland in the winter of 1879 and the spring of 1880. That is, however, a matter personal to myself on which I will not further dwell; but I do not admit the solidity of the basis on which the hon. and gallant Gentleman has made his appeal. I own it is unfortunate that Her Majesty's Government were not content with advising the insertion in the Speech of those words which state an improvement in the condition of Ireland, but that they likewise found it necessary in effect to compliment themselves by the introduction of words relative to the cause of that improvement. Now, the gentlemen of the Treasury Bench know very well that that is a subject of very great and very serious controversy between the two sides of the House, and I am bound to say, first of all, that these words are totally unnecessary; secondly, that if it be the desire of Her Majesty's Government to shorten the Debates on the Address, a rational and legitimate consequence of that desire would be to avoid inserting in the Speech expressions which are in no way necessary for the purpose, and which tend, of themselves, to elicit expression of difference of opinion, and consequently lead to the prolongation of the Debate. I may say that there is another objection to these words, and that is, they are entirely ambiguous. There are those who think that this improvement is due to the Coercion Act, which others regard as a discreditable and disastrous measure. But there are others who think also that this improvement is due in no inconsiderable degree to an Act which, although most unhappily delayed from the autumn of 1886 to the spring of 1887, yet did, in defiance undoubtedly of all the previous declarations of the Government open judicial rents, subject the covenants in leases to reconsideration, and give under circumstances of extreme pressure a very great and necessary relief to the people of Ireland. I do not consider that is a matter on which it is my duty to raise any more serious question, but I must leave the Government in free possession of whatever satisfaction they may enjoy from the compliments they have been able to bestow upon their own management and action. With regard to the subject of distress in Ireland, that is one in respect to which there can be no difference between one side of the House and the other, and I may say, so far as that subject is concerned, I believe that Members of the House in all quarters will be found ready to make sacrifices of the time which they might otherwise be entitled to claim for the purpose of bringing forward public subjects that they think important and to allow the Government a free hand with respect to the prosecution of such measures. It is quite plain that whatever is to be done in this matter ought to be done without a moment's delay. I know not whether it was a defect of my hearing, but I am not sure that I heard amongst the notices given from the Treasury Bench, although I heard proposals as to a Land Purchase Bill and a Tithe Bill—I am not sure that I heard any notice with respect to the introduction of those measures which are contemplated, and which have regard to the immediate relief of the distress. I must own that I think if the Government find such measures to be necessary notices connected with them are notices that ought to have taken precedence of every other. With respect to the Bill for the multiplication of owners, I do not think there is any advantage in my entering upon a detailed consideration of that subject at the present moment. The objects which we have in view are perfectly well known. There is no disposition, and there never has been a disposition, either to state at any length beyond what was strictly requisite the particular objections which we might entertain to particular proposals, or to undervalue any judicious efforts by means of which that subject may be got rid of without delay. It is of very great importance indeed that it should be settled, but when the hon. and gallant Gentleman goes back as he did, and as he may have been justified in doing, to the original Bright clauses of the Land Act of 1870, he must recollect, and the House ought to recollect, that an entire revolution has been introduced into the principle of those clauses by the form the proposals for legislation have taken, perhaps necessarily taken, ever since the Committee of the House of Lords sat upon that question. The principle of the Bright clauses was to encourage the sale of lands by landlords to occupiers in cases where those occupiers gave evidence of their own forethought, industry, and capacity. But the legislation now proposed has assumed a very different character indeed. It deals with the population wholesale. I am not now referring to that as a matter of censure. I do not know that we have any choice in the matter, but the hon. and gallant Gentleman will perceive that, so far as this side of the House is concerned, we have undoubtedly a strong interest in the speedy passing of any measure which can be proposed judiciously with regard to the congested districts in particular, and, indeed, in regard to the subject generally. At the same time, we must reserve to ourselves the right to take such objections as public principle may seem to us to demand. Other objections we should not dream of searching for. With regard to the other Bills of which notice has been given—tithe rent - charge, private legislation, and the measures with respect to compulsory education—I do not think that it is necessary that I should dwell upon them on the present occasion. I must, however, offer a remark upon the great organic or structural change in the composition of the present Speech. I do not wonder that Her Majesty's Government have felt, as every Government has felt before them, that it is unsatisfactory to present to the House of Commons a very long list of measures with regard to which it is impossible, or practically impossible, for the House to deal with them in the time at its disposal. But they have resorted accordingly to an expedient which is certainly peculiar, and which, it appears to me, is not unattended with serious danger. While four measures of importance are presented to us as constituting the real or immediate plan of legislation of the Session, seven other measures of importance are suspended—I will not say dangled in our view in more remote perspective. This is a practice as to which it appears to me—I make no charge against the Government at this moment—it will be impossible to venture a suspicion or entertain any misgiving; but we may have a day when we have a Government of less elevated views, and a Government of less elevated views might in this contingency reason thus: "By putting a long list of measures into this postscript of the Speech"—for it is little more—"we undergo no responsibility and no liability whatever. We do not profess to intend to carry the measures, because they are all of them subject to a contingency, of which contingency we can make use when the proper time comes, and say that the labours of the House have been sufficient, and it is impossible to enter upon a new chapter of legislative work. It may not be necessary for us to have any Bills or plans at all when measures are named in the Speech without any promise that Bills shall be submitted." It is true that the paragraph which relates to the contingent subjects does state that Her Majesty has given directions for the preparation of Bills for certain purposes, but directions for the preparation of Bills do not imply necessarily the immediate obedience to those directions. Obedience to these directions may be postponed until the opportunity is near at hand for the introduction of the Bills. In one instance, indeed, the hon. and gallant Member the Mover of the Address gave us some comfort in relation to this subject, for he assured us that Her Majesty's Government had a Bill ready with reference to Local Government for Ireland. I make no doubt that that was more than a benevolent speculation on the part of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. He must have spoken with authority, and it is not disparaging to him if I say that I hope that the consoling assurance that he gave to us that there is a plan, that there is a measure in actual preparation and ready for our consideration, when we are ready to consider it, will be repeated and countersigned by still higher authority on the Treasury Bench in the course of the evening. I think it would be invidious to go through all the seven very important subjects that are grouped together in this paragraph of contingency, and to ask in each case for a formal answer to my inquiry whether plans—I will not say Bills in all cases—but plans containing all the substance of Bills, are in each and every case provided for the attainment of these benevolent objects. I do point out to the House that there is a serious difficulty in introducing wholesale this practice of reference to contingent measures which may or may not be introduced when it is done on a large scale. I venture to lay it down as a proper rule that, which after all is the old rule, though perhaps it has not been observed by any Party as strictly as it ought to have been observed—I do not think that the Government ought to promise directly or contingently in the Speech of the Queen any measure whatever except such as they think there is a reasonable chance and hope of their being able to introduce. There are few more words it is necessary I should say before I sit down. Unfortunately, there has arisen a serious question, not amounting to a question of veracity, but a serious question of accuracy between my right hon. Friend near me, the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) and a Cabinet Minister. The Government admit that the determination of that question is a subject of very considerable importance, and it is a matter of necessity, I think, that a determination should be arrived at upon it. It involves a great number of different points, of which I may say that the Tipperary trials form the central incident. I will not enumerate the points at the present moment. My right hon. Friend anticipates that in the course of the next week he will be called upon to appear in Ireland as a witness in judicial proceedings in regard to a portion of this matter. He believes—and I think he is right in believing—that upon the whole the discussion of this important collision, so to call it, would be more conveniently taken, not in the form of an addition to the Address, which it would be quite possible to move, but in the form of an appropriate Motion or proposal after the whole question is clear of the judicial proceedings in Ireland. Under these circumstances, I wish to say that my right hon. Friend is disposed to waive any attempt to raise the question on the Address, but he must reserve to himself in that case what, I think, will be felt by all to be a reasonable claim—that is to say, the claim upon the Government to assist him in securing a discussion of the question when, if I may use the homely expression, the stage has been cleared for the purpose by the removal of every thing that would embarrass the issue. He will, therefore, be disposed, if the First Lord of the Treasury will understand that, not to insist upon moving an Amendment to the Address on that question; and if my right hon. Friend is obliged to ask the assistance of the Government in obtaining a solution of the question, I think the right hon. Gentleman opposite will feel it incumbent upon him to afford that assistance, inasmuch as the charge on one side and on the other affects persons of such importance as a Cabinet Minister on that side of the House and my right hon. Friend near me (Mr. J. Morley), who himself has been responsible for the administration of Ireland. Now, upon the important subject of debates on the Address, as I have said, I have, by clearing myself out of this discussion, done what I could on the present occasion to give a practical recommendation that we should be content to follow the older fashion of Parliament, and to refrain from entering upon a wide and extensive field of political discussion, either on topics in the Address, or on other topics which we may think require discussion. But I feel bound to say, and I wish to say it without offence, that I think it is impossible for us to effect a permanent change in anything like a real return to what I believe was the old and salutary practice, as long as the independent Members of this House have to bear in mind that for a series of Sessions, and increasingly from one Session to another, they have been excluded from the field which history and Parliamentary usage have all along assigned to them of a free power to make a considerable demand on the time of the House for the discussion of such proposals as they may think fit to bring under the attention of the House. It is not too much to say that the matter has come to such a point that they have been almost excluded from that power. I was in hopes that the right hon. Gentleman would have given us some assurance—the direct reverse of what he has announced from the Table to-night—an assurance that it was not the intention of the Government, unless in some case of a special and really urgent character, for the general purposes of their legislation, to evade and almost to absorb the time hitherto placed at the disposal of private Members. The right hon. Gentleman says he considers that a case of great urgency has arisen. That urgency is to take the subject of Irish land, the most complicated subject, probably, that can be introduced into Parliament; the subject of tithe, which, though not so complicated, is a very serious one; and the subject of Irish Railways, in so far as the prosecution of these plans is intended for the immediate relief of Irish distress. I take leave to separate the different parts of the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman. I think that, so far as regards Irish Railways, or any measures associated with the relief of immediate distress which Her Majesty's Government may think they require in their public duty to submit to the House of Commons, it will be the duty of every Member of the House of Commons to make the necessary sacrifices for the purpose of giving facilities for those measures of the Government. But what are the measures with regard to land and tithe? I will not deny that, in a certain sense, they may be called urgent measures—measures of importance which have been introduced again and again, and which have certainly not lost their claim in consequence of previous introduction. Her Majesty's Government, however, last year were content to put by those measures and place them virtually on the shelf, for the purpose of introducing to the House, and losing on it 17 days of public time, a plan not indicated beforehand in the Queen's Speech—a plan regarded by us on this side as utterly ruinous with regard to the temperance question of this country, and a plan which, after all that waste of time, the Government refrained from prosecuting in consequence of the reluctance, dissatisfaction, and distrust they found existing among their own majority opposite. That is the real history of it, and it was for that measure that the Land Purchase Bill for Ireland and the Tithe Bill were thrust aside. In consequence of the wanton and gratuitous introduction of that strange scheme of the Government we were called upon to sacrifice the time of the House wholesale, so that this power of private Members has been, I will not say destroyed, but so reduced as to be almost nullified. And now the right hon. Gentleman makes a proposal which I must take the liberty of saying is worse than any proposal I have ever heard on the subject—which is really nothing less than preposterous. He asks us to assign to the question of tithes and of land purchase

in Ireland the character of urgency—urgency which would justify a measure so extreme as to exclude private Members entirely from the business of legislation, until the Government are able to move the Speaker out of the chair upon those three measures. I still adhere to my point with regard to this matter. I do not wish myself to make the intimation of the right hon. Gentleman a ground for now discussing the Address at length, and I tell him, with a pretty strong confidence of being right, that he will never secure an easy and habitual passing of the Address according to the ancient fashion as long as this practice obtains of taking away, on mere pretexts, the rights of private Members, which practice has been pursued for the first time at the instance of the present Government. Neither upon that subject nor upon any other will there be any undue consumption of the time of the House; but when the right hon. Gentleman makes his proposal, and first cuts off a portion of the time of private Members—the fraction of the Session before Christmas, which, I must observe, it is impossible for anyone to define—on the assumption that all these measures will be carried to a certain stage before Christmas, of which it is difficult for him to be absolutely assured—I am bound to say, in view of the nature of the proposal, and in view of the proceedings of former years, that, excepting that part of it which refers to Irish railways, I think the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman will not receive the assent of the House without discussion and division. I wish I could flatter myself that the right hon. Gentleman was likely to give it any sort of re-consideration. I have the greatest objection to these wholesale departures from those ancient traditions of Parliament which were the practical result of long experience continued through centuries, but which have been thrown overboard during the past four or five years, with the consequence, not of doing the public work better, but of doing the public work worse. I tell the right hon. Gentleman, under these circumstances, that he need not expect a silent acquiescence in what appears not only a continuance and repetition, but even an extension of what I cannot describe as anything less than a wanton exercise of power by the majority against the minority in this House. The right hon. Gentleman, I think, cannot expect that so long as any privilege whatever of discussion or debate is given to the Members of this House it will not be reasonably but firmly used in taking objection to a proposal of such a nature.

*(7.15.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Mr. Deputy Speaker, before I refer to the concluding observations of the right hon. Gentleman, it is only right that I should for one moment allude to a subject which has been referred to in regard to which both sides of the House are, I am sure, agreed, and in which both sides are equally and deeply interested. My hon. and gallant Friend behind me (Colonel Kenyon-Slaney) referred in terms of sympathy to the cause of the Speaker's absence. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down only did justice to himself and to the feelings which prevail in all parts of the House in also giving graceful expression to the sympathy of this House. We all hope that he may be speedily restored to health and relieved from anxiety and sorrow. My next duty is to refer to the terms in which the hon. and gallant Gentleman behind me and the hon. and learned Gentleman who seconded the Address discharged their duties. They have given good proof of the ability which distinguishes the younger Members of this House, and of their capacity to take part in the important duties which this House will still have to discharge when the older Members of it pass away. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the change in the form of the Address. I intimated on the part of the Government at the close of last Session that there would be a change in the form of the Address, and that that change would be directed solely with the object of avoiding, as far as possible, raising questions which are contentious at the opening of the Session. The right hon. Gentleman has repeated to-night the statement which he has expressed in the past that the Address should not be made the opportunity for a prolonged discussion, or of delaying the progress of the business of the House. I trust that the good advice he has given and the views that he has expressed with regard to the ancient traditions of the House will be received by hon. Members opposite, above and below the Gangway, with the authority which anything he says conveys to them, and that we shall on this occasion revert to the ancient practice of this House, and one which in times past has tended so much to the advancement of the conduct of public business and the country. I pass on to that portion of the right hon. Gentleman's speech in which I am able to express entire concurrence in the course he has recommended. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the foreign policy of Her Majesty's Government. Undoubtedly it is the fact that peace is preserved and that, as far as we know, it is not likely to be disturbed. We have reason to be thankful for a period of contentment abroad, which augurs well for the prosperity and happiness of the great Empires affected by the political conditions of Europe and of the world. We desire that those better days should continue, for the greatest interest of the world is peace. The right hon. Gentleman also referred to our negotiations with the United States in regard to the Behring's Sea question. We have every hope that those negotiations will progress. They have not advanced very far at the present time, but there is no reason whatever to apprehend any ultimate difficulty in coming to an understanding with a Power with which, undoubtedly, we ought to have, under all circumstances and at all times, the most friendly and cordial relations. There is every desire on the part of Her Majesty's Government to meet the United States of America in the most friendly spirit, and to find terms upon which the difficulty existing between the countries can be satisfactorily settled. The right hon. Gentleman referred in terms of certain warmth to the misgovernment which obtains in some portions of the Ottoman Empire. I was glad to hear him remark that there was no unfriendly disposition entertained towards the Ottoman Empire, but that there was, on the contrary, every disposition to regard that Empire with sympathetic interest if it would take sufficient precautions for the good government of its subjects. We have not failed to show our sympathy with good government in that Empire, but the right hon. Gentleman very wisely referred to the loss of dignity which might result in making frequent representations to any Power where such representations may not receive adequate notice. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that no fitting opportunity has ever been lost by Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople of representing to the Porte that the best interests of Turkey are involved in the good government of its Empire, and that every assistance has been given, so far as the moral weight of the Ambassador of this country is concerned, to aid in the direction of good government. It was possibly through our representations in the case of Moussa Bey that that notorious person has been exiled to a distant part of the Empire, and will be no longer capable of exercising any injurious influence he may have possessed. The right hon. Gentleman asked me a question with regard to the painful allegations which have been made with reference to what is termed the Stanley Expedition in Africa. The right hon. Gentleman asked me to state what the relations of Her Majesty's Government were to that expedition. I can only assure the right hon. Gentleman that Her Majesty's Government had no relations whatever with that expedition. It was an entirely voluntary undertaking on the part of a committee formed for the relief of Emin Pasha, and it was placed, as I understand, entirely under the control of Mr. Stanley himself, who chose his own officers and supporters, and who made, on his own responsibility and on that of the committee, all the arrangements for the expedition. I can only share with the right hon. Gentleman the sorrow which he conveyed that any imputation upon the conduct of Englishmen could be made under the circumstances which have been communicated to the public. I must remind the House, in the first instance, that the Government had no responsibility whatever for the expedition; in the second place, that the two officers who have been implicated by the charges, which may or may not be capable of proof, are dead, and are therefore incapable of making any answer to the charges brought against them; and, in the third place, that we have no control over any persons who could be brought forward as witnesses. It would be a matter of enormous difficulty, if even it were the duty of the Government to institute it,

to conduct such an inquiry of that character, which could not have any satisfactory result. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the terms of the Queen's Speech in reference to Ireland, and he complained that we have spoken in that Speech with satisfaction of the salutary legislation of the last few years. The right hon. Gentleman said that the language of the Speech might include the legislation of the last two or three years. It does include the whole of the legislation of the last two or three years, for which Her Majesty's Government take credit, and which they have been successful in passing through this House. We have reason to believe that the Government of Ireland has advanced and that there has been a marked improvement in the condition of that country, and that that improvement is due to legislation in part of which the right hon. Gentleman entirely concurs, and to part of which, naturally, he objects. I am sorry that he finds fault with the expressions in Her Majesty's Speech under these circumstances, but I am afraid that it would be very difficult for the leaders of an Opposition to be always quite satisfied with the expressions in the Speech from the Throne on matters which are the subject of violent party controversy both in the country and in the House. The right hon. Gentleman gave an assurance for which I am most grateful—that, speaking for himself and for all his friends both above and below the Gangway, all assistance will be given in the passing of any measure which may be necessary for the relief of distress in Ireland. I am happy to say that the distress is not so widespread nor so deep as in the case of former years, and that there is reason to believe that such distress as there is is limited in extent, and that, therefore, the measures we have to propose will not be of that wide or large character which need occupy the time of the House to any considerable extent. We propose, however, to take such steps as may be necessary to insure that no one of Her Majesty's subjects shall be without the means of earning money in order to procure food in that part of the country where exceptional distress may prevail. The steps that we shall take for the relief of distress will be of such a character as will not demoralise the people. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the measure which we propose with regard to the multiplication of holdings, and assured us that no obstructive opposition would be offered to a proposal of this kind. The main principle of the measure is the same as that of the measure submitted to Parliament last Session. It is one on which we believe that it will be possible for the Opposition and ourselves to agree, if hon. and right hon. Gentlemen are really desirous of advancing the interests of the occupiers of land in Ireland. The real question is whether the assurances that have been given of the desire in all parts of the House that the occupier shall be converted into the owner are sincere, or whether a measure of this kind is still to be made the stalking horse of faction and opposition and obstruction. ["Oh, oh!"] I accept the assurance that it is the desire of hon. Members opposite to give effect to their expressions of a wish to benefit the occupier. The right hon. Gentleman referred shortly to the question of private legislation. I am reassured by his observations that we shall have his assistance and the assistance of his friends in any well-considered proposal that may be made to Parliament on that subject. He also referred to the organic change in the Queen's Speech, and said that we had proposed four measures for which we ask immediate consideration, and seven others that are purely contingent, and that might not be found in a state of legislative preparation at all. He added that the only undertaking on the part of the Government with regard to these measures was that they might be prepared at some future time, if Parliament found time to deal with them. I must remind the right hon. Gentleman that several of these measures have already been before Parliament, have been printed, and have been read a second time. Therefore the right hon. Gentleman may dismiss from his mind any apprehension that may exist so far as the preparation of the greater portion of these measures is concerned. We had to consider whether we were justified in putting into the Speech a list of measures which experience has proved to us we could not certainly pass, or ask Parliament to pass, in the course of the present Session, if the debates are to be continued at the length of the debates which have taken place during the last three or four Sessions. We are, however, convinced that it would be possible for Parliament to pass, not, perhaps, the whole, but certainly a large proportion of the measures in the Speech, if we could return to the old way, and give something like fair and reasonable consideration and criticism to the proposals made on this side of the House, and if there was a clear and earnest desire on the part of Parliament to pass those measures. But, if we are met by continued debates and protracted discussion, it is obviously not the fault of Government, or of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian; but, collectively, it is the misfortune of Parliament, that individual Members make it practically impossible to proceed with legislation which the country desires. That is my answer to the right hon. Gentleman. Many of these measures are actually in type, and could be produced to-morrow.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Local Government for Ireland?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I should be very happy to give to the right hon. Gentleman a draft of the Local Government Bill for Ireland. Let us first pass the four measures we have indicated, and then, if the right hon. Gentleman will give his assistance, and will make no complaint that we are taking too large a portion of the time of private Members, I shall be exceedingly glad to hand to him a draft of the Local Government Bill for Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman addressed to me a question with regard to the difficulties that have arisen between the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) and the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He said that there were questions of fact involved on which the right hon. Gentleman would think it necessary to raise a debate. I understand the proposal to be that no debate shall arise on this question on the Address, but that at a later period an opportunity shall be afforded to the right hon. Gentleman to challenge the judgment of the House upon the action and language of the Chief Secretary.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne: My right hon. Friend meant, and I mean, something much wider and of a less purely personal nature than that. I mean a Motion criticising the administration of the law in Ireland, with special reference to events in Tipperary.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I repeated what I understood the right hon. Gentleman to have stated, and I am glad that I have given to the right. Gentleman an opportunity to make perfectly clear the object of his intended Motion. Certainly we will find a fitting opportunity for him to make any Motion of that character. It is obvious that a Motion of censure—for it amounts to that—on the Chief Secretary is a Motion that the Government ought certainly to meet. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the debate on the Address, and expressed a wish that it might not be unduly prolonged. I can assure him that I go with him most heartily and entirely on that question. Parliament has lost a great deal by prolonging debates on the Address. Such prolongations have had a most disastrous effect upon the business and the reputation of the House. The right hon. Gentleman finds fault with me for taking the time of private Members, without appearing to perceive that the necessity has been forced upon the Government by prolonged debates on the Address that have lasted ten days or a fortnight, and on one occasion three weeks. This waste of time shuts out private Members from opportunities that they would have had of discussing their Motions, and of considering their Bills. No one in this House desires more than I do to return to the old way. On the first indication on the part of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite that they are inclined to give reasonable facilities for the consideration of Government measures, I shall be the very first to return to the old-fashioned way of giving to private Members the time that they had in the past. But if the right hon. Gentleman found himself in my position, and had to meet the difficulties that have been put in the way of our measures, he would have been compelled to take the same course. The right hon. Gentleman has complained that I am about to introduce a Motion which is unprecedented and severe in its character. I explained to the House why it was that I thought it right to ask this concession from the House. I think it is for the convenience of private Members that progress should be made with the important measures of the Session, so that it may be possible to give to private Members the time that they should have. If we make no progress before the short Christmas holiday it may be possible to take, it must be obvious to the right hon. Gentleman and to the country that we shall be compelled to ask the House to sacrifice the time which we most earnestly desire to avoid. It is for the House itself to find the time and private Membersought to possess it. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the events of last Session. I do not think it is desirable to refer to them with the view to considering what is to be the course of business this Session. Last Session we had angry and prolonged debates. The right hon. Gentleman said that proposals were made that were totally unnecessary, and that were not referred to in the Queen's Speech. That controversy has been gone into over and over again, and I will not say of it more than this, that the proposals of the Government were made by them with a deep sense of their responsibility, and with the desire of advancing temperance. We believed that we should secure the support of every one interested and desirous to increase habits of temperance among the people. We failed—we acknowledge we failed—after a struggle which was protracted in a degree unknown almost to Parliamentary practice, which had the effect of delaying the consideration of measures which we thought necessary in the last Session of Parliament, and which resulted in our asking Parliament to come together in November. Well, Sir, I trust that nothing I may say will increase the bitterness of party controversy. It is as far as possible from my desire to do anything of the kind; and I trust we may have in this Session the support not only of our own friends behind us in the consideration of the measures which we believe to be necessary in the interests of the country, and especially of those who are supposed to be the clients of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. We believe that our measures are conceived in the interests of the people at large; we believe that they are free from any desire to prop up party or sectional interests; we believe that they are for the good of the country; and we therefore ask, and I hope we shall not ask in vain, for the hearty support of those who trust us, and for fair, moderate, and reasonable criticism only from those who generally differ from us.

* (7.50.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to intrude at any great length upon the House. There are one or two things which have been said by the Chancellor of the Exchequer during the recess, and by the First Lord of the Treasury, which require a word or two from private Members. I understand that the case presented for claiming the full time of the House is that measures have been obstructed from this side of the House, so that the Government have had the necessity forced upon them of doing what they now propose to do. The Chancellor of the Exchequer recently referred among other measures to the Employers' Liability Bill, and to the Government proposals respecting Friendly Societies. I avow that I was astounded when I read the observations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I imagined that he must have been mis-reported. Because in the whole time of the present Parliament the measure to amend and make permanent the Employers' Liability Act has not occupied two nights. Something was done in Grand Committee, it is true, but it in no way delayed the proceedings here. One year the Bill was not introduced at all. Another year, when it was printed, we saw nothing of it. It is a little too audacious to put this Bill forward as an obstructed measure.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I am confident that the hon. Member is under a misapprehension, or has misread the report. I never spoke of any obstruction upon the Employers' Liability Bill.

* MR. BRADLAUGH: I have no doubt it is a misreading of the report on my part, but I gave some attention to the subject, and I thought that the matter was urged as one of the illustrations of the measures which the Government had tried to carry, and had been prevented from carrying by obstruction of them. Certainly, though I may have been under a misapprehension, the Friendly Societies Bill seemed to fall into the same category. I am glad, however, to accept the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman, and it is a satisfaction to know from him that the Employers' Liability Bill was not one of those obstructed. If that is true, then it is also true that the Government have been lacking in their duty to the working classes specially affected, because it is a measure which should have been dealt with, but with regard to which during two Sessions past not a word has been said. Words falling from the Chancellor of the Exchequer have much more effect than words falling from a man like myself, and I think he ought expressly to have mentioned that this was one of the Bills as to which all fault laid with the Government, who had not in any fashion endeavoured to bring it before the House for at least three years.

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member misunderstands me on this point. I have never charged, so far as I can remember, any obstruction on the Employers' Liability Bill. The argument to which the hon. Member probably refers, is that the general delay of business which took place in the House, that which I call obstruction, prevented our passing Bills which we had at hand. I did not say, certainly, that these two particular measures had been obstructed.

* MR. BRADLAUGH: When I spoke at Manchester, a few hours after the right hon. Gentleman had spoken on the question of obstruction, I suggested that the Government, having a large majority at their back, had been probably obstructed, either because they did not want particularly to carry the measures which were obstructed, or because they introduced more measures than their own followers desired should be considered, or because they were incapable of handling the powerful weapons they had forged for the purpose of overcoming obstruction. That last, of course, is an impossible supposition, and I said so at the time. I would suggest that it would be a little more in good taste if supporters of the Government were not so reckless in making charges of obstruction. Another Member of Her Majesty's Government has spoken during the recess of the number of questions put to Ministers in this House, and has suggested that those questions had better be put in writing and sent to the different Ministers to whom they are intended to be addressed. I will here offer the House a sample of the experience I have had in this direction during the last few weeks. I am always ready to accept any suggestion coming from the Treasury Bench as far as possible, and in fact it is sometimes said that I am a little too ready to do so. At any rate I adopted this suggestion at once, and accordingly addressed to the Department to which it has been my duty and will continue to be my duty to address a large number of questions, to some of which answers had been promised as far back as March and April last year, an inquiry with regard to which the House will be amused to hear that in reply to that communication I received from the Minister to whom it was addressed, a letter informing me that I might raise the subject by an Amendment to the Address, by which method it could be fully discussed. [Sir J. GORST expressed dissent.] I quote from memory, but I will try to state exactly what that letter conveyed. In reply to the question I thus put I was told that I could bring the matter forward by way of an Amendment to the Address, and that the Secretary of State considered that that would be the most fitting occasion for obtaining a reply.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The hon. Member was good enough in the early part of the recess to give me notice that he intended to raise by way of Amendment to the Address the question of the indigo riots in Jessore. The letter referred to was subsequently addressed to me, and I replied to it saying that it asked for information on a subject as to which the Secretary of State did not think it expedient that he should enter into a discussion with the hon. Member, seeing that hon. Member had already announced his intention to bring the subject before the House of Commons on a specified occasion. At the same time, I said that the Secretary of State was prepared to give the hon. Member information on any points of detail as to which he might care to ask. I wish the hon. Member would read my letter.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I shall have great pleasure in bringing the letter down and reading it to-morrow in order to make the matter perfectly clear. It shows how mis-impressions will occur, not only as to speeches made and reported, but as to letters received and misunderstood. It shows, too, the necessity of sometimes having questions put across the floor of the House, where there can be no mistake about them. At any rate, as the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for India has done me the honour to correct me, it will be within his recollection, and within the recollection of such of the House as take an interest in the matter, or care to go to Hansard for information, that the very questions on which he says, as I understand now, that it is fair I should have information, were questions put to him early last year—questions repeated and pressed upon his attention, I think on one occasion with some disposition on my part to resort to the forms of the House, of which I should have availed myself with some reluctance. If it were not that I know that the right hon. Gentleman is never guilty of anything like a sneer or jest, to refer me to an Amendment on the Address for the information I am seeking would seem to be making a mock of me. Last Session I refrained from debating Indian matters on the Address; I refrained from speaking on them at all, on the distinct pledge and understanding with the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury that at any rate one night should be afforded to me for that purpose—afforded to me on the Second Reading of the Bill, introduced by the Government, in the House of Lords, and which was to be brought down to this House before Easter, and which, though brought down, was never brought on here from the first day of the Session to the last. There is no pretence of saying that the Indian Councils Bill was obstructed. If anything, I was constantly pressing the Government to bring it forward. I had their distinct pledge that it should be brought forward, and it never came. And I have this further difficulty, that it is only with Mr. Speaker in the Chair that there is any chance of challenging the Government on the gross illegality of their conduct every year since they have been in office, and which may be repeated on that matter this year. I mean the absolutely distinct Statute which requires the Indian Government to lay on the Table of the House, during the first fourteen days of May, certain information. The Statute requires them specifically to do it. I have asked about it, and my question is evaded. If the debate on the Address is objected to, there is no opportunity of fairly raising the subject. No resolution about it would be pertinent on the presentation of the financial statement. The Government is content to break the law itself now, and there is no reasonable means of punishing it. The India Office is an office over which we have not the same control as we have over every other department of the State, namely, for when salaries affecting other departments are voted we can make them the subject of criticism. But in the case of the India Office the matter is dismissed with a good humoured laugh at the end of the Session. Again, while even Members of Parliament we now know are in gaol for breaches of law not more specific than those of which I complain, I do think that the Government which is so strong in enforcing the law at one place, might be not less decent in obedience to it themselves here. There is no reference in the gracious Speech from the Throne which will show whether the Government intend to take any steps whatever to submit to this House any kind of legislation in reference to the amendment of the India Councils Act; which they last Session declared particularly requires amendment. I trust we shall not be driven (as driven we seem to be) to raise Indian questions by Motions for the Adjournment of the House, which are unpleasant to the Members who have to move them. But still we have no other resources left to us when the Government actually defy the law and make no effort whatever to fulfil it. As I understood that it is the wish of the House, and that an arrangement has been made between the Front Benches that no debate shall now take place on that portion of the Speech which relates to Ireland, I will only say one word in reference to the observations of the First Lord of the Treasury when, in reply to a remark by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, made across the Table, he said he should be pleased to show him a draft of the Local Government Bill. That Bill was solemnly promised by the right hon. Baronet the Member for one of the divisions of Bristol at the close of the year 1886 to be introduced in the year 1887. It was promised as a measure of local government to be framed on a popular basis, but in all probability that will always be in draft, and will never be presented. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer—

and it is possible that again I may have misunderstood him—said the Bill would be introduced when the country was in a fair state of quietude. Of course, the reporters may have done the right hon. Gentleman an injustice, or my appreciation of the meaning of his words may have been imperfect, but still I did understand the words thus put into the mouth of Her Majesty last Session to be a declaration that the country was in a fair state of quietness. Now we are told it is still better, and I do think it is a little too much that these statements should be made year after year without any effort being made to fulfil the Government pledges. I shall reserve what I have to say as to the taking away of the time of private Members until the First Lord makes his Motion on the subject, but I now ask the Government in common decency to say—what the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India would not say when he was making his financial statement last year—I ask them to say now in this House—for I warn them that I shall take some means of making this the subject of debate, whether the time of private Members is taken away or not—I ask them to say what are the reasons for their absolute disobedience of the law for the last four years in not duly submitting the statistics of the moral and material progress of India which they are called upon to submit annually, and I wish to know further whether they are going to obey the law this year, and if they will do so in the time fixed by the Statute? If not it shall not be my fault if the Government undertake other business of importance before the House at least expresses an opinion upon this subject. I know it is futile to expect answers now to questions upon matters relating to India of which I have only had the advantage within the last few moments of receiving information. I have had a number of documents sent me, but I am not sure that I am at liberty to refer to them. I am told that some were sent to me for my private information only, and I am placed in a somewhat unfair position both towards those for whom I speak and towards the House itself, because those documents are documents which passed between Departments of the State on matters affecting the liberty of the subject, and

I submit that they ought to have been laid upon the Table of the House. I trust that the Under Secretary of State for India will give me some pledges that if I move for Papers relating to the cases of Warburton and Luson they will be granted. If I do not receive some such pledge I shall take legitimate means of raising the question.

*SIR J. GORST: As the hon. Member has so pointedly referred to me, perhaps the House will allow me to make a few observations. The hon. Member asked me a number of questions last year upon details of Indian administration—questions based upon information which he had received from an ex parte source. I was unable to answer at the time, because, as the House will understand, all the details of Indian Government are not necessarily reported to the Secretary of State. Those who are dissatisfied with any Act of the Government are of course at liberty to send garbled statements to hon. Members of this House, but it is impossible for the Secretary of State to be always prepared with full particulars on all points of detail so as to be able at once to provide information on any question raised. The hon. Member, in the recess, sent me a letter, saying that he did so in consequence of suggestions of the First Lord of the Treasury, and in it he asked me to give him an answer on certain points. I think I may say that I sent an answer which generally showed that the information upon which he had asked questions during the last Session of Parliament was wholly erroneous, and gave a false idea of the circumstances referred to in those questions. There was undoubtedly one question with regard to some riots which took place at Jessore, in India, between indigo planters and their employés, upon which, by directions of the Secretary of State, I withheld from him information I possessed on the ground that the hon. Member for Northampton had given formal notice that he intended to raise a discussion upon this matter in the House of Commons by way of Amendment to the Address, and that, therefore, it was not convenient that I should enter into a discussion with him upon isolated and particular facts regarding a question which was ultimately to become the subject of general debate. But I accompanied the refusal with an intimation to the hon. Member that if there was any point in connection with the case upon which he desired to have information, such information should be most freely accorded him. I think I have made it clear to the House that the hon. Member has no ground whatever for complaint as to the information which he received from the Department. Now he says that the information which he desires is contained in formal despatches from the Government of India, and he complains that those despatches have not been published. The reason why those despatches have not been published is that it was desired to avoid garbled extracts being published. I do not for one moment intend to suggest that the hon. Member himself would have given out garbled extracts, but there are gentlemen who might do so with the view and result of leading to direct misrepresentation, and therefore the Secretary of State thought it undesirable that any of the despatches should be made public, unless they were first properly moved for in this House.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: If I move for Papers with regard to the Warburton and Luson cases, will they be laid on the Table?

*SIR J. GORST: If the hon. Member desires to have these despatches, and will place a Notice of Motion on the Paper, I will promise to give him all despatches that can properly be made public. With regard to the discovery which the hon. Member made last Session about the breach of the law, which he intimates renders the Secretary of State and his subordinates liable to imprisonment and punishment for deliberate violation of the law, I must say that the discovery does credit to the legal acumen of the hon. Member. The section he refers to is contained in the Government of India Act, 1858, and it requires that certain information shall be laid upon the Table of the House within fourteen days of the 1st day of May in every year when Parliament is sitting. Now that is a proviso which, I am sorry to say, has been neglected from the very first. Except, perhaps, in one or two accidental cases, the information has never been laid on the Table within the time prescribed by law. My attention was first called to it by the hon. Member in the course of last Session, and, anxious as I am sure the Secretary of State is above all men to formally observe the law, he is determined to obey it in the coming year, and consequently in 1891 every effort will be made to comply as far as possible with the letter of the Statute. But I am sorry to say that the Return which Parliament requires to be laid on the Table is founded on information which has to be obtained from India, and it is not absolutely easy, now that the Government of our Indian Empire has so vastly developed itself, to obtain the information in time to lay the Returns on the Table at the date specified in the Act. I know that a few years ago, in consequence of a complaint made specially, I believe, by the hon. Member himself, as well as by other Members, of the late period at which Indian finances were ordinarily discussed, an effort was made to get the information respecting the finances of India laid upon the Table of the House at the earliest possible date. Great pressure was put upon all the Departments of the Government in India to send the information, but, notwithstanding that pressure, it was not available before some time in June. I am, therefore, afraid that it may be impossible to get the information to which the hon. Member refers ready for presentation earlier than in June. I can only repeat that I am sure that every effort will be made to comply with the Act so far as possible; but there is a danger that if an attempt is made to get the information ready by a fixed time it will not be nearly so complete, accurate, and perfect, as the Government of India and the Secretary of State desire. It is also worthy of note that on the occasion when the Government made such strenuous efforts to get particulars of Indian finance laid on the Table of the House early in the Session, the House never found time to discuss the subject until the very end of the Session, and thus the efforts made to secure the early information were entirely thrown away. Again I can only say I am sure that every effort will be made in the coming year to obtain as early as possible the information as to which the hon. Member is so anxious. (8.30.)

term "assisted education" is not used' but—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*(8.48.) MR. S. SMITH: The paragraph in the Speech to which I wish to call attention reads as follows:—

"Your attention will be invited to the expediency of alleviating the burden which the law of compulsory education has in recent years imposed upon the poorer portion of my people."

This language is not particularly pellucid, but in a general sense it can pretty well be understood. I suppose that what is really intended is the introduction of a scheme of what we call free education, that is, the removal of fees in elementary schools. We on this side of the House welcome the principle of free elementary education. I believe there will be no opposition whatever to the adoption of the principle. We believe that, upon the whole, free education will be a great boon to the poorer population of the country, and that it will tend in a very marked degree to the advance of education itself. But while I say that, I wish to point out to the Government that we shall reserve the right to criticise very closely the means by which they propose to give effect to the principle of free education. It is not unlikely that very serious differences of opinion may arise in the House before the principle can be carried into law, and I think it is only fair some of us should give an indication to the Government of certain conditions which will be necessary to give effect to this paragraph if it is to be received with anything like cordiality on this side of the House. In the first place, if the Government propose, as I have no doubt they do propose, to free the standards both in denominational and undenominational schools, there will be a very strong determination on this side of the House to secure some species of representative control of the voluntary or denominational schools. It will be proposed that a very large extra grant of public money be made both to Board and voluntary schools, a grant, I understand, amounting to something like 10s. per head. That will increase the Government grant by something like 60 per cent. beyond what it is now. If this great additional grant be

can be introduced into Parliament; the subject of tithe, which, though not so complicated, is a very serious one; and the subject of Irish Railways, in so far as the prosecution of these plans is intended for the immediate relief of Irish distress. I take leave to separate the different parts of the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman. I think that, so far as regards Irish Railways, or any measures associated with the relief of immediate distress which Her Majesty's Government may think they require in their public duty to submit to the House of Commons, it will be the duty of every Member of the House of Commons to make the necessary sacrifices for the purpose of giving facilities for those measures of the Government. But what are the measures with regard to land and tithe? I will not deny that, in a certain sense, they may be called urgent measures—measures of importance which have been introduced again and again, and which have certainly not lost their claim in consequence of previous introduction. Her Majesty's Government, however, last year were content to put by those measures and place them virtually on the shelf, for the purpose of introducing to the House, and losing on it 17 days of public time, a plan not indicated beforehand in the Queen's Speech—a plan regarded by us on this side as utterly ruinous with regard to the temperance question of this country, and a plan which, after all that waste of time, the Government refrained from prosecuting in consequence of the reluctance, dissatisfaction, and distrust they found existing among their own majority opposite. That is the real history of it, and it was for that measure that the Land Purchase Bill for Ireland and the Tithe Bill were thrust aside. In consequence of the wanton and gratuitous introduction of that strange scheme of the Government we were called upon to sacrifice the time of the House wholesale, so that this power of private Members has been, I will not say destroyed, but so reduced as to be almost nullified. And now the right hon. Gentleman makes a proposal which I must take the liberty of saying is worse than any proposal I have ever heard on the subject—which is really nothing less than preposterous. He asks us to assign to the question of tithes and of land purchase

in Ireland the character of urgency—urgency which would justify a measure so extreme as to exclude private Members entirely from the business of legislation, until the Government are able to move the Speaker out of the chair upon those three measures. I still adhere to my point with regard to this matter. I do not wish myself to make the intimation of the right hon. Gentleman a ground for now discussing the Address at length, and I tell him, with a pretty strong confidence of being right, that he will never secure an easy and habitual passing of the Address according to the ancient fashion as long as this practice obtains of taking away, on mere pretexts, the rights of private Members, which practice has been pursued for the first time at the instance of the present Government. Neither upon that subject nor upon any other will there be any undue consumption of the time of the House; but when the right hon. Gentleman makes his proposal, and first cuts off a portion of the time of private Members—the fraction of the Session before Christmas, which, I must observe, it is impossible for anyone to define—on the assumption that all these measures will be carried to a certain stage before Christmas, of which it is difficult for him to be absolutely assured—I am bound to say, in view of the nature of the proposal, and in view of the proceedings of former years, that, excepting that part of it which refers to Irish railways, I think the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman will not receive the assent of the House without discussion and division. I wish I could flatter myself that the right hon. Gentleman was likely to give it any sort of re-consideration. I have the greatest objection to these wholesale departures from those ancient traditions of Parliament which were the practical result of long experience continued through centuries, but which have been thrown overboard during the past four or five years, with the consequence, not of doing the public work better, but of doing the public work worse. I tell the right hon. Gentleman, under these circumstances, that he need not expect a silent acquiescence in what appears not only a continuance and repetition, but even an extension of what I cannot describe as anything less than a wanton exercise of power by the majority against the minority in this House. The right hon. Gentleman, I think, cannot expect that so long as any privilege whatever of discussion or debate is given to the Members of this House it will not be reasonably but firmly used in taking objection to a proposal of such a nature.

*(7.15.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Mr. Deputy Speaker, before I refer to the concluding observations of the right hon. Gentleman, it is only right that I should for one moment allude to a subject which has been referred to in regard to which both sides of the House are, I am sure, agreed, and in which both sides are equally and deeply interested. My hon. and gallant Friend behind me (Colonel Kenyon-Slaney) referred in terms of sympathy to the cause of the Speaker's absence. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down only did justice to himself and to the feelings which prevail in all parts of the House in also giving graceful expression to the sympathy of this House. We all hope that he may be speedily restored to health and relieved from anxiety and sorrow. My next duty is to refer to the terms in which the hon. and gallant Gentleman behind me and the hon. and learned Gentleman who seconded the Address discharged their duties. They have given good proof of the ability which distinguishes the younger Members of this House, and of their capacity to take part in the important duties which this House will still have to discharge when the older Members of it pass away. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the change in the form of the Address. I intimated on the part of the Government at the close of last Session that there would be a change in the form of the Address, and that that change would be directed solely with the object of avoiding, as far as possible, raising questions which are contentious at the opening of the Session. The right hon. Gentleman has repeated to-night the statement which he has expressed in the past that the Address should not be made the opportunity for a prolonged discussion, or of delaying the progress of the business of the House. I trust that the good advice he has given and the views that he has expressed with regard to the ancient traditions of the House will be received by hon. Members opposite, above and below the Gangway, with the authority which anything he says conveys to them, and that we shall on this occasion revert to the ancient practice of this House, and one which in times past has tended so much to the advancement of the conduct of public business and the country. I pass on to that portion of the right hon. Gentleman's speech in which I am able to express entire concurrence in the course he has recommended. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the foreign policy of Her Majesty's Government. Undoubtedly it is the fact that peace is preserved and that, as far as we know, it is not likely to be disturbed. We have reason to be thankful for a period of contentment abroad, which augurs well for the prosperity and happiness of the great Empires affected by the political conditions of Europe and of the world. We desire that those better days should continue, for the greatest interest of the world is peace. The right hon. Gentleman also referred to our negotiations with the United States in regard to the Behring's Sea question. We have every hope that those negotiations will progress. They have not advanced very far at the present time, but there is no reason whatever to apprehend any ultimate difficulty in coming to an understanding with a Power with which, undoubtedly, we ought to have, under all circumstances and at all times, the most friendly and cordial relations. There is every desire on the part of Her Majesty's Government to meet the United States of America in the most friendly spirit, and to find terms upon which the difficulty existing between the countries can be satisfactorily settled. The right hon. Gentleman referred in terms of certain warmth to the misgovernment which obtains in some portions of the Ottoman Empire. I was glad to hear him remark that there was no unfriendly disposition entertained towards the Ottoman Empire, but that there was, on the contrary, every disposition to regard that Empire with sympathetic interest if it would take sufficient precautions for the good government of its subjects. We have not failed to show our sympathy with good government in that Empire, but the right hon. Gentleman very wisely referred to the loss of dignity which might result in making frequent representations to any Power where such representations may not receive adequate notice. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that no fitting opportunity has ever been lost by Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople of representing to the Porte that the best interests of Turkey are involved in the good government of its Empire, and that every assistance has been given, so far as the moral weight of the Ambassador of this country is concerned, to aid in the direction of good government. It was possibly through our representations in the case of Moussa Bey that that notorious person has been exiled to a distant part of the Empire, and will be no longer capable of exercising any injurious influence he may have possessed. The right hon. Gentleman asked me a question with regard to the painful allegations which have been made with reference to what is termed the Stanley Expedition in Africa. The right hon. Gentleman asked me to state what the relations of Her Majesty's Government were to that expedition. I can only assure the right hon. Gentleman that Her Majesty's Government had no relations whatever with that expedition. It was an entirely voluntary undertaking on the part of a committee formed for the relief of Emin Pasha, and it was placed, as I understand, entirely under the control of Mr. Stanley himself, who chose his own officers and supporters, and who made, on his own responsibility and on that of the committee, all the arrangements for the expedition. I can only share with the right hon. Gentleman the sorrow which he conveyed that any imputation upon the conduct of Englishmen could be made under the circumstances which have been communicated to the public. I must remind the House, in the first instance, that the Government had no responsibility whatever for the expedition; in the second place, that the two officers who have been implicated by the charges, which may or may not be capable of proof, are dead, and are therefore incapable of making any answer to the charges brought against them; and, in the third place, that we have no control over any persons who could be brought forward as witnesses. It would be a matter of enormous difficulty, if even it were the duty of the Government to institute it,

to conduct such an inquiry of that character, which could not have any satisfactory result. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the terms of the Queen's Speech in reference to Ireland, and he complained that we have spoken in that Speech with satisfaction of the salutary legislation of the last few years. The right hon. Gentleman said that the language of the Speech might include the legislation of the last two or three years. It does include the whole of the legislation of the last two or three years, for which Her Majesty's Government take credit, and which they have been successful in passing through this House. We have reason to believe that the Government of Ireland has advanced and that there has been a marked improvement in the condition of that country, and that that improvement is due to legislation in part of which the right hon. Gentleman entirely concurs, and to part of which, naturally, he objects. I am sorry that he finds fault with the expressions in Her Majesty's Speech under these circumstances, but I am afraid that it would be very difficult for the leaders of an Opposition to be always quite satisfied with the expressions in the Speech from the Throne on matters which are the subject of violent party controversy both in the country and in the House. The right hon. Gentleman gave an assurance for which I am most grateful—that, speaking for himself and for all his friends both above and below the Gangway, all assistance will be given in the passing of any measure which may be necessary for the relief of distress in Ireland. I am happy to say that the distress is not so widespread nor so deep as in the case of former years, and that there is reason to believe that such distress as there is is limited in extent, and that, therefore, the measures we have to propose will not be of that wide or large character which need occupy the time of the House to any considerable extent. We propose, however, to take such steps as may be necessary to insure that no one of Her Majesty's subjects shall be without the means of earning money in order to procure food in that part of the country where exceptional distress may prevail. The steps that we shall take for the relief of distress will be of such a character as will not demoralise the people. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the measure which we propose with regard to the multiplication of holdings, and assured us that no obstructive opposition would be offered to a proposal of this kind. The main principle of the measure is the same as that of the measure submitted to Parliament last Session. It is one on which we believe that it will be possible for the Opposition and ourselves to agree, if hon. and right hon. Gentlemen are really desirous of advancing the interests of the occupiers of land in Ireland. The real question is whether the assurances that have been given of the desire in all parts of the House that the occupier shall be converted into the owner are sincere, or whether a measure of this kind is still to be made the stalking horse of faction and opposition and obstruction. ["Oh, oh!"] I accept the assurance that it is the desire of hon. Members opposite to give effect to their expressions of a wish to benefit the occupier. The right hon. Gentleman referred shortly to the question of private legislation. I am reassured by his observations that we shall have his assistance and the assistance of his friends in any well-considered proposal that may be made to Parliament on that subject. He also referred to the organic change in the Queen's Speech, and said that we had proposed four measures for which we ask immediate consideration, and seven others that are purely contingent, and that might not be found in a state of legislative preparation at all. He added that the only undertaking on the part of the Government with regard to these measures was that they might be prepared at some future time, if Parliament found time to deal with them. I must remind the right hon. Gentleman that several of these measures have already been before Parliament, have been printed, and have been read a second time. Therefore the right hon. Gentleman may dismiss from his mind any apprehension that may exist so far as the preparation of the greater portion of these measures is concerned. We had to consider whether we were justified in putting into the Speech a list of measures which experience has proved to us we could not certainly pass, or ask Parliament to pass, in the course of the present Session, if the debates are to be continued at the length of the debates which have taken place during the last three or four Sessions. We are, however, convinced that it would be possible for Parliament to pass, not, perhaps, the whole, but certainly a large proportion of the measures in the Speech, if we could return to the old way, and give something like fair and reasonable consideration and criticism to the proposals made on this side of the House, and if there was a clear and earnest desire on the part of Parliament to pass those measures. But, if we are met by continued debates and protracted discussion, it is obviously not the fault of Government, or of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian; but, collectively, it is the misfortune of Parliament, that individual Members make it practically impossible to proceed with legislation which the country desires. That is my answer to the right hon. Gentleman. Many of these measures are actually in type, and could be produced to-morrow.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Local Government for Ireland!

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I should be very happy to give to the right hon. Gentleman a draft of the Local Government Bill for Ireland. Let us first pass the four measures we have indicated, and then, if the right hon. Gentleman will give his assistance, and will make no complaint that we are taking too large a portion of the time of private Members, I shall be exceedingly glad to hand to him a draft of the Local Government Bill for Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman addressed to me a question with regard to the difficulties that have arisen between the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) and the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He said that there were questions of fact involved on which the right hon. Gentleman would think it necessary to raise a debate. I understand the proposal to be that no debate shall arise on this question on the Address, but that at a later period an opportunity shall be afforded to the right hon. Gentleman to challenge the judgment of the House upon the action and language of the Chief Secretary.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne: My right hon. Friend meant, and I mean, something much wider and of a less purely personal nature than that. I mean a Motion criticising the administration of the law in Ireland, with special reference to events in Tipperary.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I repeated what I understood the right hon. Gentleman to have stated, and I am glad that I have given to the right. Gentleman an opportunity to make perfectly clear the object of his intended Motion. Certainly we will find a fitting opportunity for him to make any Motion of that character. It is obvious that a Motion of censure—for it amounts to that—on the Chief Secretary is a Motion that the Government ought certainly to meet. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the debate on the Address, and expressed a wish that it might not be unduly prolonged. I can assure him that I go with him most heartily and entirely on that question. Parliament has lost a great deal by prolonging debates on the Address. Such prolongations have had a most disastrous effect upon the business and the reputation of the House. The right hon. Gentleman finds fault with me for taking the time of private Members, without appearing to perceive that the necessity has been forced upon the Government by prolonged debates on the Address that have lasted ten days or a fortnight, and on one occasion three weeks. This waste of time shuts out private Members from opportunities that they would have had of discussing their Motions, and of considering their Bills. No one in this House desires more than I do to return to the old way. On the first indication on the part of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite that they are inclined to give reasonable facilities for the consideration of Government measures, I shall be the very first to return to the old-fashioned way of giving to private Members the time that they had in the past. But if the right hon. Gentleman found himself in my position, and had to meet the difficulties that have been put in the way of our measures, he would have been compelled to take the same course. The right hon. Gentleman has complained that I am about to introduce a Motion which is unprecedented and severe in its character. I explained to the House why it was that I thought it right to ask this concession from the House. I think it is for the convenience of private Members that progress should be made with the important measures of the Session, so that it may be possible to give to private Members the time that they should have. If we make no progress before the short Christmas holiday it may be possible to take, it must be obvious to the right hon. Gentleman and to the country that we shall be compelled to ask the House to sacrifice, the time which we most earnestly desire to avoid. It is for the House itself to find the time and private Membersought to possess it. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the events of last Session. I do not think it is desirable to refer to them with the view to considering what is to be the course of business this Session. Last Session we had angry and prolonged debates. The right hon. Gentleman said that proposals were made that were totally unnecessary, and that were not referred to in the Queen's Speech. That controversy has been gone into over and over again, and I will not say of it more than this, that the proposals of the Government were made by them with a deep sense of their responsibility, and with the desire of advancing temperance. We believed that we should secure the support of every one interested and desirous to increase habits of temperance among the people. We failed—we acknowledge we failed—after a struggle which was protracted in a degree unknown almost to Parliamentary practice, which had the effect of delaying the consideration of measures which we thought necessary in the last Session of Parliament, and which resulted in our asking Parliament to come together in November. Well, Sir, I trust that nothing I may say will increase the bitterness of party controversy. It is as far as possible from my desire to do anything of the kind; and I trust we may have in this Session the support not only of our own friends behind us in the consideration of the measures which we believe to be necessary in the interests of the country, and especially of those who are supposed to be the clients of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. We believe that our measures are conceived in the interests of the people at large; we believe that they are free from any desire to prop up party or sectional interests; we believe that they are for the good of the country; and we therefore ask, and I hope we shall not ask in vain, for the hearty support of those who trust us, and for fair, moderate, and reasonable criticism only from those who generally differ from us.

(7.50.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to intrude at any great length upon the House. There are one or two things which have been said by the Chancellor of the Exchequer during the recess, and by the First Lord of the Treasury, which require a word or two from private Members. I understand that the case presented for claiming the full time of the House is that measures have been obstructed from this side of the House, so that the Government have had the necessity forced upon them of doing what they now propose to do. The Chancellor of the Exchequer recently referred among other measures to the Employers' Liability Bill, and to the Government proposals respecting Friendly Societies. I avow that I was astounded when I read the observations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I imagined that he must have been mis-reported. Because in the whole time of the present Parliament the measure to amend and make permanent the Employers' Liability Act has not occupied two nights. Something was done in Grand Committee, it is true, but it in no way delayed the proceedings here. One year the Bill was not introduced at all. Another year, when it was printed, we saw nothing of it. It is a little too audacious to put this Bill forward as an obstructed measure.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I am confident that the hon. Member is under a misapprehension, or has misread the report. I never spoke of any obstruction upon the Employers' Liability Bill.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I have no doubt it is a misreading of the report on my part, but I gave some attention to the subject, and I thought that the matter was urged as one of the illustrations of the measures which the Government had tried to carry, and had been prevented from carrying by obstruction of them. Certainly, though I may have been under a misapprehension, the Friendly Societies Bill seemed to fall into the same category. I am glad, however, to accept the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman, and it is a satisfaction to know from him that the Employers' Liability Bill was not one of those obstructed. If that is true, then it is also true that the Government have been lacking in their duty to the working classes specially affected, because it is a measure which should have been dealt with, but with regard to which during two Sessions past not a word has been said. Words falling from the Chancellor of the Exchequer have much more effect than words falling from a man like myself, and I think he ought expressly to have mentioned that this was one of the Bills as to which all fault laid with the Government, who had not in any fashion endeavoured to bring it before the House for at least three years.

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member misunderstands me on this point. I have never charged, so far as I can remember, any obstruction on the Employers' Liability Bill. The argument to which the hon. Member probably refers, is that the general delay of business which took place in the House, that which I call obstruction, prevented our passing Bills which we had at hand. I did not say, certainly, that these two particular measures had been obstructed.

MR. BRADLAUGH: When I spoke at Manchester, a few hours after the right hon. Gentleman had spoken on the question of obstruction, I suggested that the Government, having a large majority at their back, had been probably obstructed, either because they did not want particularly to carry the measures which were obstructed, or because they introduced more measures than their own followers desired should be considered, or because they were incapable of handling the powerful weapons they had forged for the purpose of overcoming obstruction. That last, of course, is an impossible supposition, and I said so at the time. I would suggest that it would be a little more in good taste if supporters of the Government were not so reckless in making charges of obstruction. Another Member of Her Majesty's Government has spoken during the recess of the number of questions put to Ministers in this House, and has suggested that those questions had better be put in writing and sent to the different Ministers to whom they are intended to be addressed. I will here offer the House a sample of the experience I have had in this direction during the last few weeks. I am always ready to accept any suggestion coming from the Treasury Bench as far as possible, and in fact it is sometimes said that I am a little too ready to do so. At any rate I adopted this suggestion at once, and accordingly addressed to the Department to which it has been my duty and will continue to be my duty to address a large number of questions, to some of which answers had been promised as far back as March and April last year, an inquiry with regard to which the House will be amused to hear that in reply to that communication I received from the Minister to whom it was addressed, a letter informing me that I might raise the subject by an Amendment to the Address, by which method it could be fully discussed. [Sir J. GORST expressed dissent.] I quote from memory, but I will try to state exactly what that letter conveyed. In reply to the question I thus put I was told that I could bring the matter forward by way of an Amendment to the Address, and that the Secretary of State considered that that would be the most fitting occasion for obtaining a reply.

I will here offer the House a sample of the experience I have had in this direction during the last few weeks. I am always ready to accept any suggestion coming from the Treasury Bench as far as possible, and in fact it is sometimes

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The hon. Member was good enough in the early part of the recess to give me notice that he intended to raise by way of Amendment to the Address the question of the indigo riots in Jessore. The letter referred to was subsequently addressed to me, and I replied to it saying that it asked for information on a subject as to which the Secretary of State did not think it expedient that he should enter into a discussion with the hon. Member, seeing that hon. Member had already announced his intention to bring the subject before the House of Commons on a specified occasion. At the same time, I said that the Secretary of State was prepared to give the hon. Member information on any points of detail as to which he might care to ask. I wish the hon. Member would read my letter.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I shall have great pleasure in bringing the letter down and reading it to-morrow in order to make the matter perfectly clear. It shows how mis-impressions will occur, not only as to speeches made and reported, but as to letters received and misunderstood. It shows, too, the necessity of sometimes having questions put across the floor of the House, where there can be no mistake about them. At any rate, as the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for India has done me the honour to correct me, it will be within his recollection, and within the recollection of such of the House as take an interest in the matter, or care to go to Hansard for information, that the very questions on which he says, as I understand now, that it is fair I should have information, were questions put to him early last year—questions repeated and pressed upon his attention, I think on one occasion with some disposition on my part to resort to the forms of the House, of which I should have availed myself with some reluctance. If it were not that I know that the right hon. Gentleman is never guilty of anything like a sneer or jest, to refer me to an Amendment on the Address for the information I am seeking would seem to be making a mock of me. Last Session I refrained from debating Indian matters on the Address; I refrained from speaking on them at all, on the distinct pledge and understanding with the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury that at any rate one night should be afforded to me for that purpose—afforded to me on the Second Reading of the Bill, introduced by the Government, in the House of Lords, and which was to be brought down to this House before Easter, and which, though brought down, was never brought on here from the first day of the Session to the last. There is no pretence of saying that the Indian Councils Bill was obstructed. If anything, I was constantly pressing the Government to bring it forward. I had their distinct pledge that it should be brought forward, and it never came. And I have this further difficulty, that it is only with Mr. Speaker in the Chair that there is any chance of challenging the Government on the gross illegality of their conduct every year since they have been in office, and which may be repeated on that matter this year. I mean the absolutely distinct Statute which requires the Indian Government to lay on the Table of the House, during the first fourteen days of May, certain information. The Statute requires them specifically to do it. I have asked about it, and my question is evaded. If the debate on the Address is objected to, there is no opportunity of fairly raising the subject. No resolution about it would be pertinent on the presentation of the financial statement. The Government is content to break the law itself now, and there is no reasonable means of punishing it. The India Office is an office over which we have not the same control as we have over every other department of the State, namely, for when salaries affecting other departments are voted we can make them the subject of criticism. But in the case of the India Office the matter is dismissed with a good humoured laugh at the end of the Session. Again, while even Members of Parliament we now know are in gaol for breaches of law not more specific than those of which I complain, I do think that the Government which is so strong in enforcing the law at one place, might be not less decent in obedience to it themselves here. There is no reference in the gracious Speech from the Throne which will show whether the Government intend to take any steps whatever to submit to this House any kind of legislation in reference to the amendment of the India Councils Act; which they last Session declared particularly requires amendment. I trust we shall not be driven (as driven we seem to be) to raise Indian questions by Motions for the Adjournment of the House, which are unpleasant to the Members who have to move them. But still we have no other resources left to us when the Government actually defy the law and make no effort whatever to fulfil it. As I understood that it is the wish of the House, and that an arrangement has been made between the Front Benches that no debate shall now take place on that portion of the Speech which relates to Ireland, I will only say one word in reference to the observations of the First Lord of the Treasury when, in reply to a remark by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, made across the Table, he said he should be pleased to show him a draft of the Local Government Bill. That Bill was solemnly promised by the right hon. Baronet the Member for one of the divisions of Bristol at the close of the year 1886 to be introduced in the year 1887. It was promised as a measure of local government to be framed on a popular basis, but in all probability that will always be in draft, and will never be presented. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer—

and it is possible that again I may have misunderstood him—said the Bill would be introduced when the country was in a fair state of quietude. Of course, the reporters may have done the right hon. Gentleman an injustice, or my appreciation of the meaning of his words may have been imperfect, but still I did understand the words thus put into the mouth of Her Majesty last Session to be a declaration that the country was in a fair state of quietness. Now we are told it is still better, and I do think it is a little too much that these statements should be made year after year without any effort being made to fulfil the Government pledges. I shall reserve what I have to say as to the taking away of the time of private Members until the First Lord makes his Motion on the subject, but I now ask the Government in common decency to say—what the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India would not say when he was making his financial statement last year—I ask them to say now in this House—for I warn them that I shall take some means of making this the subject of debate, whether the time of private Members is taken away or not—I ask them to say what are the reasons for their absolute disobedience of the law for the last four years in not duly submitting the statistics of the moral and material progress of India which they are called upon to submit annually, and I wish to know further whether they are going to obey the law this year, and if they will do so in the time fixed by the Statute? If not it shall not be my fault if the Government undertake other business of importance before the House at least expresses an opinion upon this subject. I know it is futile to expect answers now to questions upon matters relating to India of which I have only had the advantage within the last few moments of receiving information. I have had a number of documents sent me, but I am not sure that I am at liberty to refer to them. I am told that some were sent to me for my private information only, and I am placed in a somewhat unfair position both towards those for whom I speak and towards the House itself, because those documents are documents which passed between Departments of the State on matters affecting the liberty of the subject, and

I submit that they ought to have been laid upon the Table of the House. I trust that the Under Secretary of State for India will give me some pledges that if I move for Papers relating to the cases of Warburton and Luson they will be granted. If I do not receive some such pledge I shall take legitimate means of raising the question.

*SIR J. GORST: As the hon. Member has so pointedly referred to me, perhaps the House will allow me to make a few observations. The hon. Member asked me a number of questions last year upon details of Indian administration—questions based upon information which he had received from an ex parte source. I was unable to answer at the time, because, as the House will understand, all the details of Indian Government are not necessarily reported to the Secretary of State. Those who are dissatisfied with any Act of the Government are of course at liberty to send garbled statements to hon. Members of this House, but it is impossible for the Secretary of State to be always prepared with full particulars on all points of detail so as to be able at once to provide information on any question raised. The hon. Member, in the recess, sent me a letter, saying that he did so in consequence of suggestions of the First Lord of the Treasury, and in it he asked me to give him an answer on certain points. I think I may say that I sent an answer which generally showed that the information upon which he had asked questions during the last Session of Parliament was wholly erroneous, and gave a false idea of the circumstances referred to in those questions. There was undoubtedly one question with regard to some riots which took place at Jessore, in India, between indigo planters and their employés, upon which, by directions of the Secretary of State, I withheld from him information I possessed on the ground that the hon. Member for Northampton had given formal notice that he intended to raise a discussion upon this matter in the House of Commons by way of Amendment to the Address, and that, therefore, it was not convenient that I should enter into a discussion with him upon isolated and particular facts regarding a question which was ultimately to become the subject of general debate. But I accompanied the refusal with an intimation to the hon. Member that if there was any point in connection with the case upon which he desired to have information, such information should be most freely accorded him. I think I have made it clear to the House that the hon. Member has no ground whatever for complaint as to the information which he received from the Department. Now he says that the information which he desires is contained in formal despatches from the Government of India, and he complains that those despatches have not been published. The reason why those despatches have not been published is that it was desired to avoid garbled extracts being published. I do not for one moment intend to suggest that the hon. Member himself would have given out garbled extracts, but there are gentlemen who might do so with the view and result of leading to direct misrepresentation, and therefore the Secretary of State thought it undesirable that any of the despatches should be made public, unless they were first properly moved for in this House.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: If I move for Papers with regard to the Warburton and Luson cases, will they be laid on the Table?

*SIR J. GORST: If the hon. Member desires to have these despatches, and will place a Notice of Motion on the Paper, I will promise to give him all despatches that can properly be made public. With regard to the discovery which the hon. Member made last Session about the breach of the law, which he intimates renders the Secretary of State and his subordinates liable to imprisonment and punishment for deliberate violation of the law, I must say that the discovery does credit to the legal acumen of the hon. Member. The section he refers to is contained in the Government of India Act, 1858, and it requires that certain information shall be laid upon the Table of the House within fourteen days of the 1st day of May in every year when Parliament is sitting. Now that is a proviso which, I am sorry to say, has been neglected from the very first. Except, perhaps, in one or two accidental cases, the information has never been laid on the Table within the time prescribed by law. My attention was first called to it by the hon. Member in the course of last Session, and, anxious as I am sure the Secretary of State is above all men to formally observe the law, he is determined to obey it in the coming year, and consequently in 1891 every effort will be made to comply as far as possible with the letter of the Statute. But I am sorry to say that the Return which Parliament requires to be laid on the Table is founded on information which has to be obtained from India, and it is not absolutely easy, now that the Government of our Indian Empire has so vastly developed itself, to obtain the information in time to lay the Returns on the Table at the date specified in the Act. I know that a few years ago, in consequence of a complaint made specially, I believe, by the hon. Member himself, as well as by other Members, of the late period at which Indian finances were ordinarily discussed, an effort was made to get the information respecting the finances of India laid upon the Table of the House at the earliest possible date. Great pressure was put upon all the Departments of the Government in India to send the information, but, notwithstanding that pressure, it was not available before some time in June. I am, therefore, afraid that it may be impossible to get the information to which the hon. Member refers ready for presentation earlier than in June. I can only repeat that I am sure that every effort will be made to comply with the Act so far as possible; but there is a danger that if an attempt is made to get the information ready by a fixed time it will not be nearly so complete, accurate, and perfect, as the Government of India and the Secretary of State desire. It is also worthy of note that on the occasion when the Government made such strenuous efforts to get particulars of Indian finance laid on the Table of the House early in the Session, the House never found time to discuss the subject until the very end of the Session, and thus the efforts made to secure the early information were entirely thrown away. Again I can only say I am sure that every effort will be made in the coming year to obtain as early as possible the information as to which the hon. Member is so anxious. (8.30.)

term "assisted education" is not used' but—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*(8.48.) MR. S. SMITH: The paragraph in the Speech to which I wish to call attention reads as follows:—

"Your attention will be invited to the expediency of alleviating the burden which the law of compulsory education has in recent years imposed upon the poorer portion of my people."

This language is not particularly pellucid, but in a general sense it can pretty well be understood. I suppose that what is really intended is the introduction of a scheme of what we call free education, that is, the removal of fees in elementary schools. We on this side of the House welcome the principle of free elementary education. I believe there will be no opposition whatever to the adoption of the principle. We believe that, upon the whole, free education will be a great boon to the poorer population of the country, and that it will tend in a very marked degree to the advance of education itself. But while I say that, I wish to point out to the Government that we shall reserve the right to criticise very closely the means by which they propose to give effect to the principle of free education. It is not unlikely that very serious differences of opinion may arise in the House before the principle can be carried into law, and I think it is only fair some of us should give an indication to the Government of certain conditions which will be necessary to give effect to this paragraph if it is to be received with anything like cordiality on this side of the House. In the first place, if the Government propose, as I have no doubt they do propose, to free the standards both in denominational and undenominational schools, there will be a very strong determination on this side of the House to secure some species of representative control of the voluntary or denominational schools. It will be proposed that a very large extra grant of public money be made both to Board and voluntary schools, a grant, I understand, amounting to something like 10s. per head. That will increase the Government grant by something like 60 per cent. beyond what it is now. If this great additional grant be given to voluntary and denominational schools, it will be imperative that there should be some increase of public and popular control. I wish to speak particularly on behalf of Wales. In Wales the vast majority of the population are Nonconformists, but education is largely conducted by means of the Church of England schools. There exists in Wales much dissatisfaction with the way in which these Church schools are conducted. The feeling is wide and general that the schools are used for proselytising purposes. I have heard of cases which I can only describe as gross tyranny and hardship imposed upon the children of Nonconformists. I don't go so far as to say that in Wales we should at one sweep seek to brush away all Church and voluntary schools, but I do ask for a reasonable degree of representation on the management of these schools, a sufficient representation to protect the people from anything like tyrannical or proselytising influences. In a recent tour I made in my constituency I was told that if free education was offered without that check or control, the people would rather be without it altogether. Again, if the principle of free education is proposed for elementary schools, I would strongly urge that all the standards should be free. A great mistake was made in Scotland last year in not freeing all the standards. The freeing of all the standards will be welcomed by the people as a great boon, but a half-and-half measure will not be received with satisfaction in the country. We wish particularly to extend the school age of the children. There is no point on which educationalists are so eager, and it is perfectly obvious that if we free only the first four or five standards, it will be extremely difficult to keep the children at school until they have passed the Sixth Standard. We wish to press on the Government that this is a wonderful opportunity for carrying out the recommendations of the Royal Commission which sat a few years ago. When we grant free education we may fairly ask the parents to make some small sacrifice; we may fairly ask that the compulsory age of exemption shall be 13 years, as recommended by the Royal Commission, and that the half time age should be raised from 10 to 11 years. I do not think there would be any opposition in the country to such a proposal. We have already got some important educational boons from this Government, and if they will add to the boon of free education a lengthening of the school age they may rightly be regarded as benefactors of the working population. I ask them likewise to carry out the recommendation of the Royal Commission with regard to the establishment of evening or continuation schools. We got some encouragement in the Code of last year, but, after all, it was very imperfect. I ask the Government to make it an integral part of the educational system that School Boards shall be obliged to have continuation schools, and that under certain conditions the children shall be drafted into these schools for one or two years after they leave the day schools, as is done in Germany, Switzerland, and many of the Continental States. I am satisfied the Government will receive great support if they are encouraged to go forward in this direction. No doubt the attention of the country has been arrested by that passage in General Booth's book in which he has brought out in vivid colours the horrible condition of masses of our poorest urban population. I have repeatedly stated in this House, and I do so again, that you can make comparatively little impression on the great mass of squalor and misery in our large towns unless you can save the children. The whole secret of the remedy is, save the children; and to do that lengthen the school period and keep them under control until they reach the age of 15 or 16, as is done in Germany and in Switzerland. Keep them in elementary schools until 13 or 14, and then require attendance at continuation schools until they are 16 or 17 years of age, and so you will do much to remove the misery and degradation among the poorest of the populations of our large towns. I earnestly submit these proposals to the Government. I have failed in the Ballot to secure a place that will allow of my Bill in relation to continuation schools being discussed this Session, and, therefore, I appeal to the Government when they introduce their promised free education proposals, that they will couple with them clauses lengthening the term of school life and establishing everywhere continuation schools, and giving power to School Boards and Committees to secure the attendance of children at these schools. One other point I wish to bring before the Government. It will be necessary if we have universal free education to have some kind of classification of children. Already it is felt to be a great grievance among the better portion of our working classes that their children have to associate with those of the most degraded classes who live in the worst slums of our towns. It is complained that however carefully children are brought up at home they have to associate at public schools with the children of thieves and prostitutes, and contamination spreads through the school. These evils will be immensely increased by the free school system. You will have the children of the respectable class mixing with the demoralised class, and corruption will follow. I do not know what principle of classification the Government will adopt. I would not be averse to having a few schools where fees are charged, and to which parents may send their children if they wish. It is one of the most startling paragraphs in General Booth's book, wherein he describes how the taint of immorality is spread through to schools by children from the slums. Undoubtedly, this point deserves the most serious attention. One thing more I must mention. Ugly rumours are floating about that the funds for the support of free education will be drawn from the money voted to County Councils for technical and intermediate education. I hope there is no truth in these rumours. County Councils with few exceptions are using the money admirably for educational purposes, and a great scheme of intermediate and technical education has been constructed based on the permanent application of these funds to this purpose, and it would be regarded as a breach of faith, a dishonourable act, to take away this money again.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): Hear, hear!

*MR. S. SMITH: I am glad to find that opinion has my right hon. Friend's approval. For Wales I can speak particularly; the whole of the Principality is being covered with a net-work of intermediate schools, reliance being placed on the permanent character of the grant. I hope the Government will not give countenance to any suggestion such as I have indicated, and will resist any temptation to so divert these funds. Just one observation on the Tithes Bill. It has now been promised for three Sessions. We all know that the main object of the Tithes Bill is to introduce peace and tranquillity in Wales in this connection. Now, I wish to express my conviction that no settlement of the tithes question will in the smallest degree satisfy the people of Wales that is not coupled with a scheme for the disestablishment of the Church. I say this as a Representative of the Welsh people, and every Liberal Member from Wales will bear me out. No question causes such an intense and burning agitation among the Welsh people as this of the disestablishment of the Church of England in Wales. The tithe question is only a branch of this subject, and the Government are under a great delusion if they think that by changing the incidence of the tithe they can allay this agitation. It will continue and increase until the principle of religious equality is secured to the Welsh people. I will say no more, for I agree in deprecating a needless prolongation of the Debates on the Address. There was a great waste of time last year, which I am glad to think will not be repeated, and I hope that all through this Session time will not be squandered in bitter Party recriminations, but that we shall devote ourselves to useful constructive legislation in the discussion of which all Parties may have their share, for surely there is a large common ground of patriotism we can all occupy in spite of the strong divisions of opinion that separate Political Parties.

*(9.9.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I have but a few words to say on the subject of free education. I have had a great deal to do with educational matters for many years. I had a great deal to do with the passing of the first Act in 1870, and before I had the honour of knowing Mr. Forster I assisted in work in the East End in connection with the movement and the measure which Mr. Forster complimented me on having assisted him to pass. I am keenly alive to the importance of extending education, and I think that the subject of free education is one to be promoted not on Party lines, but upon the consideration of whether it will improve education and the social condition of the people. The history of free education of course is difficult to trace, but much has been published on the subject. It was gone into by a Royal Commission a few years ago, and the Commissioners expressed their opinion that a system of universal free schools was not desirable. Mr. Fitch, a leading educationalist, and who no doubt has done an immense deal for the cause of education—no man having more sympathy with the promotion of education—has distinctly stated his opinion that a universal system of free education would be most mischievous. In connection with the subject, the question of regular attendance is important to consider, and I am afraid that authorities seem to agree that in free schools attendance is not so regular as in those schools where fees are paid. I gather from a remark of the hon. Member who has just spoken that he is of opinion that it is desirable to have some schools in which fees are paid. This is not the time to enter fully into the question. When the Bill is introduced we shall consider it carefully, but it is necessary to say a few words, as this is brought up rather as a novelty, and we have not sufficient light on the subject as some persons think. Authorities speaking with experience of the free system in America and in Scotland show that in free schools attendance is not so regular and progress not so good as where fees are paid. I will not weary the House with references. I must candidly say that, to my mind, a great object is to secure the safety of voluntary schools as representing denominational teaching. I know that certain of our friends do not regard this as of so much importance as we do, but under no system can we support any Bill that will damage or endanger the existence of these voluntary schools. Of course if these fees are done away with in some way, the money must be made up. Some propose an increase of the rates; but I think we shall find that will not be a popular movement. The increase would be a large one. So it would also if the charge were thrown on Imperial taxation, and the proposal will lead to much discussion. I think from remarks from hon. Gentlemen opposite, and correspondence in the Press, there is a determination that voluntary schools should be managed by Elective Boards. I have no objection to Elective Boards, but I say voluntary schools must maintain their distinctive character. We have got Board schools, but we insist on the schools for the Church of England, for Roman Catholics, Wesleyans, and others, maintaining, if they think proper, their particular denominational character. I lay great stress upon this; but how it is to be managed I candidly confess I do not know, under the proposal to abolish fees. The financial question requires grave consideration. The cost of education, roughly speaking, is seven and a half millions—half of the amount paid from the Imperial Exchequer, a quarter by localities, and a good quarter, or nearly two millions, by fees. Well, if we propose an increase in local rates, it means an enormous addition of something like a thirteenth of the whole local rating of the country—something like 3d. in the £1. I do not think anybody will venture to propose an increase of that kind to do away with school fees. There are those who say the cost should in some form be thrown on Imperial taxation, and it has been proposed that it should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund. That, of course, means there must be extra taxation that can only take one of two forms—1d. in the £1 on the Income Tax, or 6d. or 9d. a gallon upon alcohol. I have no objection to the addition to the one or the other, if such is necessary; but if we are going to make the addition in order to abolish school fees, let us be told so distinctly. On the social aspect of the question I have just a word or two to say. On this ground many who are ardent supporters of education are opposed to the proposal. Mrs. Fawcett, a keen supporter of everything that promotes the wellbeing of the masses, has written strongly opposing the idea of free education. Professor Fawcett also opposed it, and he said it meant a very large extension of outdoor relief. Looking at it from a social aspect, I ask, Is it wise, inasmuch as education is now paid for in the proportion of three-fourths by the State and a fourth by individuals—is it really wise to throw the whole cost upon the State? No doubt it is a very popular thing—it always is—to talk about paying for popular education, or anything else of the kind; but we ought to consider what is best for education and for the community, not what is merely popular. We may fairly ask whether it is socially wise to take away more and more the responsibility of parents in connection with educational matters. We know—it is within my own experience from visits among the poorer classes—that they make sacrifices in order to give their children good education, that they have denied themselves things they would like to indulge in. Is it wise to do away with this feeling? I think it is a question that needs consideration. Mrs. Fawcett, I remember, in a brief but graphic article on the subject, said that, in her opinion, based upon practical knowledge, a great number of the poorest fathers resisted temptation to drink because of their desire and determination to do their utmost for the education of their children. She went on to say that, in her opinion, this incentive led to more temperance than the work of the Alliance and all the temperance associations combined. I give that as an opinion, not vouching for it, though I think it is likely to be correct. We must consider in connection with removing this responsibility from parents what has happened this last year. The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that there had been an increase of payments to him for alcohol of £1,800,000, or a sum of nearly the amount of the school fees of the whole country. Taking the alcohol bill, if one glass in every 75 consumed by the people were saved it would produce the sum now paid in school fees. It does seem to me a grave subject for consideration whether it is socially wise thus to lessen the responsibility of parents, to reduce the restraints upon the poor against the increase of population and children they cannot possibly provide for. There is present to my mind an instance of a young man in a very humble position of life—a road scavenger. I had befriended him a good deal, but I found to my astonishment that he had married at the age of 19 or 20 and had two or three children, and died at about 23, leaving them, of course, to the mercy of the world. Is it wise, I ask again, to encourage such a disastrous state of affairs? In relieving parents of responsibility we enter upon very dangerous ground. I refer to this because I am sure these are social not party questions—they concern the social improvement of the great mass of the people.

(9.25.) MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): I think no part of the Queen's Speech will be more welcome than that which refers to the intention of the Government to do something to assist popular education. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down deplores the possibility of this proposal begetting habits of imprudence among the people, and, possibly, imprudent and too early marriages. But the very object of education, as I understand it, is to prevent this evil, if it is an evil, or to lessen it to a great extent. The object of education is to enlighten the minds of the people—to raise them into a higher position socially and intellectually than they have occupied in the past. I think, then, the remarks of the hon. Member were entirely wide of the mark and do not bear a critical examination. I have said this proposal will be welcome to the great mass of the people, but this, of course, is providing there is no attempt whatever to endow any section or party—to favour in any way whatever one religious denomination as against another. If there is any attempt to endow any particular kind of education—to favour any particular religious denomination in their teaching—then the Government may be assured that their proposal will be carefully examined, resisted, and if possible defeated. But my object is to notice the unfortunate position created by the division of the subjects mentioned in the Queen's Speech into grades, and I regret to notice that while in the first grade Irish landlords are to have the first consideration of Her Majesty's Government, domestic matters affecting every workman, workwoman and child in the country are relegated to the third or fourth grade. I find the Employers' Liability Bill treated as only possibly a subject for consideration in case the Government may towards June or July find themselves without legislative occupation. Rather than waste time, they promise to consider this burning question of Employers' Liability.

That is the sense in which I understand the arrangement of subjects for possible legislation, and the respective values the Government have formed of them. I only wish to point out this, if the Employers' Liability Bill is of the same character as the Bill of last Session, it will be met in exactly the same spirit, and every possible means will be taken to prevent the Bill becoming law. But, if the Government have only progressed in opinion at the rate they did between 1888 and last Session, then we may look for a very good Bill, and if it should prove to be such a Bill then I can promise, so far as I can be of the least service, to use all my influence and efforts in assisting the Government to pass the measure. A bad, misleading Bill, such as that of last Session, will meet with every opposition, though you may be pleased to call it obstruction. The Bill of 1888 was treated with indifference by the Government, though they carried the Second Reading by a majority of 55, and in the next year it was not introduced at all, or not circulated. Last Session it was introduced at a very late period, and no attempt was made to promote a discussion upon it, the Government being too much engrossed with concern for the interests of Irish landlords and brewers, and now it is relegated to the third or fourth grade of importance. One other point I note with regret, the absence from the Speech of all reference to legislation for amending the law in relation to factories and workshops. A Committee has been sitting in the Lords, and an important Report has been made by it. The Home Secretary at the end of the Session of 1889 promised that the Government would deal with that Report, and would consider amendments to the present law in the Session of the present year. The first Session of 1890 has passed without any attempt whatever being made on the part of the Government to deal with the terrible evils exposed by that Committee and by other agencies, and the second Session of 1890 has commenced with a Queen's Speech mentioning subjects enough to last for the next seven years in the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth grades, but, so low and utterly insignificant is the question of factory and workshop legislation considered by the Government, that it is not even mentioned in the fifth grade amongst the possibilities of legislation this Session. I sincerely hope the Solicitor General will be good enough to relate to some of his lost and dispersed colleagues one or two of the points that have been raised if he thinks them sufficiently important to mention, and will warn them what they may expect if they are going to deal with such burning questions as employers' liability at some late period of the Session when the House is wearied and exhausted by its other work. Certainly, if they take such a course, they may look for the united and determined opposition of the representatives of labour.

*(9.33.) SIR R. TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): My reason for rising is to say a few words in support of the remarkably able speech of my hon. Friend the Member for North Islington (Mr. Bartley) on the important subject of free or assisted education. I endorse every word he said on the subject, whether viewed from an educational, a social, a moral, or a financial standpoint. I can support what he said about the effect of the collection of fees on regularity of attendance from the recent history of the School Board for London. Within the last year our fees have been falling off, and the collections have been unsatisfactory. Our average attendance has been often held up to the House by the right hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) as a model for all other educational institutions. But the attendance has been falling off simultaneously with the falling off of the fees. I cannot help connecting the two things. With regard to the financial effect of what is supposed to be the Government proposal, I assume that the idea of charging the additional sum that may be necessary as compensation for the loss of fees upon the local taxation is out of the question. I feel certain that the local taxpayers, who have to reckon up their pennies in the £1, will never consent to that. But, that being so, we have this extraordinary fact financially that the British taxpayer must, in the shape either of indirect or direct taxation, pay an additional sum of £2,000,000 or £2,500,000 to make up for the loss of fees that are being collected all round without any perceptible burden on the mass of the parents and without being generally complained of. The hon. Member who just sat down spoke of the pauperising effect of the fees due from indigent parents being paid by the Guardians. But no such system is needful. In the metropolitan area those parents who are unable to pay have only to prove their inability to the School Board local authorities, and their children will be admitted to the schools free of fees without any difficulty. The number of such parents is, of course, limited. But if the fees are remitted to the parents universally, then somebody will have to pay; that somebody is the British taxpayer. In London the difficulty in the collection of the fees is owing partly to the condition of public opinion. The world, or rather an influential part of the world, seems to have determined that there shall be no fees. That reflects itself upon the policy of the School Board, and that, again, reflects itself upon the parents. Before this question was raised we had no difficulty in the metropolitan area in collecting the fees, and I do not believe that any other class of elementary schools has any difficulty. But if a Government so powerful and influential and worthy of respect as the present Government has determined to do away with school fees, I must support them in carrying out the measure for the general good, and in deference to public opinion, but I hope nothing will be done to endanger the stability of the voluntary system. On the contrary, I trust that the measure will help to consolidate the position of the voluntary schools, and to give them an enduring character of permanency. Entirely as I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Islington in objecting to free education, I would myself, as things have gone so far, help the Government in carrying a measure in which I myself do not perfectly concur, and I would counsel my Parliamentary comrades to do the same. As a School Board man, I am brought very much into contact with managers of voluntary schools. Probably no one knows their anxieties and distresses so well, and I can assure the House that they well deserve all the assistance which can be given them, as they are most assiduous in their duties, and most anxious to make the voluntary schools as effective as possible. No cause is so sacred in their eyes, and no matter lies so deep in their hearts and affections as that of the voluntary school system. They know that with this system is bound up the cause of religious education—I will not say Scriptural education, because that is well given by the Board schools. The hon. Member who has just sat down expressed a hope that no exclusive assistance will be given to a particular denomination. Surely he knows that no exclusive assistance will be given to any particular denomination. All denominational schools must be treated alike—Church of England, Roman Catholic, Wesleyan, and others. It will bear the stamp of a long Catholic Christianity. I do hope if the measure is carried that it will do something really to make the voluntary system an institution of the future as it has been of the past and is of the present. It has been the pioneer of the early education of the English people. Up to the year 1870 it was the one great agency for elevating the masses of our countrymen. Under it our people became foremost in all world-wide enterprises, and attained the headship of the industrial world. Its history forms one of the brightest features and one of the most brilliant pages in the annals of England. It demonstrates the potency of private effort without State organisation. It is regarded as among the chief ornaments of our national inheritance, as one of the jewels in the Crown of England, and as a circumstance unique in the educational history of all nations in modern times.

*(941.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I should not have taken part in the discussion but for some remarks which were made by the First Lord of the Treasury and for the very singular speeches of the hon. Member for Evesham (Sir R. Temple) and the hon. Member for Islington (Mr. Bartley). The First Lord of the Treasury has complained of the difficulties in which Her Majesty's Government is placed in carrying valuable measures by the obstruction they meet with in this House. I wish the House to note that the first signs of objection to the only measure Her Majesty's Government has announced for the benefit and well-being of the people of England, has come from two hon. Members on his own side, who have opened a not ineffective masked battery upon the free education proposals mentioned in the Queen's Speech. Both hon. Members have declared that free education is an unclean thing, and that it is unsound socially and economically. The hon. Member for Evesham says one great objection to free education is that somebody will have to pay for it. I think the Government were right in putting into the Queen's Speech the word "burden." The fees have been a burden which have weighed sorely on the people of this country. One advantage in connection with the two speeches, to which I have just referred, is that on the first day of the Session we have the plainest intimation that the project of free education is regarded with hostility on its merits by Members opposite, and that the only reason on which they will consent to afford even qualified support to the scheme is that they hope they can use it as a means of consolidating the position of the voluntary schools, and of rivetting the chains of sectarianism around the poor of our country for ever. I venture to say that on this side of the House there will be the warmest appreciation of Her Majesty's Ministry in taking up the question of free education. As long as their proposals are on lines which we can approve, Her Majesty's Government will receive our warmest support. But if this project of free education is to be used in order to bolster up and support the position of the voluntary schools, if the purse-strings of the Treasury are to be loosened for the benefit of voluntary schools without any adequate guarantee, such as would be afforded by a universal system of School Boards, that the educational work of the country will be efficiently carried out, the Government proposals will meet hostility and opposition on this side of the House. With regard to the question of free or assisted education, is it to be understood that the proposals of the Government are to be limited to relieving the poor from fees within the compulsory standards? Are we to have relief up to the third standard only in those schools where unhappily that is the standard for exemption? Her Majesty's Government has had experience in dealing with this question in Scotland, and they know very well the difficulties that arose in remitting fees only in the lower standards. It simply amounts to imposing a fine, and a very effectual fine, upon the best class of parents—those who wish to keep their children at school and to educate them to higher points. We shall certainly resist the education proposals of the Government if we find they are to be carried out on the lines laid down by the two hon. Members who have spoken opposite, if there is to be no concession to the principle of popular control of schools whose revenues are to be assisted by public money, and if we find them doing away with the 17s. 6d. limit to relieve the pockets of the subscribers of voluntary schools. But if Her Majesty's Government would listen to reason, and will take the advice, for example, of wise leaders of religious opinion, like the Bishop of Peterborough, the Rev. W. Bury, and Dr. Percival, and will form a bridge towards a rational system of popular control where public money is involved, without prejudicing the cause of religious education, or interfering with any principle, it may be possible even in this Session and in this Parliament to arrive at some rational conclusion in regard to this matter. A good deal has been heard about obstruction, but I think the House and the country ought to be reminded of how the time was wasted in the last Session. The Government have placed themselves in a position of exceptional advantage in the Sessions of 1889 and 1890. In 1889 the House sat on 122 days, and there were 131 separate Sittings. Of these Sittings the Government took 106, whereas private Members had only 25 at their disposal. In the past Session the position was even worse. The House sat on 125 days, the total number of Sittings was 139, and the Government took 106 Sittings, leaving private Members but 23. The Returns of the Sittings show that the Government in both Sessions exactly doubled the allowance of time accorded to them by the usual custom of the House. If we take the discussions which resulted in nothing at all and were absolutely wasted in the 106 Sittings occupied by the Ministry, we find that they extended over from 40 to 43 days of Parliamentary time, or more than one-third of the whole of the Session. There were Debates on whether the publication of the forged letter was a breach of privilege, on the Special Commission, on the Land Purchase Bill.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I do not see how these statistics are relevant to the question before the House.

*MR. CHANNING: What I was wishing to prove, Mr. Deputy Speaker, was that Her Majesty's Ministry had taken too much of the time of the House during the past Session and had then complained of their failure to carry the legislation they proposed. The Government are themselves greatly to blame in introducing measures like the compensation of publicans scheme of last Session, which took up 22 days that might have been more usefully occupied; and the fact is there has been in the last two Sessions a greater encroachment on the rights of private Members than has ever been known in Parliamentary history. We have, therefore, little reason to give the Government further power to curtail the rights of private Members this year. The three principal measures are, one for endowing the Irish landlords with the money of the taxpayers, another for the maintenance of the power of the Church in regard to tithes, and the free education bill. They relegate many questions of practical importance to a wholly secondary position. I protest all the more against private Members being deprived of opportunities for carrying useful legislation, all the more strongly because we have had illustrations of the ease with which useful measures can be passed. The Housing of the Working Classes Act was carried after four hours had been devoted to it in this House and three Morning Sittings in a Grand Committee. We object to the bringing forward of such measures as those first mentioned in the Queen's Speech, instead of the introduction of proposals such as are relegated in that Speech to inferior positions.

(9.56.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I wish to call attention to one phase of the question of distress in Ireland which has not been referred to in the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to focus his attention exclusively on what are called the congested districts. I would call attention to the fact that, although the distress is most severely felt in the congested districts, there is a large portion of Ireland in which it will be felt to a very considerable extent, although not with the same intensity. Speaking broadly, the districts to which I refer embrace the whole western half of Ireland. The phrase "congested districts" has been substituted for "scheduled districts," and means a very much smaller area of Ireland. Take the counties of Galway and Mayo. They comprise a very large portion of Ireland. The congested districts within those borders comprise the mountainous parts of Connemara and North Mayo. Although in the district I have indicated the people are not so poor as those in the mountainous districts which the Government propose to deal with, they nevertheless have to suffer a good deal from poverty, and, as far as I can see, no attention has been paid to the population of those large areas. I am fearful, therefore, of what may take place unless something is done for their relief. I may say that I do not anticipate any extraordinary accession to the numbers of that class of the poor who habitually come upon the poor's rates, and so live upon their neighbours, but, as I have pointed out, there is a very large section of the population who, while hating to come under the Poor Law and being supported by their neighbours, will nevertheless find themselves without sufficient food or resources as the winter progresses. Some of them might indeed be able to hang on by selling their holdings, but by so doing they would bring themselves into a condition of permanent poverty, and they certainly will need some assistance—not perhaps so much as those in the congested districts, but still sufficient to enable them to carry on through the coming winter season. There are, of course, different ways of affording relief. In the first place the Government may do this by instituting a moderate amount of public works. There is also another way in which they may be assisted. It may be that, with the exception of Connemara and Galway, the Irish occupiers are generally able to stand the effects of one famine, but there can be no doubt that, apart from those places in which the potato disease is most extensive, there has been a considerable diminution of the potato crop in other districts, so that there must evidently be a large deficiency all round. It has always been the case in Ireland that when a particular class of potato goes bad that class continues to exhibit disease from year to year, so that next year we may, unless remedial steps are taken, expect to hear continued reports on the potato disease. Now, the Government have given no notice of their intention to take measures with regard to this matter. It is well known to potato growers in England and Scotland that the potato, being propagated artificially from cuttings and not from seed, requires, at stated times, to be changed, one variety being substituted for another, in addition to periodical changes of soil. Although this is done by the English and Scotch growers, it is not done by the small growers in the West of Ireland; and I fear there is no likelihood of such changes of seed or locality being made, unless the Government in some way or other steps in to the assistance of the growers. I do not suggest that they should give them the seed altogether, but, at any rate, they might sell it at a considerable modification of the ordinary prices. It is probable that fresh importations of good seed from England and Scotland would prove a sufficient remedy: at any rate it has been tried before and has been successful. Such a mode of assisting the people under existing circumstances would not cost the Government a very large amount, and I would suggest that they should take steps in this direction at the earliest possible moment. Having thus drawn the attention of the Government to this subject, I have only to say that if they do not adopt some action of the kind I have suggested, an immense responsibility will rest upon their shoulders. They are proposing to take up for some time to come the whole of the time which would otherwise be at the disposal of private Members, and in that way they will prevent any private Member from bringing forward a proposal of this nature. If the Government will undertake to bring on a measure themselves, I for one should not so much object to their taking up the time for private business. If they will not do this, then, as I have just said, they are taking upon themselves a very heavy responsibility. I do not ask them to bring on a measure immediately, because I know that the matter is one of considerable importance, and one that would necessarily require a good deal of consideration on their part before they could frame or bring forward a measure upon the subject, but I trust they will afford us some assurance that the question shall be brought forward and discussed in this House.

(10.10.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I had intended to have moved an Amendment to the Address, but I am not quite sure whether I should be exactly in order in so doing. It seems to me that we ought to arrive at some better system of conducting our business, and this, I think, is proved by the fact that we are summoned here late in the autumn for the purpose of doing work which we ought to have carried through during the past Session. It seems to me perfectly impossible for this Parliament to carry on the enormous amount of important work it has to perform under existing circumstances, and whenever the Government gives me time to bring the matter forward it will be my duty to introduce a measure relative to a system of devolution in regard to the business of England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, whereby, I think, the time of the House would be materially saved, and the Imperial Parliament would be enabled to get through the more important measures brought before us. Under the circumstances, however, I think it would be better to postpone the subject until private Members are allowed by the Government to introduce and discuss those questions which they desire to bring forward.

Question put, and agreed to.

Address ordered to be presented by Privy Councillors.

House adjourned at a quarter after Ten o'clock.

Colonel Nolan

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 27th November, 1890.

MR. SPEAKER'S CONTINUED ABSENCE.

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House that Mr. Speaker was again unavoidably prevented from taking the Chair of the House this day.

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

QUESTIONS.

HOURS OF LABOUR IN INDIAN FACTORIES.

Mr. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if Her Majesty's Government contemplates introducing any legislation restricting the hours of labour in the cotton mills of Bombay and India generally; and if any regulations are to be issued connected with the inspection of mines in India, or are any Inspectors to be appointed? I wish further to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been directed to the statement contained in page 124 of a recent Return supplied by the East India Company, in which it is said that it would be a great boon to those employed to have their hours of labour restricted, and Sunday labour got rid of altogether?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir JOHN GORST, Chatham): Yes, Sir; the attention of my noble Friend the Secretary of State has been directed to the Return referred to. In reply to the Question upon the Paper, I have to say that the existing Factory Act and the proposed Amendments restrict the hours of labour for women and children in Indian factories. They do not regulate the hours of labour for adult males. The Secretary of State in July last asked the Government of India to consider the regulation of labour in mines, and the inspection thereof. It will be considered whether officers of the Geological Survey cannot for the present undertake the duty of inspection, so as to obviate the appointment of special Inspectors.

LONDON AND SOUTH WESTERN RAILWAY—ACCIDENT NEAR EASTLEIGH.

Mr. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to Major Marindin's Report to the Board of Trade on the causes of the fatal accident near Eastleigh on the London and South-Western Railway on the 12th July last, which he found was due to the non-observance of signals by the driver and fireman of a locomotive, and especially to the paragraph—

"It is not difficult to account for the conduct of these men who, I feel convinced, must have been asleep, or nearly so, upon the engine, for they had at the time been on duty for nearly sixteen and a-half hours, and the driver had, he states, been suffering from neuralgia for some days; and that a driver cannot be considered to be in a fit and proper state to perform his very responsible duties after working for such a length of time, even when in the best of health."

And his recommendation that—

"The employment of drivers for more than a reasonable number of consecutive hours should be absolutely prohibited."

And whether he will bring in a Bill to carry out this recommendation, and prohibit the employment of locomotive drivers and firemen beyond a fixed number of hours, or, if not, will he oppose any Bill brought in by a private Member to effect this purpose?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Yes, Sir; my attention has been called to this important question, and I am in communication upon it with the Railway Association. I hope that the Railway Companies may themselves take action in the matter. In the meantime, I could not express an opinion with regard to the advisability of legislation.

Mr. PROVAND: Arising out of the answer of the right hon. Baronet, may I ask what length of time the Railway Association has taken to return a reply?

*Sir M. HICKS BEACH: The communication to the Railway Association has only recently been made. It is based upon certain accidents which have only occurred in the course of the present year.

CHELSEA SAVINGS BANK.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the official liquidator of the Chelsea Savings Bank will make a further dividend to the depositors; and whether he can now lay upon the Table of the House a statement showing the cost and charges incurred in the liquidation and the assets available for distribution?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The declaration of a further dividend is delayed pending the result of communications with the trustees and managers as to their providing the sum of £420, amounting to a dividend of 1d. in the £1, without litigation, which would enable the liquidator, subject to the direction of the Court, to pay the depositors in full. Apart from claims on the trustees and managers, practically the whole estate available for distribution has been got in. The cost and charges will be finally settled by the Court at the conclusion of the winding-up, and when the liquidation is complete the Treasury will communicate with the official liquidator as to laying on the Table of the House a statement such as the hon. Member desires.

GREAT WESTERN MAILS.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I beg to ask the Postmaster General how many times this year the mails from the North have missed the Great Western train timed to leave Bristol for the South at or about 10 a.m., and what means he has of preventing or diminishing the inconvenience caused to the public by the irregularity of this mail?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): I do not quite follow the hon. Member's question, but I think he must refer to the connection at Bristol between the mail train from the North due at 5.45 a.m. and the train leaving at 6.10 a.m., which takes forward the North Mail letters for Hampshire when they reach Bristol punctually. If the hon. Member will let me know at what towns the inconvenience complained of arises I will inquire fully into the matter.

THE TEA ROOM TABLE.

MR. BRUNNER: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he can inform the House as to the age of the old Table of the House, said to have been saved from the fire of 1834, now lately placed in the Tea Room?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): I must ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone the question until another day.

ROADS AND FOOTPATHS.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY (Devon, Honiton): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been directed to the case of "Warminster v. the County of Wilts," reported in the October number of Queen's Bench Reports for 1890, wherein it was held by Justices Charles and Grantham that the word "road" in every case includes footpaths; and whether, as this decision will throw upon County Councils a large additional burden not contemplated at the passing of the Act, he will introduce a short Bill to amend the Local Government Act in this particular?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): My attention has been directed to the decision in question. I must point out that the Local Government Act, 1888, made no change in the law as to what constitutes a main road, that question being governed by the provisions of the Highways and Locomotives Amendment Act, 1878. The decision in the case referred to was in effect as to the interpretation of the term "main road" in that Act, and if an amendment of the law were to be made it would rather be by an amendment of the Highways and Locomotives Amendment Act than of the Local Government Act. I do not gather that my hon. Friend wishes that the law should be amended so as to provide that no footpaths should be maintained by the county. I presume his Question is directed to the footpaths in urban sanitary districts. I am afraid I could not attempt to amend the law to provide that these districts, which are liable for contributing to the cost of the maintenance of footpaths in the country districts, should have no claim for the maintenance of their own footpaths. So far as regards the amount of the expenditure for which the county is to be liable, I may point out that the decision in question would seem to amount to this—that when an Urban Authority have claimed to retain the powers and duties of maintaining and repairing a main road within their district, the county is liable to make an annual payment towards the cost of the maintenance and repair and reasonable improvement connected with the maintenance and repair of the road. If any difference arises between the County Council and the Urban Authority as to the amount of the contribution which should be paid, the question is one which, on the request of either party, may be referred to the arbitration of the Local Government Board.

H.M.S. SERPENT.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will inform the House the number, description, and position of compasses on board the Serpent when she left Plymouth, and where last adjusted; whether any or all of Her Majesty's ships are fitted with Sir William Thomson's compass; and to inquire, if it is the intention of the Admiralty to supplement (and to what extent) the private subscriptions now being made on behalf of the widows and orphans of the crew of the Serpent?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): There were four compasses on board the Serpent, including two of Sir William Thomson's, and they were adjusted and inspected on July 6 and November 8 this year. The compasses were inspected after the manœuvres by the Superintendent of Compasses, and found in excellent order. On the occasion of a subsequent visit to the ship by the Assistant Superintendent of Compasses, the commander expressed his own and the navigating officer's great satisfaction with the behaviour of the compasses during heavy weather in the manœuvres of 1890. Sir W. Thomson's compasses were introduced into the Navy in 1884, and there are now very few of Her Majesty's sea-going ships that have not at least one. Pensions from the funds of Greenwich Hospital will be given to all the widows, and allowances to the children, according to the rating of the husband. In cases in which the men have not left widows or children, but parents or other relatives dependent on them, gratuities will be given not exceeding a year's full wages, exclusive of any extra or additional pay. The payment of these gratuities will either be extended over a period until the whole amount has been paid, or a lump sum will be given at the discretion of the Admiralty if recommended. If the ages of the children are given, some of them could be placed in homes at the expense of Greenwich Hospital, and, if sons, could be subsequently educated at Greenwich Hospital School.

DESTITUTE IMMIGRANTS.

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to a paragraph in Monday's papers, to the effect that on Sunday last there landed at Tilbury Docks, from Hamburg, nearly 300 Polish Jews, most of them apparently destitute, who had been sent to this country by an emigration agency, with branches throughout Russian Poland, which represented to them that work is abundant here; and whether he will take steps to prevent the further recruiting of our already congested labour market by this class of immigrants?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: With the permission of my right hon. Friend I will answer this question. I have been informed by the Chief Commissioner of Police that on Sunday last there were landed at Tilbury Docks from Hamburg 65 passengers, apparently foreign Jews, most of whom had luggage and all of whom proceeded to London; and that on Monday there were landed 40 passengers, also apparently foreign Jews, who proceeded to London. From further inquiry it appears that amongst those who arrived on the Monday were nine sailors, who shipped at once, and 17 out of the whole number have been admitted into the Home for Destitute Jews. The remainder have apparently dispersed in various directions, some having been met at the dock by friends. Inquiries are being made as to the nature and extent of any emigration agencies by which such passengers are sent to this country. Instructions have been sent to the Consul at Hamburg to issue a warning to intending passengers against their relying on the assurances of finding employment when they reach this country.

REGISTRATION OF DEATHS.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that the decennial Reports of the late Dr. Farr showed the number of deaths in each registration district, cause of death, and sex, but that the Report 1871-80 of Dr. Ogle, in lieu of distinguishing male from female, only shows persons; and whether, for the decennial Report 1881-90, the Report of Vital Statistics can be compiled so as to distinguish sex?

*MR. RITCHIE: I find that the change of practice with regard to the decennial Reports referred to was made, and I am giving the matter my consideration.

THE BRITISH NAVAL HOSPITAL AT LISBON.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN (Hythe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if his attention has been called to a paragraph in the Times of 25th November, as follows:—

"By order of the Admiralty, the British Naval Hospital will be sold by auction on the 27th instant. The property has a frontage of 70 metres, and occupies one of the finest sites in Lisbon;"

and whether the statement is true; and, if so, by what authority the Admiralty sells a property, the cost of which has been voted by Parliament, without the sanction of Parliament?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The statement is correct. For years past the maintenance of this hospital and its establishment have been of little or no benefit to the Navy, and therefore it was decided to close the hospital, sell the building, and transfer the establishment to Gibraltar, where it is much wanted. No special authority of Parliament is necessary for the disposal of surplus Government property of this character.

THE LABOUR BUREAU.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether any addition has been made during the present financial year to the staff of the Labour Bureau; whether any, and what, further increase in the staff is now proposed; whether he will state its present exact strength and cost; and whether the Government will take any steps to give greater efficiency to the Labour Statistical Department?

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: No actual addition to the staff engaged on labour statistics has been made during the present year, but proposals for a few additions to the clerical staff and for special arrangements to obtain statistical tables, and a report on the proportion of wages to profits and costs of productions, and for similar reports on kindred subjects, from time to time, are now before the Treasury. The numbers at present exclusively employed on the work are eleven, whose aggregate salaries, including the duty pay of a gentleman who is largely engaged on other work, amount to £1,723. I hope by means of the present staff and the additions now proposed to add materially to both the periodical and occasional publications of the Department. In particular, I look forward to presenting at an early date a Report on profit sharing as well as the Report on wages and cost of production to which I have just referred. This will be additional to the subjects already being dealt with periodically or otherwise.

POSTAL OFFICIALS IN THE PROVINCES.

EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): I beg to ask the Postmaster General when the scheme of revision for the superior postal officials at Newcastle, Bristol, Leeds, and other provincial offices will be announced; and whether it is intended that the date of the application of the scheme to these offices shall take effect from the date of the last published scheme?

*MR. RAIKES: The decision of the Treasury in respect of the three offices named has reached me, and will shortly be carried into effect. The detailed examination of all the large offices in the provinces has occupied much time and labour, and cases are being submitted to the Treasury as fast as circumstances permit. The dates of the application of the various changes will be fixed in consultation with the Treasury.

THE BANK ACT—£1 NOTES.

MR. ERNEST SPENCER (West Bromwich): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the recent serious crisis in the City, and the continual annual strain put upon business by the decrease in the Bank reserve, and constant scarcity of gold, the Government will now consider the advisability of introducing a short Bill to amend the Bank Act of 1844 by the issue of £1 notes against silver, or Consols, or otherwise, in order that it may be in keeping with the present time, and the expansion of business which has taken place since the Act was passed?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I am not prepared at the present moment to make any declaration of policy as regards the Bank Charter Act, nor am I prepared to admit the second part of my hon. Friend's question as a necessary corollary to the first.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I have also to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Government intend to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the whole question of the working of the Bank Act of 1844; if so, when such Royal Commission will be appointed?

*MR. GOSCHEN: No, Sir; we have no such intention. If at any time it should appear to Her Majesty's Government that the arrangements made in 1844 should be altered in any particulars, they would prefer to deal with the matter on their own initiative and responsibility rather than to relegate the matter to a Royal Commission.

THE NEW ARMY WARRANT.

GENERAL FRASER (Lambeth, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if the new Warrant coming into force on 1st January, 1891, definitely decrees that after the Establishment of General Officers is reduced to its future number, promotion to that grade shall only be by selection; if, pending the reduction of General Officers to the future number, it is intended that there shall only be one Senior Colonel promoted to the rank of Major General for every third vacancy that occurs in the Major Generals' List; if so, whether any Colonels who were Field Officers when purchase was abolished, and are still on the Active List, will be precluded from attaining the rank of Major General, owing to the excessive tardiness of this promotion causing them to be retired as Colonels through the Age Clauses; and if, in view of the terms of the Royal Warrant of 1st November, 1871, abolishing purchase and decreeing that all senior qualified officers of every grade shall be eligible for promotion, he will re-consider the terms of the new Warrant?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): From January 1 next the number of General Officers will be gradually reduced till it reaches a fixed limit, after that promotion to Major General will only be by selection to fill an appointment or as a reward for service in the field. Until the General Officers on the Active List are reduced to 100, every second vacancy for promotion to Major General will be absorbed. How far the vacancies not absorbed may fall to Senior Colonels must depend upon circumstances. The number of Colonels who, when purchase was abolished, had purchased rights as Majors will not in January exceed 20. The absorption of vacancies undoubtedly increases the chance that some of these will be compulsorily retired. I presume that the reference in the last question is intended to be to the Royal Warrant of October 30, 1871 (though that is not the Warrant abolishing purchase). In that Warrant it appears to me that the mode of promotion laid down to the rank of Major General was selection. I may add that a Colonel of the class referred to, if injured by compulsory retirement, has a claim to compensation. I do not, therefore, as at present advised, see the special hardship of this class of cases, but I will consider the matter further.

PLEASURE BOATS ON THE SEVERN.

MR. GEORGE ALLSOPP (Worcester): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the Government will introduce a measure during this Session enabling the making, by County and City Councils, of bye-laws controlling the construction and use of pleasure boats and vessels navigating rivers within their jurisdiction, and which would give the Council of the City of Worcester effective control over the construction and use of pleasure boats and vessels navigating the River Severn within or from the City of Worcester, the Local Government Board being of opinion that existing legislation does not authorise the making of such bye-laws?

*MR. RITCHIE: Section 172 of the Public Health Act, 1875, authorises any Urban Authority to licence the proprietors of pleasure boats and vessels, and the boatmen or other persons in charge, and to make bye-laws for regulating the numbering and naming of the boats and vessels, and the number of persons to be carried and the mooring-places, and for fixing rates of hire and the qualification of the boatmen or other persons in charge, and for securing their good and orderly conduct while in charge. When dealing with a Bill for the amendment of the Public Health Act, 1875, it may properly be a matter for consideration whether the powers conferred on Urban Sanitary Authorities by the section referred to should not be enlarged.

BRUSSELS CONFERENCE.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government is able to inform the House as to the present position of affairs relating to the enforcement of the General Act of the Brussels Conference, and whether he will lay the Protocols of the Conference upon the Table of the House; and whether it is true that, unless the Government of the Netherlands affixes its signature to the General Act of the Brussels Conference by the 1st of January next, the deliberations of the Conference for the suppression of the Slave Trade, agreed to by the other sixteen Powers represented at the Conference, will be nullified?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The Protocols will be laid immediately. The present position is that Holland still refuses to sign the Act with the Declarations annexed to it relating to import duties in the Conventional Basin of the Congo. The period during which her signature can be affixed expires at the end of the year.

Mr. George Allsopp

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): Have Her Majesty's Government made, or will they make, any special representations to Holland to induce them to waive their objections, and to give their assent to the Act?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government will do all in their power.

VITU.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on what ground the British Fleet was employed to punish the Sultan of Vitu and the natives for the murder of German traders some months ago; and, whether Vitu at the time of the murder was under German protection?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Germany withdrew her protectorate over Vitu in favour of Great Britain on the 1st of July. Since that date it has ceased to be under German protection. The notification placing it under British protectorate was published on the 25th of the present month. At the time of the murder, therefore, the position was transitional, but as Great Britain had accepted in July the transfer of the protectorate it was unquestionably her duty, and not that of Germany, to inflict punishment for murders of white men committed since that date. Papers on the subject are being prepared and will be laid shortly.

CHRISTIANS IN ASIATIC TURKEY.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, when Papers relating to the condition of the Christians of Asiatic Turkey will be presented to the House; and whether these Papers will contain any recent Reports by Mr. Clifford Lloyd upon the state of the vilayet of Erzeroum?

MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye) had on the Notice Paper the following Question: To ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when the Further Correspondence relating to the Affairs of Armenia will be published?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I will, with the permission of the House, answer at the same time the question of the hon. Member for the Eye Division (Mr. F. Stevenson). These Papers are being prepared, but I cannot make a definite undertaking as to the time at which they will be presented. They will, of course, contain Reports from Mr. Clifford Lloyd.

MR. BRYCE: Are the Papers likely to be ready before Christmas?

*MR. J. FERGUSSON: I am not in a position to say yet when they will be presented.

MR. BRYCE: I will repeat the question on an early day.

COLONIAL LETTER POSTAGE.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can tell the House what has been the general result of his communication with the Colonies respecting the proposed establishment of an uniform 2½d. letter postage, and when the reduced charge is likely to commence in this country?

MR. RAIKES: I am glad to be able to inform my hon. Friend and the House that the most important groups of our Colonies have at length decided in favour of reducing the letter postage in accordance with the scheme announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his last Budget speech. Notwithstanding the inevitable sacrifice of revenue, the several Governments of the Australasian Colonies, the Cape, Natal, the West African, West Indian, and some other Colonies are prepared for the change; and in regard to these I am making arrangements to carry it into effect on the 1st of January next. I have not yet been made aware of the ultimate decision of India and the Asiatic Colonies; but I am hopeful that the difficulties in those quarters may before long be overcome.

THE IRISH MAILS.

MR. LEA: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he is aware that while delays of mails to the North of Ireland have been frequent during the past six months, yet steam communication between Stranraer and Larne has been conducted with reasonable punctuality; and if he has made arrangements for the despatch of mails by this route?

MR. MC CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can state the number of days since 1st July last on which the English mails for Belfast and North of Ireland were late for despatch from Dublin by the mail train leaving there for Belfast at 7.25 a.m.?

*MR. RAIKES: I find that since the 1st of July last the English night mails for Belfast and the North of Ireland have missed the 7.25 a.m. mail train from Dublin on 11 occasions. I have made arrangements for the mails to be forwarded by a special train in future whenever the arrival at Amiens Street Station, Dublin, is after 7.40 a.m. The Post Office has no record of the sailings of the packet between Stranraer and Larne, and the question of adopting this route for the mails for the North of Ireland is now receiving careful consideration.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, considering the notorious fact that the mails are frequently late, he will make an inquiry whether there would not be a material saving of time by the Larne route, and whether proposals have been made to the carrying companies for a service by that route?

*MR. RAIKES: I have already intimated my willingness to consider any proposals which might be made by the Railway Companies controlling this route. Such proposals only reached me about a fortnight ago, and are now the subject of careful consideration and comparison with those made by other companies.

MR. DE COBAIN (Belfast, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, having regard to the increasing frequency of the late arrival and delivery of mails in Belfast and the North of Ireland generally, lately, he has given any further consideration to the question of an accelerated mail service by the Stranraer and Larne route, as placed before him by a large and most influential deputation from the North of Ireland during the last Session of Parliament; and whether, having regard to the serious injury and inconvenience to trade resulting from the present service, he can give some assurance of the matter receiving his early and favourable attention?

*MR. RAIKES: I can assure the hon. Member that the question to which he refers has been constantly kept in view since it was last mentioned in this House. It involves very important issues, and is scarcely yet ripe for decision ; but I hope soon to be in a position to make an announcement on the subject.

DRAINAGE BOARDS IN IRELAND.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is the intention of the Irish Government to introduce this Session a Bill to amend the laws relating to the constitution of Drainage Boards in Ireland ?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am afraid that I cannot enter into any undertaking at the present moment to introduce legislation in the direction of amending the laws relating to the constitution of Drainage Boards in Ireland.

THE LAND PURCHASE ACTS.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will lay upon the Table or assent to a Return giving particulars of the cases in which the Land Commission has received applications from purchasers of their holdings under the Land Purchase Acts, 1885 and 1888, for an extension of the time of purchase or an abatement in the amount of instalments due?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Irish Land Commissioners report that some memorials of the nature in question and of a stereotyped character have been received. I do not see that any public advantage would be gained by laying them upon the Table.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that from several counties in Ireland memorials upon this subject have been presented, and that they are not "stereotyped?"

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir. There have been memorials presented, but I do not know where they came from.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS: Then, are we to have no information in regard to them?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have given the hon. Gentleman all the information in my possession.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): We attach great importance to these memorials and I would ask the right hon. Gentleman if it is not in perfect conformity with official usage, and would it not conduce to convenience to have the documents laid upon the Table?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already given my opinion as to the value of the documents. As to the other question, I will make inquiry, and if I find that it is in accordance with the practice I will grant the Return.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary whether he will lay upon the Table, or assent to a Return, giving particulars of the cases in which the Land Commissioner has obtained decrees of ejectment of purchasers under the Land Purchase Acts, 1885-8, for arrears in payment of their instalments of principal and interest?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If I am made aware of the particulars that are required I will do my best to give them. Ejectment proceedings are not taken against defaulting purchasers by the Irish Land Commissioners; but the holdings are put up for sale. Very few, however, of such cases have occurred. In the cases of upwards of 11,000 tenant purchasers during the five years in which the Act has been in operation, it has been necessary to put up for sale the holdings of 27 only. If the hon. Member will be good enough to place a notice on the Paper detailing the particulars he desires in regard to these holdings, the practicability of granting a Return will be considered.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): Is it the fact that in many cases the rent has been paid out of the purchase money, and that in many cases the landlords have agreed that two years of the purchase money should be set aside for that purpose?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; I have heard nothing of the kind.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: Then you will be made aware of it.

DISTRESS IN IRELAND.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called by the Board of Guardians of Claremorris Union, in the county of Mayo, to the imminence of distress in their district, and if he has made inquiries respecting it; whether the Claremorris Board of Guardians have pointed out to him certain most desirable works capable of conferring vast benefits on the surrounding country, lowering the beds of rivers which now periodically flood the district widely, the River Robe and the River Clare, the lowering of whose beds would afford the employment necessary to avert distress in the most congested portion of that part of the country; and what he proposes to do in the matter? I beg further to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been drawn by the Board of Guardians of Ballinrobe Union, in the county of Mayo, to the urgent necessity of employment in a portion of the Union, from Partry to Tourmakeady, where the potato crop has been destroyed, and other crops also are very inferior; whether the Board of Guardians have suggested to him a work of great importance, and calculated to confer much benefit on the district, viz., the connection of Lough Mask and the river Robe, a work begun 40 years ago, and nearly completed when it was abandoned; and what he proposes to do in the matter? Also whether his attention has been called to the threatened famine in the Ballyglass portion of the Ballinrobe Union, county of Mayo, the potato crop having almost entirely failed there, while the place is too remote from any of the proposed Light Railway schemes to benefit by such works; whether his attention has been called to a very necessary work for that locality, viz., the draining of three small lakes which lie near together, and which in summer time are reduced to unhealthy swamps; whether it has been pointed out to him that the drainage of those lakes is easy of accomplishment, and is a work calculated to afford the employment necessary to relieve the locality from the impending distress; and, what he proposes to do in the matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Government do not apprehend anything of a nature which could be described as famine in the district referred to. I may, however, note there is a railway in process of construction from Ballinrobe to Claremorris. Attention has not been called to the drainage works alluded to.

BOARD OF NATIONAL EDUCATION.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when it is proposed to fill the vacancy at the Board of National Education in Ireland caused by the death of the Rev. Dr. Whigham?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope that the vacancy will be filled up in the course of the next four weeks.

CASE OF HAFFERNAN.

(4.0.) MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I desire to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland a question of which I have given him private notice. I wish to ask whether he has seen a report of the verdict in the case tried yesterday before Mr. Justice Holmes, that of "Haffernan v. Carter and Tuohy," in which the jury found that the firing of the shot was not necessary for the defence of District Inspector Carter and the police? I would also ask whether the Law Officers of the Crown will now institute proceedings against the officer who ordered the shot to be fired, and against the policeman who fired it?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not seen the report to which the hon. Member refers. Perhaps the hon. Member will be kind enough to give notice of a question to the Attorney General for Ireland to whose Department it more properly applies.

SUPPLY.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Resolved, That this House will, tomorrow, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.—(Mr. Jackson.)

EVICTIIONS (LONDON AND SUBURBS).

Address for—

"Return of the number of Warrants issued by Justices under the Act 1 and 2 Vic. c. 74, for recovery of possession of tenements within the Metropolitan Police District during the two years ended the 30th day of September, 1890, showing the number of Cases in which force was required to give effect to the Warrant; the number of Cases in which such force was resisted; and the number of Cases in which such tenant was re-admitted (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 469, of Session 1888)." —(Mr. Knowles.)

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SEED POTATOES (IRELAND) BILL.

(No. 53.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(4.3.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I would appeal to the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) to allow this Bill to stand over for a few days in order that the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant may be in a position to make a statement of the views of the Government on the matter. This course, I believe, will advance the interests the hon. and gallant Member has at heart, and, clearly, the Government will prefer to deal with the matter on their own initiative.

(4.5.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): If the right hon. Gentleman will assure me that in the event of the Government proposals not being satisfactory facilities will be granted me for bringing on my Bill at a later stage, I will willingly accede to the appeal made to me. I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that there is a Motion on the Paper to take away all the time of private Members, and that it is only by a fortunate accident that I have secured an opportunity for bringing on the Bill.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will undertake that an opportunity shall be afforded to the hon. and gallant Member if the proposals of the Government are not satisfactory. I think, however, I can assure the hon. and gallant Member that the measure which will be introduced by my right hon. Friend will be satisfactory to the hon. and gallant Member.

(4.6.) COLONEL NOLAN: The right hon. Gentleman is in the hands of the majority opposite; however, I do not wish to stand in the way of the Government. I think I ought to have a promise that an exception will be made in my favour.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I give the hon. and gallant Member the assurance he desires.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday

MOTIONS.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY BILL.

On Motion of Sir Michael Hicks Beach, Bill to make better provision for the recovery of Tithe Rent-Charge in England and Wales, ordered to be brought in by Sir Michael Hicks Beach, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Chaplin, and Mr. Raikes.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 110.]

(4.7.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I would point out that the notice referring to this Bill was given subsequently to the notice of the Bills of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, as to Irish Land Purchase, and I wish to ask whether the change in the order of priority is to be continuous, whether it is the result of and consultation since Tuesday last, any whether the change is to be taken as having any political significance?

*(4.8.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The hon. Gentleman attaches entirely undue importance to this matter. The Tithe Rent-Charge Bill stood between several Bills of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, and the Government thought it better to get this subject, on which they do not anticipate discussion, out of the way before the Irish Bills are introduced.

(4.9.) MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): As this subject is of interest to my constituents, I desire to put on record my regret that the President of the Board of Trade has not thought fit to make some statement in asking leave to bring in this measure on the present occasion. We have had various measures dealing with tithe rent-charge from the present Government—many of them of so diverse a character that the average intellect has found it difficult to make out what the Government really mean to do. I would warn the Government that if this Bill is not considered satisfactory on this side of the House it will meet with no less opposition than previous Bills on the same subject. I think we should have an assurance that the Bill will be at once printed and circulated amongst Members.

*(4.11.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: It will be printed and circulated to-morrow morning.

*MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will allow some time to elapse before the Second Reading.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I will fix the date for the Second Reading when the Bill has been introduced.

(4.12.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): My hon. Friend (Mr. Sexton) asked if the precedence given to this Bill is to be continuous. We understood that precedence was to be given to the Irish Land Bills.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I understand that the precedence is to be continuous.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then it is altogether contrary to the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury the other evening.

PURCHASE OF LAND AND CONGESTED DISTRICTS (IRELAND) BILL.

(4.13.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am glad to think that it will not be necessary for me on this occasion to occupy at any length the time of the House or to make anything in the nature of a lengthy statement in regard to the Bill I now ask leave to introduce. Broadly speaking, there is no change in the policy which the Government adopted last Session, and in its main outlines the speech which I delivered on the introduction of the Land Purchase Bill in February last would serve for the introduction of the present Bill. But, of course, we have had forced upon our notice the great difficulties—mechanical difficulties, if I may so describe them—which attend the getting of long and complicated measures through this House. We have seen that in the House of Commons, at all events, it is not always the best Bills that survive. It is the shortest Bills that survive; and in view of that fact we have cut the measure brought in last Session into two halves. I will describe very briefly to the House the contents of each of the two Bills which stand in substitution of the Bill brought in last Session. Before doing so let me say that we have introduced a simplification of the procedure of last Session, which, although I do not think it is an improvement in itself, at all events makes the Bill a good deal less cumbersome and complicated. In the Bill of last

Session a good many improvements were attempted on the ordinary machinery of the Ashbourne Acts now in force. In the present Bill we have grafted the new loan upon the old machinery of the Ashbourne Acts, and have thereby considerably shortened and simplified the Bills we now have to ask the House to consider. The first Bill—Bill No. 1—contains two parts. The first part grafts upon the machinery of the Ashbourne Acts loans of stock to the same amount as were proposed to be authorised last Session and under the same safeguards as were contained in the Bill of last Session. We propose to give to the tenants in each county in Ireland power to borrow money for the purchase of their holdings up to 25 years' purchase of the guarantee fund of that county, the guarantee fund in this Bill being precisely the same as the guarantee fund in the Bill we introduced last Session. The new money, therefore, to be lent under Bill No. 1 to the tenants of Ireland—money to be lent against the guarantee stock—is precisely the same as the amount lent against guarantee stock in the Bill of last Session, and is lent under precisely the same limitations, conditions, and safeguards. The Treasury will have precisely the same protection, and the land lords and the tenants will have exactly the same privileges, and precisely the same amount will be paid to the localities. So much for the first part of Bill No. 1. The second part of Bill No. 1 deals with the congested districts, and is practically a redraft of the congested districts portion of last Session's Bill. The two portions of Bill No. 1 contain together only about 20 substantive clauses, and those gentlemen who were not unnaturally alarmed by the bulk and complexity of the measure we brought in last Session I hope will be considerably relieved by seeing it reduced this Session. I ought to say that Bill No. 1, in addition to providing the same loans as were provided for last Session, and in addition to dealing with the congested districts in the manner we dealt with them last Session, provides also by a single clause the giving of fixity of tenure to the Land Commission. It will be seen, therefore, that if Bill No. 1 passes it will contain within itself a very large measure—as large a measure, in fact, of land purchase as the Bill of last Session. It will contain as liberal a method of dealing with the congested districts, and it will give that fixity of tenure to the Land Commissioners of 1881 and 1885 which everybody, I think, to whatever Party in the House he may belong, has always regarded as desirable. Bill No. 2 practically contains those parts of the Bill of last Session which are not contained in the Bill No. 1, which I have just described to the House. Of course, Bill No. 2 is considerably simplified by the fact that we have adopted, without material alteration, the machinery of the Ashbourne Acts; but it contains certain improvements on that machinery. It contains such provisions as the turbary clause of last Session; it contains provisions for dealing with head rent; and it contains, of course, provisions for dealing with perpetual leaseholders. It contains also the scheme we laid before the House last Session for constituting a Land Department. Now, I have broadly explained, with as much detail as I think is required, the procedure that we intend to adopt. I may just add that there are one or two points of, I think, small importance in which we have made alterations in the new Bill. Objection was taken from various quarters last Session to the 20 years' limitation in the Bill we then introduced. That limitation, as the House is aware, was not intended to be any indication on the part of the Government as to the price at which land should be sold in Ireland. It was, however, taken both by the purchasers and the sellers of land as indicating on the part of the Government some opinion as to the value of Irish land. It did not seem essential to our general scheme, and the limitation of 20 years' purchase does not appear in the new draft. [Cheers and cries of "Oh, oh!" from the Irish Members.] I think I hear unmistakable expressions of dissent from hon. Gentlemen opposite. It will be in the recollection of the House when I say that the first and only Amendment proposed to the limit of 20 years' purchase appeared not in the name of any representative of the landlord interest in this House, but in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne (Mr. John Morley). The second point which I call the attention of the House to is almost consequential upon the fact that we have adopted the Ash-

bourne Act machinery. In the machinery we proposed last Session there was a plan by which, in case of difference of opinion between the seller and the purchaser, it was possible, with the consent of both, to appeal to the Land Department to have the price of the holding fixed. That added considerably to the complexity of the Bill. It did not appear to meet with very much favour either in the House or in the country, and that again is not in the Bill now laid before the House. The third alteration in the Bill to which I think it may be advisable to call the attention of the House relates to the 80 per cent. of the fair rent which the tenant has to pay. The House will recollect that by the Bill of last year every purchaser in Ireland was obliged to pay for the first five years after he had purchased a sum of at all events not less than 80 per cent. on his fair rent. At the end of the five years the annuity that he had to pay was reduced, not merely to the normal annuity, but below the normal annuity, so as to make the total amount paid at the end of 49 years equivalent to an annuity of 4 per cent. throughout that period. The general system of land purchase which we adopted last year was criticised last Session from two opposite quarters—both by the Opposition and by critics in the country. Some persons said, "Oh, unless you give the tenant a great deal more he will never buy at all." Others said, "If you give him immediately all that you propose to give him, there will be such pressure put upon the landlords, and such discontent upon those estates where purchase has not taken place, that you will find yourselves involved in even greater agrarian difficulties than those against which you have at present to contend." Well, I am still of opinion that probably the best general arrangement for Ireland is that which I proposed last Session, and that is the arrangement which will be adopted in the first instance under this Bill. But power is given to the Lord Lieutenant, with the consent of the Treasury, under certain circumstances, if he should think fit, to prolong the period during which that 80 per cent. may be paid. ["Oh!"] Let the House make no mistake upon that point. This action of the Lord Lieutenant is always to be prospective, and never retrospective; that is to say, his action cannot interfere with any bargain already entered into. The tenant who has bought on the understanding that he is to pay 80 per cent. on his fair rent for five years, and five years only, will pay 80 per cent. for five years and five years only. But if it should appear to the Lord Lieutenant, from the great run of purchasers, or any other reason, that the five years may be prolonged in future cases of purchase, it will be in his power, subject to the consent of the Treasury, to make that prolongation, the result of which, of course, will be that the tenant will pay 80 per cent. for a longer period than he otherwise would have done, and he will pay his debt back to the Exchequer at a quicker rate. Moreover, when we recollect that all advances under 25 years' purchase of the Guarantee Fund are to be made out of repayments, we thereby enable the purchase to take place more quickly. The result of course will be that in those counties where there is a great desire to buy, and a great rush of tenants to the Land Commission, repayment will be quicker, and more tenants will be able more quickly to take advantage of the boon which the State now offers. Well, Sir, there remain only two points with which I think I need trouble the House. It will be in the recollection of the House that last Session the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) pressed very strongly on the attention of the House his view that we had included in our scheme too many holdings—that the money being necessarily limited in the first instance, we had admitted too many competitors for this public boon, and that we ought to have limited the privilege of purchase to tenants (I think that was his view) under £50 valuation, and in no case to extend it to grazing tenants. Well, I have thought over the proposal of the hon. Gentleman, which I think was advanced in a perfectly practical spirit, and I do not feel myself in a position to go the whole length suggested by him. I think the limit he suggested is too rigid, and would leave outside our Bill, and render discontented with the arrangements proposed under the Bill, very important members of the agricultural community in Ireland. I therefore cannot accept the limitation of £50 valuation which the hon. Gentleman proposed, but I have largely limited the scope of the Bill. I have excluded from it all purely grazing farms, and I have excluded from it all farms on which the tenant does not reside. Our object in this Bill, as the House will readily understand, is to create a class of occupying owners. To sell a holding to a man who does not live upon it is obviously not to carry out the object and intention of the Bill. and I have, therefore, introduced a clause which I hope will meet, to a great degree, the wishes of the hon. Member for Cork, excluding all purely grazing farms and all holdings upon which the tenant does not reside. The only other point, which is, perhaps, the most critical and difficult connected with this Bill, relates to the proposal pressed upon us, not from one quarter of the House alone, but from several quarters, with regard to the powers to be exercised over the operation of the Bill by the localities interested. It will be recollected that the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) speaking for his Party, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) speaking for his Party, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) speaking for his Party, have all independently and powerfully advocated the view that it was not fair, that it was not just, and not in accordance with usage, to prevent localities from having any voice in determining whether or not their own funds should be mortgaged for purposes affecting these localities. I have given my best consideration to the propositions advanced from these quarters, and I have done my very best to balance the arguments pro and con. I must frankly admit to the House that the result of my consideration has not been to convince me that the original framework of the Bill was not the best that could be devised. But let the House remember how the matter stands. As the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, who I think argued his point with greater power and at greater length than any other Member of the House, said, "You are taking funds which belong to the county as much as if they were raised in the county, but without the county's consent, and mortgaging them, and you are giving the benefit of that mortgage to persons not selected by the county and absolutely independent of the county." It is impossible not to feel the enormous force of that objection as it stands. I quite feel that the proposal is not in accordance with the ordinary practice of this House. I quite feel that if a Land Purchase Bill were promoted for England exactly on these lines it is probable, even almost certain, that the House would decide that the Local Authority should have something to say to the mortgaging of its resources. But what are the arguments on the other side? What are the arguments that induced me last Session to bring in a Bill with this provision, and that have again induced me to submit it to the consideration of the House? They are these: I do not think that you ought to consider this question of land purchase in Ireland as a local question at all. We are using British credit, as everybody knows, for the purpose of carrying out what we believe to be a vital reform in the land system of Ireland. We are not doing it primarily for the benefit of this or that county, but for the benefit of the Empire as a whole. And not only are we using British credit without the slightest risk, but we are actually asking Parliament to spend a considerable sum of money in carrying out the scheme, for the House will recollect that the whole cost of the machinery falls upon the Imperial and not upon the local exchequer. The justification of that, which I think is full and ample, is that this is largely an Imperial concern. Very well; you must therefore draw a profound distinction between a scheme of land purchase for the benefit of the several counties in Ireland and a scheme for the benefit of roads, asylums, waterworks, harbours, and other local purposes in that country. These latter are really and truly local purposes, and for these, if Parliament were to propose to mortgage local resources, local consent should first be asked. That is one wide distinction which I draw between the objects of this Bill and the ordinary local purposes subserved by the Local Authorities of the country. There is another consideration which must not be left out. It is a matter of notoriety that the land question has been largely used for political objects—that is to say, agrarian discontent, in many of its aspects of long standing in Ireland, has in recent years

been used by politicians for political objects. I do not put it offensively. Nobody will, I think, deny that; and if it be admitted, and if we are bound to look at the realities of Irish life full in the face, is it not absurd to leave it entirely to local committees to determine whether they shall or shall not adopt a remedy intended to go to the root of the agrarian question? [Laughter from the Irish Benches.] The argument may be a good or a bad one, but I venture to think that it is not a common one; and I am at a loss to understand what has so moved the hilarity of hon. Members opposite. I have briefly endeavoured to recapitulate the reasons on both sides, and, although I freely admit that the reasons against the Bill as it now stands are of a very strong character, I am still of opinion that on the whole the balance of argument lies against giving the control to the localities. That, however, is a question upon which the general opinion of the House must be consulted, and, of course, if there is a strong general feeling in the House against the proposal it will be impossible for us to keep the Bill exactly in its present shape. I have thought over the various methods by which, if a change is to be made, that change might be effected with the least detriment to the Bill as I should like to see it carried through the House. One proposal has been to make the scheme dependent on Local Authorities which are to be hereafter constituted. I think that scheme is impracticable. You cannot load this Bill with a Local Government Bill. You cannot introduce into the Bill a provision for constituting County Councils in Ireland. That is absurd. Very well; if you are going to wait until a Bill constituting County Councils in Ireland is passed, at the rate at which the House of Commons does its business, you will have to wait at least for some months. Now during these months, if this other Bill is passed, you cannot forbid purchase going on. If you put a clause into this Bill saying that County Councils, when they come into existence, are to possess a veto upon its operations, you would find yourselves in the absurd position of allowing a certain number of sales to be effected, after which the County Councils, when constituted, might step in and stop the whole operation. I do not think that that is practicable. If you are to give any local control at all you must give it by way of plébiscite. You must put the matter Ay or No to the ratepayers, and ask them to give, under the safeguard of the Ballot, their verdict, Ay or No. There are obvious advantages in that plan. It would be very undesirable for the County Councils when they come into existence to do more political work or to come more into contact with political controversies than is absolutely necessary. The ratepayers are perfectly competent to give a decision, and there ought to be no difficulty in their adopting the ordinary machinery of Parliamentary elections by means of the Ballot for determining this simple issue. Now, what is the issue that should be submitted? I would ask the House to recollect that the guarantee portion of the fund, which is the fund to be mortgaged for land purchase in Ireland, is divided into two portions—a cash portion and a contingent portion. The cash portion consists of certain subventions from Imperial sources for local purposes, which did not exist three years ago, and which are for the most part allocated to roads and other local purposes. I see no reason why there should, under any circumstances, be any interference by localities allowed with this cash portion of the guarantee. I think we may very well advance the money upon the cash portion of the Guarantee Fund without asking their consent. The contingent portion of the Guarantee Fund is applied to different purposes—such purposes as education, supporting pauper lunatics, and other similar purposes which are scheduled in the Bill of last Session. These purposes are such as the Government have been committed to, they come very near to the local life of the population, and they are purposes which it would be disastrous to stop under any circumstances; and if the kind of compromise which I am now with great diffidence suggesting be adopted, I would recommend the House, if they insist on doing anything, to have this plébiscite applied to the mortgage of the contingent portion, and the contingent portion only, of the Guarantee Fund of each county. I may perhaps have travelled beyond the ordinary province of a First Reading speech in making these suggestions, but I thought I ought to be frank with the House, and to explain why you will find nothing in the Bill of the nature of local control. I thought I was bound to tell the House why, after the best consideration I have been able to give to the subject, I still desire the Bill to remain in the shape in which it is, but I thought it might serve a useful purpose if I threw out in this tentative manner a suggestion which would, in my point of view, be the least pernicious that could be made with respect to giving to the localities any control over the operations of this Bill and the administration of this fund. I do not think that I need add anything more. I did not intend to make, and I hope I have not made, a long speech. I have only given the barest and most naked outline of the small and immaterial changes we have made in our programme. Those changes have been principally in machinery. They have been designed almost entirely to facilitate the passing through this House of a great measure of Land Purchase with due safeguards, and I hope that the House will without undue delay proceed to its consideration.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide further funds for the Purchase of Land in Ireland and to make permanent the Land Commission, and to provide for the improvement of the condition of the Congested Districts in Ireland."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

(4.40.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I am aware that I am taking a somewhat unusual course in proposing that an important Bill of the Government should not be read a first time and submitted to the House, and I feel that it is necessary I should give my reasons for taking that step. I am entirely opposed to this Bill upon its merits, but that is not the main reason which has induced me to bring forward my Amendment, because I am aware that there would be other opportunities for entering a protest upon the Second Reading and on Committee. But I find that the measure is practically the same as that of last Session. The only difference between the two Bills that I can see is that the present one gives a further advantage to the landlords, and reduces to a certain extent the security which the English taxpayers who are to provide the money for carrying out the scheme will have. The right hon. Gentleman, in order to avert opposition, has said that the Bill practically represents merely his own personal opinions, and that he is ready to alter it in any way if there is a consensus of opinion in the House—that is to say, amongst the Liberal Unionists—against its present form. But, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the main fact remains that the Bill, just like the Bill of last Session, pledges English credit. The right hon. Gentleman has not blinked the fact. He has told us that the Bill will pledge British credit for the benefit of the Empire, but its real object is to buy out the English landlords in Ireland. I think it was stated last Session that the amount to be expended at once is £8,000,000, but that is only a very small portion of the liability we undertake. If the plan of the Government is accepted, it will have to be carried out on a much larger scale than was suggested last Session, and the State will become the possessor of all the land of Ireland that is purchased with British credit. Moreover, there will be two classes of tenants in Ireland, one paying a certain rent, and another paying a lesser rent, and from the very fact of paying a lesser rent, becoming the owner of the property at the end of 30 years. There is no such thing as a nominal risk when you advance money, and, with all respect for Irish Members, there is no such thing as nominal risk when you advance money to Irishmen. The right hon. Gentleman says the State has cover in funds which it has in its hands for the maintenance of lunatics, paupers, and so forth, but the right hon. Gentleman admitted that it would be a monstrous thing to withdraw those funds from the objects for which they were intended.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, I did not.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Then I can only say that I am surprised the right hon. Gentleman did not say so, for it would be a monstrous thing, and I cannot imagine that for a moment he would dream of turning loose all the paupers and lunatics in Ireland because the Irish people did not pay something they were called upon to pay without having been asked their opinion on the matter. During the recess a letter was published by Mr. Gregory, who was formerly one of the most eminent lawyers on the Conservative side of the House, and who has had as much as any one to do with mortgages and the transference of land, and Mr. Gregory says that the security offered is one which no private person or public company would accept. There is no doubt that no private person or public company would accept it, because if they did it would not be necessary for Parliament to put its name on the back of the Bill; and, as Parliament does so, the money will be borrowed on our security, and nothing but our security. It is possible that land in Ireland may yet go down in value, as it has done during the last 15 years, and the purchasers may, therefore, be placed in the position of being unable to pay the money, even if they wished to do so. They are not consulted as to the amount, which is to be on the basis of the present rent, and that is regarded in many cases as being most unfair and unjust, so that the purchasers would have a legitimate right to refuse to pay. If they did refuse, what security could the State have? As the Duke of Wellington said, you cannot evict a whole nation. It is admitted on all hands that the Bill does pledge British credit, and before such an enormous liability is undertaken the constituencies ought to be consulted. I have always been under the impression that typical Conservatives hold, even more strongly than we do, that there is a limit to the power of any particular House of Commons or Parliament. When we have protested against the action of the House of Lords they have said that it is one of the advantages we possess in guarding against the House of Commons passing any important measure without consulting the constituencies. In such a case it is considered right for the House of Lords to provoke a dissolution by throwing the Bill out. From a Conservative standpoint this theory acts very well when the Liberals are in office, but when the Conservatives are in power the House of Lords for such a purpose is practically non-existent, and that renders it all the more necessary in this case to take action against the First Reading of the Bill. The case against this Bill is stronger still, because the Ministerialists and the Unionists opposed the Land Purchase Bill of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) on the ground that it involved Imperial credit. [Cries of "Oh!"] Oh, yes, I daresay that hon. Gentlemen opposite want to forget the fact, but it is abundantly proved by their election addresses, of which an interesting collection can be seen at the British Museum. If the right hon. Gentleman opposite and his Party, and the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) and his Party—whatever that Party may be, for I cannot find it—will turn to the addresses of hon. Members at the last General Election, they will find that the Ministerial majority were returned on the distinct understanding that they were opposed to an Imperial guarantee. They may have changed their opinions; but, having got into power on one opinion, they have no right to act upon another without consulting the constituencies. Hon. Gentlemen opposite will therefore see that I am logical in protesting against this Bill, which I regard as contrary to the wishes of the constituencies as expressed at the last General Election. Indeed, in my belief, it is an absolute fraud upon the constituencies; and for these reasons I beg to move the Amendment which I have placed upon the Paper.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is undesirable for this House to entertain any proposal to pledge the credit of the country for the purpose of land purchase in Ireland until the question has been brought before the constituencies, and their assent obtained, at a general election,"—(Mr. Labouchere),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

(4.55.) SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I rise with great pleasure to second the Amendment proposed by my hon. Friend. I think the House is fully aware of the nature of this proposal for land purchase. We have had three great Land Purchase Bills before Parliament in a very short space of time. First there was the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and I suppose the reason why it met with any sort of acceptance on the Liberal side of the House was that it was connected with a great measure for Home Rule. That was the only ground taken up by the Liberal Party for supporting it, but I do not think that even that ground would induce them to support so extensive a measure of land purchase as that which is now submitted. What was the course taken by hon. Gentlemen opposite? Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has told the House that this Bill is virtually the same in spirit and scope and object as that which was brought forward last year, although, as he has stated, its details have been somewhat altered, and, as far as I have been able to make out, they are somewhat worse than they were last year. The noble Lord the Member for South Paddington (Lord R. Churchill), speaking of the Bill of last Session, said—

"This Bill makes the State creditor to the Irish Treasury to the extent of some £40,000,000, an amount which it is contemplated may be doubled, trebled, or quadrupled as years go by."

Then, again, my hon. Friend the Member for Elgin (Mr. Seymour Keay) wrote a pamphlet on that Bill of 1889 in which he said—

"The amount for which the British taxpayer is asked to become liable under this Act and the Ashbourne Acts, supposing that the means could be all raised at 2½ per cent., is more than £162,000,000."

Well, Sir, I ask can there be anything more serious than a measure the effect of which will be to pledge the credit of this country at some future time for so enormous a sum as this? I must say that I know of nothing which has been brought before this House for a long time that is of so much importance as the measure which the right hon. Gentleman has just asked leave to introduce. Last year the Government brought in a measure which proposed to devote the money of the taxpayer to the benefit of the brewers, whereas this year a measure is brought forward by Her Majesty's Government for the benefit of the Irish landlords. It is my belief that if we can only get the country to understand this question the English people will not consent to the Government extorting money from them for the purpose of advantaging the Irish landlords, any more than when the former proposal was made they would permit money to be taken out of their pockets for the benefit of the brewers. The right hon. Gentleman has said the Bill does pledge British credit, and added, speaking quickly as if he were ashamed of the statement, "without any risk to the Exchequer." If there is no risk to the Exchequer why should the guarantee be put into the Bill at all? It is altogether absurd to say there is no risk to the public, and at the same time to put a provision into the Bill for the purpose of giving a guarantee. Why, I ask, is this Bill introduced? I should like to call the attention of the House to this point for a moment. It is surely not because the tenants are badly off in Ireland; because, when I read the speeches made by Unionists and Tories—and I will take for example the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell)—I find them stating over and over again that there are no tenants in the world who are in possession of such privileges as the Irish tenants. It certainly does not appear to me, on the statements of the supporters of the Bill, that any such measure is wanted by the people of Ireland. Not a bit of it; and, on the other hand, I find from the Unionist and Tory speeches that the tenants of Ireland are the most prosperous and contented of any tenantry in the world. I believe that the great majority of the Irish Representatives do not want the Bill. I do not know, however, what course they will take just now. It may not be quite so satisfactory as I might have been led to expect; but, certainly, from what took place last Session, I am inclined to think that the great majority of the Irish Representatives do not want this Land Bill. But I suppose that is the reason why it has been brought in. [Laughter.] Yes; I will tell you why. Last Session we had this Bill—or one like it—before us, and what did Lord Derby say on that occasion? Speaking on the 9th of April in the present year, Lord Derby said—

"I have no hesitation in expressing approval of the principle on which the Irish Land Purchase Bill is founded. The opposition offered to it by the Irish Nationalist Party is, to my mind, an argument in its favour."

There can be no doubt that this measure, if passed, will enormously increase the indebtedness of this country, and for no good purpose that I can see; yet it is for this object that we have been summoned here in the depth of winter from our happy homes. I am afraid there is still on the part of some of my right hon.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

Friends on the Front Opposition Bench a sneaking kindness for Land Bills. We shall hear some of them, I hope, before the night is over, and I trust that we shall have from them some clear deliverances on the subject. But I cannot help being a little afraid. Why should they go on with these Land Bills? Why, Sir, they are sitting on that Bench mainly because they brought in a bad Irish Land Bill, and I can assure them that they will never sit on the Bench opposite through the support they may give to a very bad Bill now. My hon. Friend below me has pointed out that you are going to make the taxpayers of this country virtually the landlords of Ireland. Can anything be worse than that? I will give you the words of a very great statesman. They are words which were quoted in a Liberal Unionist publication, and spread widecast through the country. When I have read them, I will tell you the name of the great statesman who used them. He said—

"Working men of England and Scotland, you will have to evict the tenants, you will have to collect your rents at the point of the bayonet, and prepare to be a party to such contingencies. British credit, built up as it has been by past generations, is a precious reserve to be held for times of need and necessity, and I will not anticipate it for the benefit of Irish landlords."

I hope to hear the same noble and patriotic words from my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham again. Why should he or anyone be anxious to devote the money, the hard-earned money of the people of this country for any such purpose as this? Why are we to buy the Irish landlords out? Let me quote one sentence from the Manchester Guardian. It is a journal which does not agree with my view. It is in favour of some sort of land purchase, and here is one sentence which I read in an article arguing the case—

"The West cannot support landlords, and the landlords must be bought out on fair but not unreasonable terms."

The land cannot support them there. They are carrying on a bankrupt business, and you are to buy them out on fair terms. Fair terms for a bankrupt business mean nothing at all. These landlords are very unfortunate men I admit. They have lived a long time by letting land. That is their business. The letting of land has become a bad business, an entirely bankrupt business in some parts of the country. They can make nothing out of it. And then they come to Parliament and say, "Because our business is bankrupt you must buy it up for us with the taxpayers' money." You might just as well buy up all post-horses because the posting business has gone wrong. Why should these landlords be treated on a different footing to any other traders? I would like to know that, and I would like to have an answer to-night. What is the use of a landlord? I am a landlord myself. I never found out what use I was. I ask my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle what is the use of landlords? If he cannot tell me, my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham can. He will tell me that he is a man "who toils not, neither does he spin." I have no animosity to Irish landlords. But I do say that the only people who are of any use in the country are those who produce wealth, not the people who put the money into their pocket. These Irish landlords, of all people, what have they done for us? Why, we are at this moment in all sorts of trouble and perplexities because we have been governing Ireland in the interests of the landlords. Instead of government of the people by the people for the people, it has been government of the landlords by the landlords for the landlords. Let me quote a paper highly valued on the other side—the Times. What did it say of the Irish landlords in the year 1852?—

"The name of an Irish landlord stinks in the nostrils of Christendom."

What have the Irish landlords done since 1852? If they were so bad then, what great service have they done since 1852 that we should be called upon to give them such large sums of money? I know of nothing they have done except support Her Majesty's Government. Of course the Government say: "We will support those who support us. Whether they are sugar refiners, brewers, clergymen, or landlords, if they vote straight they shall have money given them." It is all right. It is the Tory system, of course, which puts the money of the many into the pockets of the few. Here, in an Autumn Session of an old Parliament, we are called upon by the very men who up hill and down dale opposed it at the General Election to pass this Bill. I say it is one of the most monstrous proceedings ever indulged in in the British House of Commons. You talk about the mandate of the country. I know I have no mandate except to oppose such nefarious schemes tooth and nail, and I will do so. I say, if there be a Liberal Party left in this House, it is its duty to oppose clause by clause, line by line, and letter by letter, a measure which is designed to squander national property in a reckless, rash, and, I should say, in a nefarious manner.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill to provide for the purchase of Land in Ireland and to make permanent the Land Commission, and to provide for the improvement of the condition of the Congested Districts in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Arthur Balfour, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 111.]

LAND DEPARTMENT (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Arthur Balfour, Bill to constitute a Land Department, and to amend the Laws relating to the Purchase of Land in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Arthur Balfour, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 112.]

TRANSFER OF RAILWAYS (IRELAND) BILL.

(5.30.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have to move for leave to bring in a Bill to authorise the transfer of the powers of promoters of Railway and Tramway Undertakings, under the Tramways (Ireland) Acts, to certain existing Railway Companies; and for other purposes. Perhaps I may be allowed one word of explanation in regard to it. The Bill is a very small one, but it is required to effect certain technical alterations in the Railway Act of 1889. Under that Act both persons and Railway Companies had a right to promote railways and to obtain presentments, and a certain number of individuals surveyed lines and obtained the necessary presentments. But the policy of the Government of the House has been to induce Railway Companies to become responsible for the working of the lines, and the whole object of this Bill is to enable the powers under pre-southern parts obtained by individuals to be transferred to the Railway Companies. The measure is of great importance in view of the existing, or approaching, distress in parts of Ireland, because, if carried, it will enable the Kerry line to be proceeded with at once, and will be useful also in other parts of the country.

Bill to authorise the transfer of the powers of promoters of Railway and Tramways Undertakings, under the Tramways (Ireland) Acts, to certain existing Railway Companies; and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Arthur Balfour and Mr. Jackson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 113.]

PRIVATE BILL PROCEDURE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of the Lord Advocate, Bill to amend the Procedure in regard to Private Bills relating to Scotland, ordered to be brought in by the Lord Advocate, Mr. William Henry Smith, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 114.]

PLACES OF WORSHIP (SITES) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. John Ellis, Bill to give further facilities for the acquisition of Sites for Places of Worship, ordered to be brought in by Mr. John Ellis, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. Burt, Mr. M'Arthur, and Mr. Henry J. Wilson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 115.]

RAILWAY SHAREHOLDERS (LICENSING SESSIONS) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Maclure, Bill to remove the disabilities of Railway and other Shareholders in Public Companies to act at Licensing Sessions, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Maclure, Mr. Fielden, Mr. Hermon-Hodge, Colonel Laurie, Sir Edward Watkin, and Mr. Byron Reed.

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Sir John Lubbock, Bill to amend the Metropolis Management Act in regard to the election and qualification of vestrymen, the alteration of wards of parishes, and to certain sanitary matters, ordered to be brought in by Sir John Lubbock, Earl Compton, Mr. Lawson, and Mr. James Stuart.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 117.]

BRINE PUMPING (COMPENSATION FOR SUBSIDENCE) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Brunner, Bill to provide Compensation for owners of property suffering through the subsidence of the ground caused by the Pumping of Brine, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Brunner, Colonel Cotton-Jodrell, Mr. Tollemache, Mr. Jennings, and Mr. M'Laren.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 118.]

Mr. A. J. Balfour

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Warmington, Bill to render the accounts of Friendly Societies and Benefit Building Societies subject to a Government audit, and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Warmington and Mr. Randell.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 119.]

BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Peter M'Donald, Bill to amend the Law of Bankruptcy in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Peter M'Donald, Mr. Sexton, Mr. John Redmond, Mr. M'Cartan, Mr. Thomas Dickson, Mr. Lane, Dr. Commins, Mr. John O'Connor, and Mr. John Barry.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 120.]

POOR LAW BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Alfred Thomas, Bill to amend the Poor Law, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Alfred Thomas, Sir Walter Foster, Mr. Abraham, and Mr. Conybeare.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 121.]

BEER ADULTERATION (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Quilter, Bill for better securing the purity of beer, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Quilter, Mr. Heneage, Viscount Wolmer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Mr. Herbert Gardner, Mr. Francis Stevenson, Mr. Gurdon, Colonel Lloyd Anstruther, and Mr. Llewellyn.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 122.]

TRUST COMPANIES' BILL.

On Motion of Sir Horace Davey, Bill to enable incorporated Companies to act as executors, administrators, and trustees, and in other fiduciary capacities, ordered to be brought in by Sir Horace Davey, Mr. Osborne Morgan, Colonel Makins, and Mr. F. W. Maclean.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 123.]

BUILDING LANDS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Munro Ferguson, Bill to deal with the Purchase of Land by Local Authorities in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Munro Ferguson and Mr. Haldane.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 124.]

ACCUMULATIONS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Birrell, Bill to amend the Law relating to Accumulations, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Birrell, Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Mr. Elton, and Mr. Neville.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 125.]

ACCESS TO MOUNTAINS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Bryce, Bill to secure to the Public the right of Access to Mountains and Moorlands in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Bryce, Mr. Joseph Bolton, Sir Horace Davey, Mr. Crawford, Mr. Haldane, Dr. Farquharson, Mr. Leng, and Sir Henry Roscoe.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 126.]

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 28th November, 1890.

MR. SPEAKER'S CONTINUED ABSENCE.

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House that Mr. Speaker was again unavoidably prevented from taking the Chair of the House this day.

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

QUESTIONS.

YIELD OF CROPS IN INDIA.

MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Reports of the crop experiments conducted throughout India have been communicated to the Secretary of State from time to time; whether any Abstract is prepared by the Government of India, or by the India Office, showing the average yield of crops per acre throughout the different districts as deduced from the crop experiments or from other sources; and whether he will lay upon the Table any Papers containing information on this subject?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): My answer to the first question of the hon. Member is, Yes; the answer to the second question is, No. But a suggestion has been made to the Secretary of State to the Government of India that a table of the average yield of the principal crops in the various districts should be prepared. In reply to the third question of the hon. Member, I may say that the information is contained in many Annual and Special Reports, such as are noticed at pages 122 and 123 of the last Moral and Material Progress Report. The Secretary of State does not think it necessary to lay these Reports en masse on the Table.

VOL. CCCXLIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

THE INDIA-CHINA OPIUM TRAFFIC.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that the Indian Government is arranging for an additional supply of opium to be prepared for consumption in India in consequence of the falling off of the demand for China; and whether he will communicate with the Indian Government and prohibit this policy if it is found to be in contemplation?

*SIR J. GORST: My noble Friend the Secretary of State informs me he has no reason to think that any such policy as that described in the question is contemplated by the Government of India.

TELEGRAMS.

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if it is the rule of the Telegraphic Department of the General Post Office to refuse to compensate persons for loss or expense consequent on the loss, delay, or non-delivery of a telegram, and to refuse to communicate to the person injured the names of the defaulting office or officials?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES, Cambridge University): If the hon. Member will be so good as to refer to Clause 6 of the notice which is printed on the back of the forms on which the public write their telegrams, he will find an answer to the first part of his question. The clause reads as follows:—

"6. The Postmaster General will not be liable for any loss or damage which may be incurred or sustained by reason or on account of any mistake or default in the transmission or delivery of a telegram."

As to the latter part of the hon. Member's question, I may say that it is not the practice to give the names of the subordinate officials concerned in the transmission of a telegram or to name the office where a mistake may have occurred. Indeed, in a great many cases it would be impossible to do so, as it cannot always be ascertained with certainty where the fault has occurred or whether it is not due to some momentary disturbance of the wires or other apparatus. The conduct of any defaulting officials is always made the subject of strict inquiry by the Department.

LOCAL TAXATION (EXCHEQUER CONTRIBUTIONS.)

MR. HOBHOUSE: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board when the Return, Local Taxation (Exchequer Contributions), ordered 24th July last, will be presented to the House?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I am unable at present to state when the Return referred to will be presented, but every effort will be made to furnish it as early as possible. In several cases the information required has not yet been received, notwithstanding repeated applications, and in a large number of instances where the Returns furnished appeared to be incomplete or inaccurate it has been necessary to send them back for amendment.

BOARD SCHOOL ATTENDANCE IN LONDON.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Council whether he is aware that, in several of the Board schools under the London School Board, the percentage of attendances to number of boys, girls, and infants on the roll, has been a decreasing percentage during the years 1888, 1889, and 1890; whether he can state if this decrease of attendance is exceptional, or whether it is general in the London School Board district; whether similar decrease in attendance has been brought to his attention in other School Board districts; whether any and what reason has been reported to him to account for such decrease; and whether the Education Department proposes to take any action in the matter?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): There has, I believe, been some decrease in certain schools within the metropolitan area, but it appears to be due to local and accidental circumstances rather than to any general cause, for the percentage throughout the whole of the London district has been steadily improving since 1887, and for this year stands higher than at any previous time.

THE CLYDE NAVIGATION.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware of the discovery of a bank more than one mile in length in the fairway of the Clyde navigation; whether the depth at that part marked on the Admiralty chart was from 29 to 19 fathoms, and is now reduced by this bank to a depth of from 6½ fathoms to 9 fathoms; and if he can state what steps are taken to put an end to such continued pollution?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I am informed, by the Board of Trade that owing to the position not having been closely surveyed, a bank with less than 6 fathoms has been recently discovered by the Admiralty and the Clyde Lighthouse Trust—a little to the south of Cioch Point—where the Admiralty chart showed deep water. With reference to the last part of the hon. Member's question, I understand that an action is in course of being raised for the purpose of obtaining an interdict against the deposit of dredgings in Loch Long.

INSANITARY STATE OF FACTORIES AT BOW.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the Inspector of Factories for the Poplar district has had his attention called to the insanitary state of the factories in the close vicinity of the Glaucus Street Board School, Bow Common; whether the health of the teachers and children is reported to be affected thereby; and what, if any, action has been taken to abate the alleged nuisance?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Chief Inspector that on the occasion of a recent visit of the District Inspector to the school in question, complaints were made of offensive smells, presumably proceeding from factories and works in the neighbourhood, and of indisposition arising therefrom. The Inspector thereupon visited various works with the view of detecting the origin of the nuisance, and he has advised the authorities of the school to address themselves to the Local District Board, who will no doubt take action in the matter. The question is one for the Sanitary Authority.

MR. BRADLAUGH: In view of the answer given by the Home Secretary may I ask the Vice President of the Council whether the Education Department will make any inquiry into the matter?

SIR W. HART DYKE: Yes, it seems to me to be a case for the consideration of the School Inspector, and I will see that proper representations are made to him on the subject.

FOREIGN FRUIT.

MR. H. T. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that consignments of fresh foreign fruit are constantly made in this country, packed in English packages, with the names of English salesmen upon them, and sold as English fruit; that the Board of Customs having been applied to to detain such consignments, under the 16th clause of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, declined to do so, on the ground that the requirement under that section—

"That the name of a trader in the United Kingdom should be accompanied by a definite indication of the country of manufacture," applies only when such name is borne on goods of foreign manufacture, and not to raw produce such as fruit; and whether, having regard to the fact that the word "goods" in the said Act is defined by Section 3 to mean

"Anything which is the subject of trade, manufacture, or merchandise," he will ascertain if this decision was in accordance with the existing law; and if it is, whether he will take steps, by amending the Merchandise Marks Act of 1887, or otherwise, so as to bring transactions such as these within its scope?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): No, Sir; I was not aware of the facts alleged in the question, but having consulted the Commissioners of Customs, I am informed: "(1) That fruit imported into this country packed in a particular manner or in a particular shape would not be amenable to the Merchandise Marks Act merely on account of the mode of packing or the shape of package; (2) that mere address marks on outer packages are not treated as coming within the operation of the Act; and (3) that the requirement under Section 16 of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, that the name of a dealer in the United Kingdom should be accompanied by a definite indication of the country in which the goods were made or produced applies only where such name is borne on articles of foreign manufacture, and not when it is borne on packages of raw produce such as fresh fruit. But in any cases where the name of a dealer in this country on the package was not a mere address mark, but could be held to give a British character to the fruit, the fruit could be dealt with under Section 3 of the Act." Under these circumstances, I do not think it is necessary to propose any amendment of the existing law.

IRELAND—PURCHASES UNDER THE ASHBOURNE ACTS.

MR. KEAY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the proceedings at recent meetings of tenant purchasers of holdings under the Ashbourne Acts, who have bought from the Duke of Leinster, the Marquess of Bath, the Marquess of Waterford, and others, and who are now agitating for the postponement of the annual instalments which they owe to the State; whether he will state the total amount of rental on each of these estates respectively which formed the basis of the calculation on which the purchases were effected, and whether he will state the total amount of rent actually paid on each of these estates by the tenants who purchased their holdings during the five years preceding the date of purchase, and the amount of arrears which had accumulated at the time of such purchase?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I understand that in some instances tenant purchasers have asked that the repayment of their purchase annuity should be extended over a greater period than the existing statutable one, or that payment of this year's instalment be deferred until the expiration of that statutable period. For particulars as to the area, rental, valuation, and purchase money of the properties sold, I would refer the hon. Member to the special Parliamentary Returns on the subject—namely, No. 81 of Session 1889, and No. 115 of Session 1890. For additional particulars in regard to the sale of the Leinster estate, I would refer to my reply to a question put by the hon. Member for South Kildare on August 14th last (Hansard, Third Series, vol. 348, p. 970), where it is shown that the late Very Rev. Dr. Kavanagh, P.P., who conducted the negotiations on behalf of the tenants, wrote to the Irish Land Commissioners that the tenants were free contracting parties; that they had made excellent bargains; that their rents were low; and that the purchase would reduce these rents by 25 per cent. I may now further add that of the 348 tenant purchasers on this estate all have paid their annuities due May 1, 1890, except two, and their indebtedness does not exceed £20. The guarantee deposits amounting to upwards of £50,000 are untouched. The Commissioners have no record in regard to the subject matter of the last paragraph.

MR. KEAY: Arising out of the reply of the right hon. Gentleman, may I ask how it is that, without any regard to the amounts of the rents actually paid and of the arrears unpaid, the Commissioners have found themselves able to perform their duties under the provisions of the Act?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not see how that question arises out of my answer; but I will make inquiry.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): As it affects the question of the Land Purchase Bill, will the right hon. Gentleman place on the Table a Return showing up to the present time the number and extent of the farms in reference to which intending purchasers have applied to the Government for a relaxation of the terms of the Act?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; I do not think anything would be gained by that.

ANGLO-PORTUGUESE AGREEMENT.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will lay upon the Table Papers containing the Agreement of 20th August between Great Britain and Portugal, Correspondence relating thereto, and the modus vivendi recently concluded between the two Powers?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The Papers referred to are being prepared, and will be laid on the Table very shortly.

THE TAUNTON ACCIDENT.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether it is intended to take steps to prosecute the Railway Company for the deaths and injuries caused at Taunton by the signals being left in charge of an aged and incapacitated man?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I understand that the Coroner's Return giving the verdict of the jury in the case referred to has not yet been received by the Home Office, but no facts have been brought to my notice which would lead me to adopt the description which the hon. Member uses of the man who was in charge of the signals. The Report of the Inspecting Officer on the accident has to-day been laid before me. While I do not think the circumstances at all justify a prosecution, I intend to call the attention of the company to grave infringement of their regulations, which contributed to the accident.

THE CASE OF COLONEL MITCHELL.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will lay upon the Table of the House a copy of the Affidavits filed by a Retired Officer of the Royal Engineers in the Court of Queen's Bench, and on which a rule nisi for mandamus v. Secretary of State for War was obtained 17th November, 1890; and whether he intends to give effect to official recommendations of the Duke of Cambridge and Attorney General, to make a payment to this Officer, and thus end this protracted litigation?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I am not prepared to lay on the Table any Papers as to which legal proceedings are pending, or to give any information as to recommendations which may have been made to me relative to Colonel Mitchell. When the last action brought by Colonel Mitchell was decided against him, an appeal ad misericordiam was made to me not to press for the costs of the War Office. Colonel Mitchell having given an undertaking that the litigation was at an end, I consented to this course, in spite of which he has immediately commenced another action.

THE DEFENCES OF THE FORTH.

SIR DONALD CURRIE: I wish to put a question to the Secretary of State for War of which I have given him private notice. I wish to know whether, in connection with the defences of the Firth of Forth, the Government have made arrangements for the purchase of the Island of Inchkeith, and for the construction of a pier?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Yes; it is our intention to go on with the acquisition of the Island of Inchkeith, and we propose to proceed under the Defences Act for the purpose of obtaining that island. When we have obtained it, I have no doubt that one of the works that will be carried out will be the construction of a pier.

IRISH PRIVATE BILL LEGISLATION.

MR. MATTHEW KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state when it is proposed to introduce the Bill dealing with Private Bill Legislation for Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This must depend upon the progress made in the disposal of the Irish and other legislative business now before the House.

THE CONVICTION OF MR. WALSH.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland why the warrant upon the conviction of Mr. Walsh, of the Cashel Sentinel (now in Clonmel Gaol), for publication in his newspaper, has not been issued; and what is the power which enables the Executive to suspend warrants or secure their non-issuance or non-signing after sentence?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): The Inspector General reports as follows:—

"The warrant referred to will be lodged to take effect at the expiration of Mr. Walsh's imprisonment. This is the usual course in the absence of the warrant providing that the sentence should run concurrently with that under which Mr. Walsh is now in gaol."

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the last question, namely—"What is the power which enables the Executive to suspend warrants, or secure their non-issuance or non-signing after sentence?" Is this warrant signed and in vigour, and, if so, why was it not enforced?

MR. MADDEN: The question as to the Executive does not arise. There was no special intervention of the Executive, but the usual course was followed.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I want to know by what authority the warrant was held over. Was it by the authority of the police?

MR. MADDEN: If the hon. and learned Gentleman wishes to know on what date the warrant was actually signed, that is a different question to the one on the Paper, and I will answer it if the hon. and learned Member will put it down.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I will do so on Monday.

CORONER FOR TIPPERARY.

In reply to Mr. HARRISON (Tipperary, Mid),

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said: I have not had time to make myself acquainted with the facts in connection with the approaching Election of Coroner for Tipperary; but it does not rest with me to make the arrangements. I believe that it rests with the Sheriff.

DEATH OF MR. JUSTICE LITTON.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): May I ask whether there is any truth in the report that Mr. Justice Litton, Chief of the Land Commission, is dead?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I deeply regret to say that the report is true.

MOTIONS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

*(3.50.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): In rising to move—

said: Mr. Deputy Speaker, I hope I may again press upon the House the grounds upon which I urge the Motion of which I have given notice, and I trust and believe that it will meet with the universal acceptance of the House. I believe it will also be for the convenience of the House itself. In addition to that, I may refer to the practice which has prevailed during the last ten years when there has been an Autumn Session. I find on reference that on no occasion on which the House has sat at this period of the year has it been customary for private Members to retain the undiminished exercise of those privileges to which they attach, and rightly attach, great value, notwithstanding the fact that they have frequently been unable to keep a House when their Bills have been brought on. It is a singular fact that I am not making any innovation on the practice of the House for the last ten years. In 1882 there was an Autumn Sitting, which was simply an adjournment of a previous Session, and in that year the Government of the day took possession of the whole time of the House until the questions submitted to it had been disposed of. In the year 1884 the House assembled for an Autumn Session, and the Government carried a Motion that the Bills which were put down for the consideration of the House on that occasion should take precedence of all other Notices of Motion and Orders of the Day on every day on which they were set down on the Paper. Again, in 1888, a similar practice prevailed. I am therefore fortified by the practice of the House, a practice which I believe is justified by its convenience, and we may by these means dispose of the business which has called us together at this inconvenient period of the year as rapidly as possible, consistently with due consideration of the important questions which will be submitted to the House. We hold that these questions are as important as any in regard to which the same privileges have been accorded and the same demand has been made on former occasions. We hold that the consideration of the very grave question of land purchase in Ireland is one which deserves the most serious and undivided attention on the part of the House, and one the consideration of which ought not to be postponed for an indefinite period. There is also another consideration which I wish to impress on the House, and it is that if we are able—as I hope we shall be able—to make considerable progress with these measures on this occasion, we shall diminish the necessity for demanding from the House facilities which have been previously necessary. I base my recommendation to the House on the ground of greater convenience, and on the ground of the necessity which exists for facilities in order that the House may be able to deal properly and with full consideration with the grave questions before it. I trust I have said enough to recommend this Motion to the consideration of the House, and that it will find support on both sides of the House.

(3.55.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): May I ask whether it is proposed to take the Second Reading of the Tithe Bill or that of the Land Purchase Bill first?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have already stated that the Tithe Bill will be read a second time on Monday and the Land Bill on Tuesday. I think the hon. Member will see that it would be hardly possible to take the Second Reading of the Land Purchase Bill on Monday, considering the importance of it.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

(3.56.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I see with pleasure that the right hon. Gentleman has, notwithstanding previous disappointments, come back among us as sanguine as ever. But really I do believe that if the right hon. Gentleman were to continue the leader of the House for a sufficient number of years he would do his very best to absolutely suppress the rights of private Members. The right hon. Gentleman has said that the course he has proposed is usual, but for my part I assert that it is entirely unprecedented. If a Session—it may be an Autumn

Session—is called for a specific purpose and is a separate Session, I can understand the Government taking the whole of the time of the House, but this is the beginning of the ordinary and normal Session, and it is fully understood that the only object of commencing so early on this occasion is that the House may be able to rise at an earlier period than usual next year. The right hon. Gentleman now comes down when the Autumn Session has commenced, and he at once asks that the Government shall take the whole time of the House. It is true that this course has been taken before with regard to a particular Bill, or one of the stages of an important Bill, which it was desirable to pass, but the right hon. Gentleman has not presented his Motion on any such grounds. He does not ask for the time of the House in order that we may pass this or that Bill, but he asks for the whole time of the House up to Christmas for the general business of the Government. I maintain that I am justified, therefore, in saying that the course proposed is unprecedented. It is difficult to satisfy the right hon. Gentleman. Seeing how quickly the Address has been disposed of this Session compared with former occasions, I think the right hon. Gentleman, instead of making a piteous appeal to us for the time of private Members, should have shown his gratitude for the attitude which has already been taken by the House this Session. We took compassion upon the right hon. Gentleman. [Laughter from the Ministerial Benches.] It seems that we can never satisfy him. Gentlemen opposite. If we discuss the Address at any length they complain, and if we pass it after a Debate of an hour and a half they jeer at us. We have been asked repeatedly to give sufficient rope to the right hon. Gentleman, and as we have now done so we should expect that he would get up and say, "It is true that at the commencement of the Session we intended to take up the whole time of the House, but having regard to the fact that the debate on the Address only lasted for a few hours, I will not now move the Motion." We have heard a good deal about the great distress in the West of Ireland, and if the right hon. Gentleman had asked for the time of the House in order to pass a Bill to relieve that great distress, and had shown due cause for such relief, undoubtedly Radical Members would not have opposed the measure. The right hon. Gentleman, however, wants all the time of the House in order to pass a Tithe Bill and a Land Purchase Bill before Christmas. Well, I just now asked the right hon. Gentleman which he was going to take first, because I did not believe he was going to take the Tithe Bill at once before the Irish Land Bill, considering how much we have heard about the necessities and requirements of Ireland. Why does he take the Tithe Bill? The House will remember what occurred last Session. Perpetually when the right hon. Gentleman was explaining the course of business, the distinguished son of a distinguished Peer who is Prime Minister used to come down and say, "Well, but what about the Tithe Bill?" It would seem that this Tithe Bill is a special favourite of the Prime Minister's. The Prime Minister is a Churchman first and a statesman afterwards. The Prime Minister wants the Tithe Bill, and he has imposed his will on those unfortunate gentlemen who are bound to obey it, and insists that hon. Members are to be called away from their "happy homes" in order to pass this Bill, as if there were any reason for hot haste in giving further facilities to the clergy to obtain their tithes. Right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite may be the humble servants of the Prime Minister, but we are not. Incidentally, I may tell the right hon. Gentleman the leader of the House that never did he indulge a more sanguine anticipation than the notion that this Bill will be passed in one day. Why, the Welsh Members alone are pretty fair stayers in debate, and these gentlemen themselves are strong enough, without any interference by English Members, to devote, as they certainly ought, three days at least to explaining their views with regard to the Bill. As to the Land Purchase Bill, I look upon it as one of the grossest frauds ever perpetrated on the taxpayers. I regard it as a most unjust and improper thing that that Bill, after the assurances given by gentlemen opposite at the last election, should be passed in the present Parliament, and so far as I am concerned, and others will act with me, I will not give facilities of any sort or kind for passing that Bill. The right hon. Gentleman says he hopes that the passing of this Resolution will render it unnecessary for him to ask for the time of private Members later on. I have no doubt he thinks that, and means what he says; but last Session the right hon. Gentleman assured the House that the Estimates should be brought on and discussed at an early period. The right hon. Gentleman found it impossible consistently with his duty to his God, his Queen, and his country, to fulfil that pledge, and he will find it equally impossible to fulfil the pledge he has given now, that by taking the time of the House at the beginning it will be unnecessary to make demands upon the privileges of private Members later in the Session. If the right hon. Gentleman brings on Vote on Account after Vote on Account we shall be bound, after what occurred last Session, to discuss every item for which the money is granted, whether the discussion takes six weeks or twelve months. Last Session I declined to discuss the Estimates. They were brought on at the end of the Session, or within a few days of the end of the Session, and passed without any sort of discussion, because I and others on this side of the House would not take part in the farce of discussing the Estimates in a day or two after most of the Members had left town. The right hon. Gentleman last Session took nearly the whole of the time of the House, and he muddled the time away. He brought forward three different Bills that knocked against each other in such a way that one Member of the Government obstructed another, the result being that nothing was done. This Session the right hon. Gentleman has begun by muddling, precisely as he did last Session. Parliament was called together on Tuesday; the last three days have been simply wasted, and to-day the time of the House is to be taken away from private Members, not even to discuss the important Tithe Bill or the important Land Bill, but a Tenancies Rating Bill and a Pollen Fisheries Bill—what a “pollen” is—whether a fish or a river or a method of fishing—I confess I do not know. Why is it that the right hon. Gentleman adopts this system of taking away the time of private Members? I have always thought the right hon. Gentleman an exceedingly astute Member of the House. [“Hear, hear.”] Yes, you agree with me because you know he always manages to take hold of the time of the House and prevent private Members bringing on Resolutions. Why does he do that? Because he knows that Resolutions might be brought forward from this side of the House on which it would be exceedingly difficult for Liberal Unionists to vote. They would find themselves in a difficulty between their duty to the Government and their pledges to their constituents. I believe, Sir, that our time is taken away, not for the benefit of the Government, but for the benefit of the Liberal Unionists. I shall go to a Division against the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman. I will make two suggestions to the right hon. Gentleman. The first is, that he will be kind enough not to treat Members of the House of Commons as school-boys. The right hon. Gentleman gets up and says, “If you don’t do this and that I shall shorten your holidays.” The only reason why some Members on the Opposition side ask about holidays sometimes is for the sake of the right hon. Gentleman himself. We observe that he often looks a little fagged from his work, and we have thought a holiday would set him up; but as far as Radical Members are concerned, they are ready to sacrifice every holiday rather than sacrifice one inch of their principles. [Laughter.] Hon. Members opposite laugh. They do not understand making sacrifices for principle. I, however, am explaining our creed, not that of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and I can understand their ridiculing the idea of anyone being such fools as to do such a thing. The other suggestion I would offer to the right hon. Gentleman is that he should not waste time by addressing homilies to hon. Members on what they are doing. We are here to oppose Bills which we consider injurious. If our action met with the approval of the right hon. Gentleman, we should not have the approval either of our constituents or of our own consciences. However much we value the approval of the right hon. Gentleman, we cannot sacrifice the approval of our consciences for anything of the sort. If, then, the right hon. Gentleman is so anxious not to waste the time of the House let him avoid casting his pearls before — [Laughter.] Yes, that is what hon. Gentlemen on the other side think of hon. Members who sit upon this side. I shall certainly go to a Division, and I hope many gentlemen sitting around me will register an immediate protest against this system, so favoured by the right hon. Gentleman, of taking the time of the House at the very beginning of the Session.

(4.14.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I would ask the First Lord of the Treasury to make an exception in the Motion in favour of the Seed Potatoes (Ireland) Bill.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I can assure the hon. and gallant Member that I will fulfil the obligation I have come under to him.

*MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I do not like to give an absolutely silent vote on this subject, having regard to the fact that for many years past I have been one of those who have always entered a protest against the appropriation by the Government of time to the exclusion of the privileges of private Members, or rather the opportunities of non-official Members of the House. It is impossible for any one who has been any considerable time in the House not to observe that the feeling among Members of the House at large towards what are called private Members has been very materially modified. There was a time when Members of position on both sides who were agreed upon no other subject, made common cause whenever, in their judgment, the privileges of non-official Members were menaced. I have constantly taken part in such movements in order to guard against the union of the two Front Benches in numerous acts of appropriation of the time of the House. Now, the position which private Members occupy in the general estimation of the House has considerably changed of late. No one can mix with his brother Members without hearing very disparaging remarks in regard to the way in which the time of the House is utilised. We frequently hear private Members spoken of as pretentious windbags and faddists seeking to obtain their own ends at the public expense. I am not saying how far these remarks may in any instances be justified, but the net result is that the means which private Members now have of exercising any influence whatever on the affairs of the House has been reduced almost to a nullity. I think the House before it agrees to this Motion ought to carefully consider the position which it occupies with regard to the time at its command. If this were a Motion made at the ordinary time of the commencement of the Session in February, I would say that it would be the duty of the House resolutely to decline, and insist on the right every individual Member has to discharge his public duty to his country and his constituents. But with regard to this specific Motion, we have met at an unusual time, and not for the discussion of ordinary business, but specific business known beforehand. I think that the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) and other Members with a longer experience of Parliament than I have myself—though my own is, I regret to say, not inconsiderable—will bear me out when I say that it always has been the practice under the pressure of exceptional circumstances to modify the Standing Orders of the House, and to afford to the Government all the facilities the House has at its command. That has been notably the case towards the end of the Session—not only in the last decade, when changes have been made which I certainly regard as bad precedents—but in former years; but then the practice was to insist upon knowing to what purpose the time was to be given up. As I understand my right hon. Friend, he does not ask for the time of the House to go into any general scheme of legislation, but to bring before the House certain specific proposals, and those proposals alone. The hon. Member for Northampton referred to the fact that the early meeting of Parliament has been connected with an earlier relinquishment of our labours. I must also remind the hon. Member that the work now down for our consideration is essentially work which was to have been done last autumn. Therefore, understanding, as I do, that the Government have pledged themselves only to avail themselves of this concession for specific purposes, and that they do not ask non-official Members to abdicate their rights in the ordinary period of the Session, I for one shall not oppose the Motion.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Will the right hon. Gentleman guarantee that the Government will not ask for the time of private Members in the ordinary period of the Session?

*MR. J. LOWTHER: The word of my right hon. Friend is good enough for me, and I venture to say likewise for the hon. Gentleman [and for the House at large. Upon this understanding, namely, that in the ordinary period of the Session private Members will not be asked to abdicate their rights, I for one shall be prepared to support the Motion of my right hon. Friend.

*(4.25.) SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): I hold that we have arrived at a period when the time of Parliament ought to be altogether re-arranged. At present the time usually allotted to the Government is totally insufficient. I do not think this remark applies to this Government only, but it applies equally to any Government whatever. Therefore I say that there must be a re-arrangement, so that the Government may have more time at their disposal. I would suggest that the time has arrived when we ought to give up Tuesday altogether as a private Members' night. It is a night which is generally appropriated to mere abstract resolutions which do not result in legislation. Our sittings on Wednesday are in a different position. They have been productive of a considerable number of useful measures introduced in the shape of Bills by private Members. I would therefore suggest that Wednesday should be preserved as a private Members' day; but seeing that there are more counts-out on Tuesday than upon any other day, I think that the Government should have that day as well as Mondays and Thursdays. If this course were taken, I believe that it would not be necessary in future to propose such Motions as that now before the House.

(4.27.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): My hon. Friend who has just sat down stated that he thinks that the Government have now more to do than they had at other times, and that there ought to be an entire re-arrangement of Parliamentary time with a view to a different distribution between the Government and non-official Members, as they have been well called by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. That may be so or it may not be so. I offer no opinion on the subject, but in the earliest year that I can recollect four Bills of vast importance were passed by the Government, and I have known certainly within the last five years no approach to Parliamentary labour of that kind. There was a coercion Bill for Ireland of great labour and difficulty in that year—1833. It was followed by a Church Temporalities Bill, reconstituting a most complicated subject, and then came a vast measure, the West India Emancipation Bill, and after that the re-adjustment of the Bank Charter, and also, I think, an Indian Bank Charter; and that was all done under the present arrangement of Government time. But that is not the question before us. We have apparently a limited limitation, but with respect to the limitation I wish to have a clearer understanding than we have yet arrived at. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. J. Lowther) made a declaration at the close of his speech that he considered the Government pledged by this Motion not to ask after Christmas for the time of non-official Members. I observed no sign whatever of assent on the part of the First Lord of the Treasury to show that he considered it to be a pledge on the part of the Government, and undoubtedly we are entitled to some much clearer indication of the intentions of the Government as to what is to take place after Christmas than what we have yet obtained. For my part, I feel no disposition to go to issue with the Government upon the question of limited extent, and I believe such would be the general feeling of the House; but what I have observed is that a small demand is after a week or ten days followed by a greater demand; that again is followed by a demand larger still, and the upshot is that the time of non-official Members is almost entirely absorbed. We want, therefore, to know what are the general intentions of the Government with respect to the time of non-official Members, because I must point out that with regard to the specific purpose of his Motion it is impossible to have a weaker position than that of the right hon. Gentleman. In the first place, his Motion does not correspond with his notice. His notice was totally different from the Motion. His notice was that the time of the House should be at the disposal of the Government for the Irish Land Purchase Bill, the Tithe Bill, and Bills connected with Irish distress, but his Motion is that the time of the House should be given to the Government up to Christmas for all Government business whatever. They are in total contradiction to one another, and I would observe that no notice whatever is better than a misleading and erroneous one. But the right hon. Gentleman has quoted precedents. There is no precedent whatever touching such a Motion as this. He has precedents to show that on particular occasions after the commencement of the Session—for what may be done at the end of the Session has nothing whatever to do with it—demands have been made on the House for certain important measures. But now this is not a demand for this or that important measure, but a demand for Government business generally. What is worst of all is that his Motion is in direct contradiction of his own notice. The right hon. Gentleman spoke three days ago in absolute contradiction to the terms of the Motion which he now makes. I ventured in the course of the Debate on the Address to pass a eulogy, as I sometimes do, on the the wisdom of our ancestors, and the right hon. Gentleman responded to me, not only with assent and sympathy, but with fervour. He was all for the wisdom of our ancestors, but he asked, "What was our condition?" The enormous demands for the discussion of this, that, or the other subject drive the Government to such a point that we have no option except to make these requests to the House. The right hon. Gentleman added—

"But let the House give us some indication of a disposition to assist the passage of Government measures, and we shall not then have occasion to make these requests."

What is the first effect of that declaration of the right hon. Gentleman? We waived the Debate on the Address, and in the place of its occupying a succession of nights got through it in five or six hours. And then, again, if that was not enough to put the right hon. Gentleman out of court he produced the Tithe Bill without any explanation from the Minister in charge of it, and, although it is a contested measure, the stage was passed without debate. Certainly, nobody can complain of the debate on the Irish Land Purchase Bill. Indeed, it seems to me that in his laudable anxiety to avoid trespassing upon the time of the House, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was too short in his exposition of it. Brevitas esse laboro, obscurus fio. The right hon. Gentleman left me in utter doubt and bewilderment as to some of its most important points. Undoubtedly the statement of the right hon. Gentleman on Tuesday was an intimation that a disposition on the part of the House to despatch business would dispense with the necessity for making these demands. Still, the present demand is a limited one, and I do not wish to quarrel with the Government about trifles. The right hon. Gentleman is, above all things, a temperate man in his language, but in conjunction with this gentle and temperate language there is a character about his measures—I use the word in no offensive sense—of a certain truculence. I must say that I have so much respect for the speech which the right hon. Gentleman made on Tuesday night that I should feel that I was insulting him with respect to that speech if I were to support his Motion as it stands without some further declaration, and I look for, from him, in his reply, a frank acceptance of the demands made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet Division for the satisfaction of non-official Members that they are not, after Christmas, to be deprived of their fair share of the time of the House.

*(4.35.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I can only reply to the right hon. Gentleman by the indulgence of the House, which I hope will not be refused me. The right hon. Gentleman takes exception to the form of my Motion by saying that it differs materially from the notice given on Tuesday night. I have always been under the impression that when a Minister of the Crown makes an engagement with the House, it is one which the House will adopt, and I hope the House will accept my assurance that it is not our intention to go beyond the engagement I made with the House on Tuesday. We ask for the time of the House in order that we may proceed with the stages indicated of the Tithe Bill and the Land Purchase Bill which are now before the House, and to carry further, as we think it will be necessary for us to do, measures relating to the distress in Ireland, and if any other measures are to be included, it will only be such measures of urgency as may arise without our knowledge at this moment. It is not necessary for me to alter the terms of the Motion in order to express precisely the engagement I have now entered into. As to the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for the Isle of Thanet, I said the other day that I hoped it would not be necessary to ask for further indulgence of the House if the House showed its appreciation of the necessity for proceeding rapidly to business. I fully acknowledge that the House has up to now proceeded rapidly with public business, but I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman's experience of public business will show him that I should not be justified, acting on the experience of three days, in entering into a rash engagement not to ask on the part of the Government for further facilities after the month of December. I repeat that if the House will, with "the wisdom of our ancestors," consider these measures of the Government with reasonable criticism and with a due regard to the time of private Members, not less than the time of the House itself, I shall be more glad than anyone if I am able to refrain from asking for further facilities for the transaction of public business than those which the Rules of the House already give us. We have a strong desire that every non-official Member of the House should have every facility for bringing forward the questions which they deem to be important; but I feel that it would be rash to make the limitation which the right hon. Gentleman opposite desires. I shall be most glad to afford ample time for the Motions of non-official Members, but that is a matter rather for the House itself than for the Government. All I hope is that hon. Members, copying the wisdom of our ancestors, will return to the practice of the past.

(4.42.) MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): The objection which I feel compelled to make to this Motion goes a great deal deeper and further than the objections which have been made

already. I desire to enter my protest against any and every measure that would tend to keep in Office a Government who, I believe, are utterly unfitted for the duties which they have to perform, and who will be swept from power at the next General Election. [Laughter from the Ministerial Benches.] We hear a good deal of that kind of laughter at present from the other side of the House; but it is only laughter that is intended to keep their courage up. If there is any doubt as to the truth of what I say, it could be easily solved if they would only have the courage to try a General Election. Believing, as I do, and convinced as I am, and, as I believe, that Members opposite are in their innermost selves, that if we had a General Election they would undoubtedly cease to abuse any longer the power they obtained under a misapprehension some years ago, I shall oppose any measure that is intended to keep them in places for which I deem them to be unfit. With regard to the suggestion that the Government ought to appropriate more of the time of the House, it should be remembered what has been the history of all great legislative changes. First of all the country has been awakened, and then a principle has been embodied in a Resolution by a private Member, and on the Resolution being carried the Government has prepared a Bill. One stage of that which has been up to this time the invariable progress of reform, is now entirely taken away by the course being adopted by the Government; it is being taken away by those who have been, as we believe, the opponents of all reform, and it is being taken away in a manner which is very effective, but which is extremely unconstitutional. Last Session when they got any measure into such a condition that they found they were going to be beaten, instead of standing by those principles they had maintained to be right, they ran away; they held on to their offices because they knew perfectly well that in the country they would be beaten. They now want to take all the time of the House in order to prevent us moving any Resolutions which may be inconvenient for them to deal with. If we had the principle established of one man one vote, I should like to know what would become of the Dissident Liberals or Liberal Unionists, or whatever they call themselves. It is because the Government know that if we had the opportunity of moving Resolutions of that kind, they and their friends would necessarily be put in such a position of difficulty, and of absolute impossibility of official life, that they now propose to take the whole time of the House. I mean to oppose throughout the whole of this Session every measure which has the tendency to which I have referred, every measure which prevents us getting to the country, every measure which enables the Government any longer to hold seats which we know they would not hold if the country had the power of speech. In conclusion, I desire to point out that the pledge for which they were asked by our leader has been positively refused by the Government.

(4.48.) MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W.): The right hon. Gentleman the leader of the House has, by the favour of the House, made a second speech, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet (Mr. J. Lowther) is satisfied with the declarations of his right hon. Friend. I am always disposed to trust the right hon. Gentleman when he makes a statement in his private capacity, but, unfortunately, in his official capacity he is so affected with the responsibilities of office, that he continually runs back in the promises he gives to the House. What is our position? Why are we meeting here at this inclement time of the year? Nothing has been said by the First Lord of the Treasury or by any of the Members of the Government to show that there is anything special for which we have been called here. In reality, we are met together to pick up the broken threads of the last Session of Parliament. Why should we private Members be punished for the mismanagement of business by the Government during the last Session of Parliament? If the Tithe Bill was an urgent Bill last Session, if the Irish Land Purchase Bill was a Bill of most pressing necessity, why was a great part of the time of the House occupied with that ridiculous piece of business, the putting on the Records of the House the results of the Parnell Commission? But the Government started another horse, Compensation for the Brewers. That was the pièce de résistance with which we were favoured last Session. In fact, the business, which in the Speech from the Throne the Government declared pressing, was thrown aside, and new and unexpected measures introduced. The House is called together at this very inopportune time to try and make up for the great mismanagement of the business of the House by Her Majesty's Government. We have not even the poor consolation that by meeting for a month in 1890 the privileges of non-official Members are to be preserved to them in 1891. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Thanet is a great stickler for constitutional principles and methods; but he cannot deny that there have been more inroads into, and more breaking down of the old securities with regard to the constitutional practice of this House under the present Government than under any Radical Government. There have been rumours that the difficulties and labours of the leader of the House were making some inroad on his health, and that it might be necessary for him to retire. I hope that time is far distant. We have a great regard for the private character and private virtues of the right hon. Gentleman, but as leader of the House of Commons he appears to be so singularly afflicted by a sense of responsibility as to think himself justified in upsetting all the old methods by which business has been carried on. Should it be deemed right that the right hon. Gentleman should be translated to another place, I know no title that would better befit him than Lord Topsy-Turvy.

(4.53.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I shall oppose the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman, and for the following reason, if there were no other. There are two Irish Bills before the House—the Railways Bill, which is proposed in connection with the relief of distress in Ireland, which has been stated by the Chief Secretary to be very urgent, and the Land Bill. The Railways Bill is to be taken second. If the distress is to be relieved, why not place the Railways Bill first? The Government are acting in a false manner. If they really want time, why did they not assemble earlier—a fortnight or three weeks earlier? The Government delayed the meeting of Parliament in order to allow gentlemen opposite to enjoy their hunting—please God the country will hunt them before long! Because he has allowed the gentlemen opposite the opportunity their wealth affords them, the right hon. Gentleman now asks for the whole time of the House. The right hon. Gentleman wishes by his Motion to remedy the lamentable and discreditable mistake which a discredited Government has made in connection with this Session of Parliament. I must remonstrate with the right hon. Gentleman. I am always sorry to see him placed in a false position. I always sympathise with him when I hear him appeal to the House and the country, but I do think he should have endeavoured to bring about a reformation in the Cabinet, so as to prevent evils attendant upon want of discretion. In the conduct of Irish business the Government have broken their promise, and, for my own part, I shall have much pleasure in voting against this proposition.

*(4.57.) SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): When we know that distress exists in Ireland, and that thousands of people are being turned out of their homes wholesale to starve, we are asked to give up the time of the House, not for the discussion of Irish matters, but, forsooth, for the consideration of a Tithe Bill which we know will be debated by the Welsh Members in a most discursive manner. This Bill is a Parliamentary bribe given to the Church of England for supporting the present Government, and in the hope of future favours at the next General Election. [Cries of "Divide!"] It is all very well for hon. Gentlemen opposite to cry "Divide," but I should have liked some of them to have seen what I have witnessed in Ireland during the last few days. I have seen hundreds of women and children turned out from their homes on to the roadside to starve. And yet we are asked not to attempt to give relief to these people at once, but to pass a Bill which no one wants but the Prime Minister—a Bill of a most contentious character, which I, for one, being a tithe-owner, and also a tithepayer, consider a most dishonest Bill. I do not think anything more indecent could be proposed even by the present Government. I hope that hon. Members on this side of the House will not allow this Debate to end without the matter being thoroughly discussed, so that the Government may learn once more that it does not expedite business by making proposals of this description.

PERPETUAL PENSIONS.

*(5.19.) Mr. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I am afraid it is rather an old story with which I have to trouble the House, but I have the satisfaction of knowing that I need not trouble it at any great length, for all I propose to do to-night is simply to ask it to support the position taken up by its own Committee, which sat in 1887. The decision of that Committee was not the decision of a majority, it was the unanimous decision of a Committee having upon it an overwhelming majority of Conservative and Unionist Members. There were eight Members of the Conservative Party, headed by the Attorney General; there were two Liberal Unionists, and five Liberals, as well as two Members of the Irish Party. That portion of the Report upon which I to-night ask the House to express an opinion is a portion on which the Committee was unanimous, and I would suggest that unless the Government have very grave reasons for so doing they should be exceedingly careful about asking the House to depart from that decision. The Report recommends that all offices with salaries, without duties or with merely nominal duties, should be abolished; that existing perpetual and hereditary pensions and allowances should be determined and commuted; that in all cases the method of commutation ought to involve a real, substantial saving to the nation, and that the rate of commutation usually adopted—namely, 27 years' purchase—is too high. It is the last words I have just read that the Committee affirmed without the slightest disagreement, without any Division, under the sanction of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for England and with the concurrences of Members sitting in all quarters of the House, and I now ask this House to re-affirm them. I beg to move—

"That this House disapproves of so much of the Treasury Minute relating to perpetual pensions, hereditary payments, and allowances as proposes to commute some of such pensions, payments, and allowances at the rate of practically 27 years' purchase."

In a Treasury Minute laid upon the Table on July 19th, 1888, the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer intimated that in their opinion the terms on which the Treasury had commuted already involved a saving to the nation, and ought to be adhered to. I am far from denying that any commutation, however extravagant—does involve some saving to the nation; but the Committee, having examined the matter with great care, resolved unanimously that it was not a sufficient saving. I challenged the Government on the matter in 1889, and, before the Motion was brought on, the Secretary to the Treasury laid on the Table a Minute in which he showed that the saving would, by the proposition of the Treasury, be larger than had hitherto been made, because the Government would be able to borrow at 2½ interest at 99 to the 100. But that Minute was not complete. I do not know why the Secretary to the Treasury omitted from the list certain pensions, but I need not now trouble the House upon that point, as I dealt with it fully on a previous occasion. I propose, however, to cite the case of the Pendrel pensions amounting to £450, as a specimen of the omission—

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The Minute is as described by the hon. Member a statement of pensions, allowances, and payments charged on the Exchequer, but the payments, allowances, and pensions to which the hon. Gentleman refers are not so charged, and therefore could not be included in the list.

*Mr. BRADLAUGH: I am sorry to disagree with the Secretary to the Treasury who, with the greater information at his command, is so much more exact than I can hope to be; but if the right hon. Gentleman will look at the Paper handed in by Sir Reginald Welby he will find that, while in point of form he is perfectly exact in what he states, in point of fact these payments form as much a charge upon the nation as any of the other pensions. It is perfectly true that in the original grants many of these pensions were charged in particular ways, such, for instance, as on the Post Office, but they are ultimately chargeable upon the nation. The Pendrel pensions are obtained by stopping the income of property which would otherwise be paid into the Exchequer, and I want to make it plain that there are pensions now payable which do not appear in the list laid on the Table by the Secretary to the Treasury. It is clear it will not do to be governed in our estimate of the saving by the supposition that the sum necessary for the commutation can be borrowed by the Government in $2\frac{3}{4}$ Consolidated Stock at 99 per cent. Indeed, at the present moment it is perfectly clear that the Government cannot borrow at $2\frac{3}{4}$ getting 99 per cent. It is wiser not to take figures yielding the highest economy which might be effected, but to take ordinary rates. In 1889 the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a very fair promise, which has been fairly carried out, that in future the Treasury, in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee, would apply different methods of commutation, and the result would be laid on the Table, so that the House might have an opportunity of expressing an opinion before the commutation was carried out. On July 15 last year a Treasury Minute was laid upon the Table with regard to five pensions. As to three of these pensions, I shall have to make very few remarks. The decision of the House will turn on the two closing pensions in this Memorandum. The first is the pension to the Duke of St. Alban's. I will not say very much about that, because it has been much more efficiently dealt with on several occasions in this House by the hon. Member for Stockport, who will do me the honour of seconding this Amendment, and also by the hon. Member for Preston. But one most extraordinary thing is this:—As appears by the Report of the Committee that the sum of £965—a perpetual payment to the Duke of St. Alban's—is made up in this way:—A sum as salary for the Master of the Hawks, a sum for falconers, a sum for hawks, and a sum to provide for pigeons, hens, and other meats for the hawks. It was stated frankly by Sir Reginald Welby that falconers, hawks, and pigeons kept by the Duke there were none. What I have principally to point out is that with regard to the pensions to the Duke of Hamilton and the Marquess of

Downshire this distinction is made, namely, that the keeper and the porter in the case of the Duke of Hamilton, and the warders in the case of the Marquess of Downshire, who have been and are actually employed at the present moment, and are in receipt of their salaries; the Treasury say, very properly I think, that these things ought to cease with their lives. But in the case of the falconers' salaries, which are not paid to persons employed as falconers, and of the hawks which do not exist, and of the food for them which is never furnished, these things are to be commuted as perpetual pensions. The word "dishonesty" is one that I should not like to use in this House, but it would appear that there is in the minds of the Treasury an idea that some sort of consideration is to be shown in the case of the falconers' salaries, which are not paid, which is not to be shown in the case of the warders, keepers, and porters who did actually exist in the other case. I hold that this proposal is downright monstrous. I have mentioned these matters in the hope that even at the eleventh hour the Treasury may be induced to take some other view than that which they have hitherto adopted. I do not propose to occupy the time of the House one moment longer on this point, but I would refer any hon. Member who desires any further information on the subject to the examination of Sir Reginald Welby, in which he will see all the facts duly stated. I now come to the real appeal which I desire to make to the House on the subject of the perpetual pensions which are bestowed upon Lord Exmouth and Lord Rodney. I regard these as test cases which ought not only to govern the decision of the House to-night in regard to these two cases, but which should undoubtedly govern the decision of the Treasury as to all other pensions coming within the same category. This would mean about £31,000 a year not commuted and still commutable. It is not desirable that I should trouble the House in regard to any other pensions of this class than these two, and I shall, therefore, confine myself to the cases of Lord Exmouth and Lord Rodney. I do not say that the Treasury have selected what are actually the strongest cases on which to argue this question, although no doubt they have taken two of the strongest cases. The original grantees of the pensions in each case had the grants conferred upon them for life and not in perpetuity; the fact being that they were afterwards made perpetual by the Parliament of the time, and I have now no right to impeach the action that was consequently taken. There were doubtless public services rendered by the ancestors of these persons—naval services which figure in the pages of our history, and which I should be wanting in decorum to attempt to minimise. But I would point out to the House that Lord Rodney and his successors have received no less a sum than £214,000 as the result of those pensions, while Lord Exmouth and his successors have received a total of £152,000. I affirm, therefore, that, however eminent their services may have been, they have been sufficiently recognised and rewarded by the State. The position I now take on this subject is that, keeping my promise and putting the matter on the broadest possible form, I have to point out that the whole subject was carefully examined and inquired into by the Committee, and the Committee unanimously held that not only was the spirit of the present time against this system of perpetual grants, but that all these perpetual pensions should be abolished and got rid of. They held that to commute them on the basis of 26·995 or, putting it roughly, 27 years would be an extravagant waste of public money, and I think that at least some concession might have been made by the Treasury to the opinion of the Committee thus expressed. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Brightside Division of Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) represented the Front Bench of the Opposition on that Committee. The Attorney General was there to represent the Government in this matter, and I may state that there was not a difference of opinion, and that even on the part of the Liberal Unionists there was no protest; they were all with us. Indeed, there was not one word of difference; it was a point upon which there was perfect agreement on the part of every Member of the Committee, and I think that, under these circumstances, it is too much for the Treasury to attempt to set the opinion of that Committee on one side. The conclusion they arrived at was not the result of any party or snatch Division; it was the result of mature consideration and reflection. There was no disposition on their part to take the ground which I personally should have been inclined to take, namely, that these people have been over-rewarded and that there ought to be nothing more done for them. On the contrary, a disposition was evinced that there should be fair and reasonable commutation; but it was said, that while there were declarations of misery and distress in the country, and while the House was appealed to on one side and the other to take steps in some way to alleviate this distress, it was an absolute farce to open the purse-string of the nation and allow money to continue to be poured out under a system which every one is agreed ought never to have been originated, and ought not now to continue. I think I should be acting with more wisdom in not detaining the House any further. I trust that this will not be considered a matter on which there is any need of party lines being taken; the Members of the Committee who sat with me through 12 months of the investigation will remember that I did not try in any way to provoke party or any individual hostility in regard to the cases into which I had to examine. I may add that in the evidence taken, in regard to which there was an immense amount of labour, we were greatly assisted by Sir Reginald Welby. There are some of the pensions which cannot now come under the cognizance of the House. I refer to two cases, one of which might well result in the early reversion of lands, which I believe will be of great value to the country; while in the other, though the reversion is more problematical, the lands are still of some considerable value. I say that the Government ought not to have administered to the Committee the slap in the face they have given by the manner in which they have treated its recommendations. To say that the conclusions arrived at by that Committee amount to nothing is a little too much, seeing that their own Attorney General was a member of that body. If this had been a Radical Committee, or a Committee with a Radical majority who had thrust their conclusions down the throats of the minority, I could understand the Government disregarding their views ; but as that is not the case, I ask the Government not to make this matter a Party question. I am not at all inclined to cast any censure on Her Majesty's Government, because they are only doing what other Governments on both sides have done, and, therefore, criticism on one Government would be criticism on the other ; but, at the same time, I would point out that this perpetual pension system is condemned by the country, and I do therefore ask the House to act in accord with its own Committee, and to endorse the recommendations they have arrived at on the subject.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House disapproves of so much of the Treasury Minute relating to Perpetual Pensions, Hereditary Payments, and Allowances as proposes to commute some of such Pensions, Payments, and Allowances at the rate of practically 27 years' purchase,"—(Mr. Bradlaugh),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

* (5.38.) MR. JENNINGS (Stockport) : I rise, Sir, for the purpose of seconding the Resolution moved by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton, and I do so on the ground that the Resolution does nothing more than seek to carry out the recommendations of the Committee, who were entirely unanimous in making those recommendations to the House. As a member of that Committee, I may say that we searched carefully into every case, and inquired into every circumstance connected with it. Sir Reginald Welby afforded us a great deal of information regarding these circumstances. Having all the facts before them, the Committee recommended the House to terminate these perpetual pensions, and also to take into consideration the circumstances under which the several pensions were originally granted in arriving at a decision on the question of commutation. As far as the Report of the Committee is concerned, their recommendations have been entirely set aside by the Treasury Minute which has been laid upon the Table of the House.

Had the circumstances under which the pensions were originally granted been taken into account, the House would hardly now be advised to commute the pension of the Master of the Hawks on the basis of 19½ or 20 years' purchase. Some of those perpetual pensions were more or less scandalous in their origin and nature, and I cannot but regard them as being a disgrace to the country. They were, for the most part, granted at a time when the public funds were regarded in the light of their own private property by persons occupying distinguished positions, and under this assumption they were distributed among the friends and acquaintances of those individuals in whatever manner they deemed proper. The worst of these cases is, no doubt, that of the Master of the Hawks. The hon. Member opposite has gone carefully into that case, and in so doing has abstained from using anything like strong language, but, for my own part, I do not hesitate to say that that pension has been received for many years under circumstances which amount to nothing less than a fraud upon the country. The money was originally given for certain specific purposes, and it was to be divided among certain individuals, distinctly designated in the Warrant. Those persons have, however, long since disappeared, if, indeed, they ever had any existence at all, and the money which was intended to be applied to a distinct purpose has found its way into pockets it was never intended to reach. The whole system has been one of fraud and wrong from first to last. I think that if the House were to commute this pension on the basis of only ten years' purchase it would be far too liberal an arrangement. If you were to take the opinion of the taxpayers of the country, I think you would find that they would not be disposed to give even ten weeks' purchase. They would say the pension has gone on too long already. With regard, however, to the Treasury, I admit that there is a legal claim upon them for the payment of the money, but I think they might have made a much better bargain for the country than they have proposed in suggesting a commutation on the basis of 19½ years' purchase. If the Treasury had intimated to the recipient of the pension that there existed a strong feeling on the part of the Committee against it, and a strong feeling also on the part of the House against it, it is very probable that much easier terms would have been obtained than those the country is now asked to accept. I think the House should remember that most of those pensions have been conferred in cases where no services whatever have been rendered, while in other cases the services that have been rendered have been of a highly scandalous and disgraceful character. We all know that Charles II. was a man who took things very easily, but I should say that that Monarch never imagined, even in his wildest dreams, that the British taxpayer would, in the year 1890, still be paying £965 a year to a descendant of Nell Gwynne's. For my own part, I do not hesitate to say that were it within my power I would stop the pension at once and pay no commutation at all. The country has been robbed enough, and the robbery should now cease. Had the House been aware that this subject was to arise to-night, it might not have been too much to ask Members to look at the brief Report of the Committee who set forth the facts. I venture to ask the House to consider, whatever may be the case made out by the Treasury on behalf of these pensions to-night, that the Attorney General sat on the Committee, and I believe also the Secretary to the Treasury.

MR. JACKSON: No.

*MR. JENNINGS: Well, the Attorney General as representing the Government. All the objections which we shall hear to-night have been raised since the Attorney General agreed to the recommendations of the Committee. I venture to think that it is a little late in the day to put aside the facts and reasons which guided the Committee, whose decision, considering the whole of the facts, is worthy the support of the House. In these days nobody sympathises with paying away the tax-payers' money merely because it is handed to the descendant of some King who never rendered any service to the country that I ever heard of. If the House supports the recommendation of the Committee, it will offer encouragement to Members to give their time to Committees, because they will have the knowledge that they will not make Reports merely to be thrown overboard by the Treasury. I hope the House will not hesitate to assent to the Resolution.

*(5.50.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Mr. Deputy Speaker, the hon. Member who has just sat down has said that it would be poor encouragement to Members to serve on Committees, if the proceedings of these Committees had no influence upon the Executive Government; but I can assure him, and I can assure the House, that the proceedings of the Committee had a considerable effect, and the very Minute now before the House shows that is the case. Various suggestions were made, one that all existing pensions should in time be brought to an end. We are endeavouring to bring about that result, but I will prove to the House how difficult it is to combine that recommendation with the subsequent recommendation, that the usual basis of 27 years' purchase is too high. The only way of getting rid of these pensions, unless our terms are voluntarily accepted by the pensioners, would be to bring in an Act of Parliament to compel the holders of pensions to accept arbitrary terms. As Chancellor of the Exchequer, while it is my duty to promote as far as possible the interests of the Exchequer, I have also to act as guardian of the public faith. The Committee did not go the length of saying that if we could not induce persons to commute at 27 years their pensions ought to be compulsorily commuted. Now I wish to ask Members whether, in cases where a grant of land has been made, it is to remain in the hands of the descendants of the original grantee, and not to be resumed, while a money grant may at any moment be the subject of discussion in Parliament.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Hear, hear. Lands have been resumed by Parliament, and this repeatedly.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I should be glad to learn that such a case has occurred within what I may call modern practice. I do not know whether the hon. Member goes so far, having succeeded with regard to perpetual pensions, as to make an attack on some of the lands which have been granted under circumstances perhaps no more creditable than those under which money pensions have been granted. But the hon. Gentleman suggests that we have not done sufficient as regards the recommendations of the Committee. We have looked into special cases, and as a result of the Report of the Committee we have made better terms in some of them than in any of the cases which have gone before. Previously all commutations took place at 27 years' purchase, and looking into special cases we have commuted on different and far more advantageous terms. I advised with the Law Officers of the Crown as to whether these grants and allowances were legally binding, and we were informed that they were legally binding. We have endeavoured, at the same time, to bring about that which the Committee desired and represented, namely, the abolition of perpetual pensions. We have accordingly negotiated with some of the recipients of those pensions, and we have commuted on far better terms than has ever been done before. With regard to the Keeper of the Hawks, my hon. Friend spoke as if the whole of the pension was due to the keeping of the hawks, but a portion of it was a perpetual pension standing on the same footing as other pensions. In all these cases we have endeavoured to make the best terms we could. My hon. Friend suggests that we ought to have informed the recipients of the public feeling with regard to them. I think they have had ample opportunity of reading the speeches of my hon. Friend and of the hon. Member for Northampton, and they know the feeling of the House of Commons. It is, no doubt, in consequence of their knowing that feeling that they have consented to the terms which we now propose. Hon.

Mr. Goschen

Members are aware that we have no power to stop these perpetual pensions, unless by Act of Parliament. But that is not the recommendation of the Committee. The Committee never faced that. They have not said that Parliament should say, "We will break faith." They have stopped short at that. We have endeavoured to negotiate in such a manner as to lighten the burdens which these pensions throw on the people, and do something which is recommended by the Committee. The Committee recommend that in all these cases we ought to ensure a real and substantial saving to the nation. I can tell the Committee what has been done in the two special cases referred to in the Resolution of the hon. Member. If we were to take the Consols value of each of their pensions of £2,000 a year, their value would be £75,000; their value at which we have commuted them is £54,000—a saving of £21,000 between the legal value and that which we have given, or 28 per cent. of the legal value. That may fairly be said to be a substantial saving to the nation. The hon. Member says that all these matters were known to the Committee, but some of the circumstances were not known to the Committee. I do not think it was brought before the Committee that negotiations were going on with regard to these two cases. I do not insist on that to any great extent, but it will, at all events, account to the hon. Member why these two cases are now brought forward.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Sir Reginald Welby stated that he hoped I would not press for the names, as the negotiations were going on, and they had been suspended in consequence of the appointment of the Committee.

*MR. GOSCHEN: If the names had been pressed for, the matter might have been discussed by the Committee. I wish the hon. Gentleman had pressed for the names, because in the eyes of the Committee and in the eyes of the public a strong case has been prejudiced by a weak case. The recommendation simply states in general terms that the rate of 27 years is too high. It takes no account of good cases or bad cases. Now the hon. Member takes two of the strongest cases for fair consideration, those of Lord Exmouth and Lord Rodney, and asks the House not to sanction 27 years' purchase. But there is one circumstance which should have weight with Members of the House. Since the Committee sat, the rate of interest on Consols has been reduced, so that 27 years' purchase now represents considerably less cost to the nation than it did when the Committee sat. Therefore, the substantial saving to the nation will be greater now than it was before. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Mundella) knows that the price of Consols regulates the commutation, and those who commute their pensions now will receive less than they would have done at the time the Committee sat. This 27 years' arrangement is more beneficial to the public and less beneficial to the holders of pensions than it was at the time the Committee sat. So that there is the less reason to declare that the rate of commutation was condemned by the Committee. I am sure the hon. Member for Northampton would not have attacked these two pensions unless he had thought they would govern all the other pensions. We do not admit that these two pensions would govern the whole of the rest.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I suggested that £214,000 in one case, and £156,000 in the other, already received, constituted sufficient reward.

*MR. GOSCHEN: That is a different point. The hon. Member objects to 27 years, because he thinks that if we adopt that proposal we shall set up a standard for the remainder of the pensions. We do not hold that that would be the case. We accept the view of the Committee that each case should be inquired into on its merits. Formerly all these cases were dealt with alike, but now the Government are inquiring into every case, and the Minute now before the House shows that out of five cases mentioned in it, in two only is 27 years' purchase proposed, while in the other three cases 19, 22, and 25 years' purchase are proposed. The hon. Member for Northampton asks us to disapprove of the commutation of Lord Exmouth's and Lord Rodney's pensions at 27 years. If the pensions are not commuted on these terms, to which the holders agree, what is to be done? Are we to bring in a Bill as regards these two pensions, and say to the holders that, although the faith of the nation has been pledged by Act of Parliament to the descendants of those two gallant officers, we will now arbitrarily fix the number of years' purchase at which their pensions shall be commuted? I must say that while I shall be always prepared to commute all pensions on terms as favourable as possible to the nation, I am not prepared to bring in a Bill to terminate a particular pension in an arbitrary manner. Without wishing to set up a standard to be followed in other cases, I would ask the House not to come to any determination that will stop the commutation of these two pensions—a commutation which, as now agreed upon, will be extremely beneficial to the nation—nor to make it necessary to bring in a Bill which will set aside the public faith. We have largely acted on the advice of the Committee, and we shall endeavour in all future instances to study the circumstances of each particular case, but, at the same time, to have regard to the fact that these pensions are legally binding on us, and certainly I shall not be the Chancellor of the Exchequer to bring in a Bill to terminate an arrangement made with the consent of Parliament.

(6.5.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I confess I have not been able to follow the argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that 27 years is not to be a standard by which the Treasury will be governed. No man who has listened to his speech can fail to see that if the holder of a pension refuses to take less than the 27 years' purchase, he is entitled to have it, and the Treasury must give it him. The Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech has made 27 years the standard. The right hon. Gentleman has said that the Treasury are bound to give 27 years if the holder will not take less. Why, then, having so admirable an advocate as the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that he is entitled legally to 27 years, should a holder take less?

*MR. GOSCHEN: They have taken less.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Yes, but that was perhaps before they had heard so admirable an argument as that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. A more conclusive argument why the holders should insist on 27 years it is impossible to conceive, because it amounts to this: "If you will only hold out for 27 years I must give it you, and I beg you will do so." That is not what they call wisdom in the City, and I am quite sure that in other matters the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not deal with a money transaction on that footing. It is quite true that transactions in regard to these pensions in past times cannot be defended, and that the principle of commutation in past times cannot be justified. It is greatly due to the exertions of the hon. Member for Northampton that the matter has attracted much public attention. The Government consulted the opinion of a powerful Committee—which is a sort of microcosm of Members of this House, and which is representative of the taxpayer—as to what should be done in this matter. Having received the Report of that Committee, the Executive Government fly in its face. I say that is not a legitimate way of dealing with the question. I cannot understand the course the Government have taken. I should have thought that what they most would have desired would have been to be relieved of responsibility in so difficult a matter as this. The Committee took the responsibility on themselves. They told the Government they ought not to take 27 years as the figure, and yet the Treasury fly in the face of that opinion, and propose to give, in certain cases at least, terms not in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee. That seems to me a very independent course. I think the pension of the Master of the Hawks is a most indefensible pension. I was astonished at the argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the point. He said he split that pension up into two. One part he regarded as standing on a personal footing, and the other as being in the nature of allowances. For the allowances he gave 11 years' purchase.

*MR. GOSCHEN: We were advised—and the former Law Officers were of the same opinion—that these allowances, though they shock the right hon. Gentleman, were legally binding on us, and we now propose to get rid of an obligation legally binding on us perpetually at 11 years' purchase.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Oh, I quite understand that. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer was shocked to the extent of 11 years' purchase. He was so shocked that, instead of giving 27 years' purchase, he gave 11 years'. I do not see why allowances of this kind should be taken into consideration at all. I have the greatest respect for the opinion of the Law Officers, but I think the taxpayers are perfectly competent to form an opinion. If a pension has been given to a man for rendering services which he does not render, that is a point on which the public can make up their minds. The right hon. Gentleman was very much shocked at the notion of bringing in a Bill, but has he never heard of commutation of freehold offices on a fair basis? Transactions of that kind, I believe, have not been unfrequent. The Chancellor of the Exchequer should have gone to the recipients of the pensions, and said, "A representative Committee of the House of Commons has laid down a certain scale, beyond which we cannot go; and if you are not content with that scale, we will take the opinion of the House of Commons in the form of a Bill." That would have been a perfectly legitimate position to take up. Why did you appoint a Committee when you did not act on their opinion?

*MR. GOSCHEN: We did act upon it largely.

SIR W. HARCOURT: You acted upon it largely! You ought to have acted upon it altogether. Having asked the deliberate opinion of a Committee of the House upon the question, you ought to have told the pensioners that you would act upon their Report, and, if they refused to accept it, that you would ask Parliament for authority to enforce it. That would have been a reasonable and fair method of dealing with this question. I, for one, should heartily support the Motion.

(6.15.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I should not have intervened in this Debate but for two causes. In the first place, very prominent reference has been made to me in the matter by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), and, in the second place, we have heard a very extraordinary speech from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt). The Motion before the House has reference to a certain Treasury Minute. Two only of the pensions therein proposed to be commuted are complained of—Lord Rodney's and Lord Exmouth's—and I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby would have been better advised had he consulted the terms of the Minute and made himself acquainted with the facts of the case before he attacked my right hon. Friend. The Motion is directed only to that portion of the Minute which relates to the two pensions proposed to be commuted at about 27 years' purchase. A great deal has been said about my own position. I am free to admit that, had I known what I now know with regard to the actual facts respecting the two pensions complained of, I would have opposed more strenuously than I did the proposal of the hon. Member for Northampton. In a moment I will point out that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby did not do justice to the position in this respect of the Treasury authorities, whom he has described as flying in the face of the Report. It was originally proposed that the Report should state that the rate of commutation usually given—namely, about 27 years—was "far too high." It was pointed out by myself and others that we had not before us the particular circumstances in which the various commutations had taken place, but only the gross figures, although I did not shrink from saying that in many cases 27 years was too high a rate. The words of the paragraph were therefore altered from "the rate has been far too high" to the words "the rate is too high." For reasons which I think were fair, no special case was gone into, and the two cases now attacked were not gone into before the Committee.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: The hon. and learned Gentleman must pardon me. We had the exact facts before us. The only thing the hon. and learned Gentleman objected to was the specifying in the Report the particular cases, but the full particulars were given in the Appendix.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The hon. Member is really interrupting not at all with reference to the point on which I am speaking. What I say is that the circumstances under which anything had taken place with regard to the commutation of these pensions was not before the Committee. The pensions of Lord Rodney and Lord Exmouth were before the Committee in this sense only, that they were known to be for services, and, what is much more important, they were ratified by Parliament in 1782 and 1814, so that the House has by Act of Parliament recognised them as being payable for ever at the rate of about £2,000 a year. I am not ashamed to say that if I had thought that the paragraph about the rate of commutation was going to be used in this House as an argument for saying that the rate of commutation of these two pensions was too high, I certainly should not have assented to the proposition. It was because I was aware there were differences of circumstances that I assented to the words. It may be I ought not to have assented to them, but I thought they did represent the meaning I now attribute to them, namely, that it was a high rate, unless there were special circumstances. But there is another point which I now know, and which, I regret, has not been gone into more fully—namely, that in 1885, before that Committee had sat, Lord Rodney had practically agreed to a commutation upon these terms at the instance of the Treasury Authorities, and the same was the case with regard to Lord Exmouth. Therefore, their claims would not have only rested upon statutory authority, but by reason of negotiations with the Treasury Authorities there was in equity, if not in law, a bargain that the commutation should be carried out on those terms. I think, therefore, that it is not just to say with regard to these two pensions that the Treasury are flying in the face of the Report. With regard to other matters, in my opinion, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has, I am sure unintentionally, been unjust to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It is not correct to say that the Treasury has not regarded the Report or its recommendations. The matter came before me in order that I might see how far it could legally be carried out; and, so far from the Report being disregarded, every case has been examined specially in order to ascertain its legal position. There is another matter which was not before the Committee, but which should be mentioned here. In not a few cases the claimants—the persons now receiving the pensions—were purchasers for value of the original pension; that is to say, they had invested money on the faith of sometimes a State and sometimes a Parliamentary bargain. I do not believe that anyone would wish to save his money as a taxpayer by breaking a contract made on the faith of the nation. With regard to this Treasury Minute, I appeal to the common sense of those present. I go so far as to say that in the case of Lord Rodney and Lord Exmouth, if the country is going to keep faith, if this House is going to keep faith, a less figure could not with propriety be adopted. It is wholly unjust to generalise from these two cases. I maintain that the Treasury has carried out the recommendations of the Committee, that they have done all they could consistently with the good faith of the nation, and I for one decline to be a party to anything amounting to a breach of faith in this matter. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has suggested that an Act of Parliament might have been brought in. For my own part, I can only say that any idea of compulsion was never presented to or discussed by the Committee at all. What was discussed was that there was power to commute these pensions, and that under ordinary circumstances the rate established would be regarded as being more than ought to be paid. But I say if there was to be compulsion, if a Bill was to be brought in, then in order to form a right judgment each particular case should be decided on its merits. With regard to the obligation of paying these pensions, it does not depend upon the opinion of particular Law Officers. It is a matter which, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian well remembers, has been considered for years gone by by successions of Law Officers, and it has only been when the legal authority of a pension has been proved to be established, that the Treasury has found it necessary to commute at a high rate. I do respectfully protest against the suggestion that the Government have flown in the face of the Report. On the contrary, they have, as far as possible, consistently with the faith of the country, given effect to every paragraph of it.

(6.27.) MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside):* As I was Chairman of the Committee, I must take exception to some of the statements just made by the Attorney General. The hon. and learned Gentleman says that the question of compulsion as applied to the determination of perpetual pensions was never considered by the Committee. Does he mean to say the Committee left it entirely to the option of the Master of the Hawks whether his pension should be commuted or not? What was in the mind of the Committee was that the Government should act upon the Committee's recommendation, and that recommendation was not at the will of the recipients, but at the will of this House. The Committee felt that if an Act of Parliament were required to determine and abolish perpetual pensions, the Government should bring in the Bill, such a scandal did most of the pensions present. There were only five Members from the Opposition side of the House to ten Conservatives on the Committee, and I think it is to the credit of hon. Gentlemen opposite that the feeling against the continuance of the present system is quite as strong on their part as on the part of the Liberal Members. With respect to the pension of the Master of the Hawks, if the argument of the Attorney General is to be maintained, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer is right, we have no right to determine the pension without the voluntary consent of the Master of the Hawks. It is thought that at 11 years' purchase the commutation is very moderate. What are the facts? Within living memory a certain sum was to be paid annually for hawks, for meat, and for service. All these things have been taken as part of the income of the Master of the Hawks. No hawks, meat, or service have been provided, and yet the Attorney General takes credit for a commutation at 11 years' purchase.

"That all existing perpetual pensions, allowances, and payments, and all hereditary offices should be determined and abolished,"

*MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman and his friends had been paying it for the last 20 years.

MR. MUNDELLA: Yes, but there was no Report of a Committee 20 years ago. The Committee made a Report on the point to the House, and it was understood that the Government would obey the behest of the Committee. If there is any force in the argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer it would be a breach of public faith to carry out the recommendation of the Committee, but we do not believe there would be a breach of public faith in carrying out that recommendation. We believe the whole system of perpetual pensions, even for good services rendered at remote periods, is in itself a vicious system. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer argues that the reduction of the rate of Consols entitles the owners of these pensions to receive larger rather than smaller sums, surely that is an argument that cannot be maintained, for the right hon. Gentleman must know that some of the persons purchased these pensions years ago when the rates were very different to the rates now, and the argument cuts as much one way as the other. In respect to this particular recommendation the Attorney General says he should have more strenuously opposed it if he had known some things that have since been brought to his knowledge. Now,

I have in my hand the original draft of the Report as submitted by the hon. Member for Northampton, and this original draft stated that 27 years was "far too high." The Committee agreed to this draft, the only objection being in a suggestion made by the Attorney General that as the question had not been inquired into before it would seem too severe a censure on the Treasury—a retrospective censure on the Treasury—to use the word "far." "Let us leave out 'far,'" he said, "and say that 27 years is too high." I am bound to say we had all the pensions before us; we knew that some were for meritorious services at a distant date, and some were for scandalous disservices at a distant date; we held the opinion that 27 years was far too high, and I think it was the duty of the Government, had there been no other method of proceeding open to them, to bring in a Bill for the commutation and determination of all perpetual pensions, and to state in that Bill the terms upon which they were prepared to commute pensions. If this intention had been communicated to the recipients of the pensions, I believe there would have been no occasion for a Bill.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: If the right hon. Gentleman will bear with me for a moment—there was a proposal made in the Report that pensions should be compulsorily commuted, and this was struck out—negated by the Committee.

MR. MUNDELLA: But what does the Attorney General understand by the paragraph in the Report which declares that all existing perpetual pensions, allowances, payments, and hereditary offices should be determined and abolished?

(6.35.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I regret very much that the hon. Member for Northampton should have introduced his Motion in this form with reference to 27 years' purchase, because, practically, it is only directed to the pensions granted to Lords Exmouth and Rodney, and does not touch the worst cases—the payments to the Duke of St. Alban's, the Duke of Hamilton, and the Marquess of Downshire. Now, on the last occasion when this subject was before us, I wanted to move an Amendment against the worst cases, but unfortunately I was not allowed to do so. I cannot see that the pensioners have much to complain of in the action of the hon. Member for Northampton, and really I think he deserves a testimonial from those who are interested. He has gone for the principle of commutation, and, with all deference, I think if this is fair Parliament ought not to haggle about giving a few years' purchase, more or less. So far as the pensions to Lord Exmouth and Lord Rodney are concerned, their pensions were deserved, and you are going to buy them out by fair treaty. I think these cases will compare very favourably with other cases of pensions commuted by the late Government when our Deputy Speaker (Mr. Courtney) was Secretary to the Treasury. As you have been paying at the rate of 27 years, and if the hon. Member for Northampton considers the proper method of determining these pensions is by commutation, I think you cannot get off with much less unless you introduce some new principle. I have been against commutation. Parliament has determined that some pensions shall be perpetual, and Parliament may determine that some shall cease. I do not think that the unborn have any rights. Those living have certain rights, and probably if you take these rights away you ought to give compensation, but Parliament may determine in the exercise of its power that no child shall be born the inheritor of these special privileges. I, for one, think if we are going to get rid of perpetual pensions, the best method is either to permit the living lineal descendants of great Admirals and Generals who in the past saved the country and assisted to make her what she is to enjoy these pensions during their lives, and to declare that with these lives the pensions shall cease, or to pay a fair price down, which is 27 years' purchase. The first would be a conservative method of putting an end to the pensions; your present method of making them perpetual at the cost of the present generation I object to very much. I do not see why the present generation should pay the whole cost. Technically, we are only discussing that portion of the Minute which affects the commutation at 27 years' purchase, but

I fail to see why the hon. Member for Northampton should complain of these two cases. He can complain of the other three cases, but, technically, they do not come under his Motion, because 27 years' purchase is not the offer in those cases. The first and typical case is that of the Duke of St. Alban's. I do not think the hon. Member for Northampton represents the view of the Radical Party in this matter at all any more than on other points he does.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I am sure I am very glad.

DR. CLARK: I am sorry that on the last occasion when this question came up and I uttered these sentiments, the hon. Member was not present, and the report did not correctly represent what occurred. So far as over a million is concerned—because there is £600,000 now held by Trustees for the Duke of Richmond, and I think half a million more for the Duke of Richmond—these gentlemen hold these sums because the pensions were granted to heirs male, and, these failing, the amounts will return to the Treasury—

MR. BRADLAUGH: If the hon. Member will read the Report he will find the exact opposite to what he is saying.

DR. CLARK: I am talking from the results of several Committees. I am not referring to the late Committee, but to three or four Committees, and the conditions under which pensions were commuted. I may be corrected, but I think that is the case. The payment to the Duke of St. Alban's is on a par with these pensions, and you are commuting the pension which was to be paid to him perpetually as Master of the Hawks. Now, I do not see that any moral crime attaches to a country by reason of the fact that a particular leader has committed a serious social offence, but surely it is much more serious if you put upon generation after generation payment for the fruits of debauchery and adultery. I do not think it shows a high tone of honour in a nation to pay thousands year by year as the fruit of debauchery and adultery. Here is a perpetual pension paid to the Duke of St. Alban's simply because one of his female ancestors was frail and adultery was committed. For this the country has been put to perpetual expense. Really I think there should be a prosecution of the Lords of the Treasury and the Duke for making and receiving payments under false pretences. The pension was granted for keeping and feeding hawks, but the hawks do not exist, the feeding is not required, and still the Treasury permitted the man to continue to draw the money under false pretences; and now you are doing more—condoning the original offence and granting 19 years' purchase. Why, many a poor man under such circumstances would find himself in Bow Street Police Court. So far as the cases of Lord Exmouth and Lord Rodney are concerned, there is much to be said; but the other three cases are utterly indefensible. You might apply the principle applied in the case of "Adams v. Dunseath," and say the advantages having been enjoyed so long should content the recipients; but it seems this, though applied to tenants whose rights are stolen, is not recognised in these cases. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer is quite right; we have to go beyond the point touched by the Committee; it is time we should abolish pensions that have a disgraceful origin, and we are not upon any principle of justice bound to give compensation where no services have been rendered.

(6.45.) MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): The Chancellor of the Exchequer made a point of the Government having made better terms with the pensioners than any Government before them; but surely if the pensioners are on the same footing as other holders of such privileges, they should have equally good terms. Government perpetual annuities are known to be worth considerably over 33 years' purchase; and if the Government have made a bargain for 27 years', it is obvious that the recipients believe there is something very different between the basis of their privileges and that of other annuities. It is well-known that this property is becoming more insecure every day, these pensions are getting worth less, because public opinion is being aroused as to their origin, and nobody has done more to arouse this public opinion than the hon. Member for Northampton. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer puts us in this dilemma: if we are not to commute on the best terms we can get from the pensioners, are we to do nothing, or bring in a Bill to pay a reduced sum? Of course, we should prefer a Bill to pay a very much reduced sum. We cannot expect that, but we may fairly ask the Government to wait. We know what the influence of public opinion has been; let the Chancellor of the Exchequer give more time, and we will develop public opinion a little further. We are all supposed to be guardians of the public purse, not of the privileges of the pensioners. I say if we only wait a short time, and let public opinion declare itself, pensioners will be glad to take a sum very far short of 27 years' purchase.

POST OFFICE OFFICIALS.

(7.1.) MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I desire to take this opportunity of saying a few words on behalf of the dismissed postmen for whom I pleaded a few months ago. The Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) has been obdurate against all the private representations made to him, and I am therefore compelled to appeal to him in public. The dismissed postmen may be divided into three classes. The first are those dismissed because they refused to discharge their ordinary duties. They refused under mitigating and extenuating circumstances, I think; but, still, they committed a grave breach of discipline, and I do not to-night say anything more about that part of the case. Then there are the men who were dismissed simply for attending the meetings or becoming members of the Postmen's Union. I hold in my hand a printed statement of the reasons for which postmen have been dismissed. In that paper I see over and over again statements of this kind:—"Dismissed for attending a meeting in Hyde Park;" "Dismissed for attending a meeting on Clerkenwell Green," and so on. I desire to call particular attention to the case of one postman of long service to whom a number of questions were addressed by the officials. The first question is as follows:—

"You are called upon to state what action or part you took in the recent postmen's agitation."

Now, I can hardly conceive anything more inconsistent with fair play than to ask a man a question of that kind. If you have any complaint against your servants surely you should prefer a specific charge against them, and give them the opportunity either of defending or explaining, or, possibly, of apologising for their conduct. Here the official appears to have adopted the plan of putting fishing questions to these comparatively illiterate men in the hope, I suppose, of obtaining from them entangling answers. The second question was to the following effect:—

"Why did you attend the Fawcett Association meeting, and on that occasion call upon the sorting force to join the Postmen's Union?"

The answer this man gave was, that permission had been granted to the members of the Fawcett Association to hold a meeting of the foreign branch; that such meeting was open for discussion and debate; that being in favour of Unionism, he decided to oppose the amendment that all sorters should join the Postmen's Union; and he drew attention to the recent statements made from time to time by the Postmaster General in the House of Commons admitting that the servants of the Post Office had a right to combine for their mutual benefit, and stating that in no case had any servant been punished for expressions of opinion at officially sanctioned meetings. The Postmaster General has again and again informed us that his only object in requiring the attendance of shorthand writers at postmen's meetings is to inform himself of the grievances of the men, but I point out here the use which has been made of the information conveyed by a shorthand writer. Some statement or argument made by one of the men who attended is made a charge against that man, and it appears to have been part of the case upon which he has been dismissed. The Postmaster General last Session gave an undertaking that he would carefully investigate each individual case. I should like to inform the House what is the proportion between the number of reinstated men and the number of the men originally dismissed. I will take the case of the Western District Office in Vere Street. Fifteen postmen were dismissed from that office for attending meetings or joining the Union, and of these two only have been reinstated. I may add that among the men whose livelihood has been taken away there were many who were teetotalers, and bore an exceptionally high character. It is not possible for the Postmaster General to contend that the severity of his action has been forced upon him by his subordinates at the local post offices. It is not the case that the local postmasters have reported that this severe treatment was necessary as a disciplinary measure, and that unless an example were made they could not be responsible for the discharge of their important functions. On the contrary, I am in a position to say that the local postmasters have from the very first held out to these dismissed men the hope of being reinstated, and I may say with confidence that no one is more surprised than they themselves are at the unparalleled severity of the Postmaster General. Nay, more—even officials at the Central Office have made to the men distinct pledges. On the 31st of July a deputation waited on the Postmaster General for the purpose of laying before him the grievances of the postmen, and urging the reinstatement of all men who had been dismissed. The deputation saw the Postmaster General, and afterwards they were seen by the Controller, Mr. Tombs, who was asked by a man named Cox what was intended to be done in the case of the men dismissed for merely attending meetings. The answer given by Mr. Tombs was that these men would be reinstated. Mr. Cox asked for and obtained from Mr. Tombs permission to repeat that promise to the men. So that if that statement is true—and I have every reason to believe it is—there has been a distinct violation of a pledge given by one of the most highly-placed of the right hon. Gentleman's subordinates. This is a most serious issue. The men for whom I plead have lost, not only their present means of livelihood, but also their prospective pensions, which are merely deferred pay. And that for what? They have lost these advantages simply because they attended meetings, or for becoming members of the Postmen's Union. These public servants are between the horns of a dilemma. The Postmaster General punishes them if they form a Union for their own protection. On the other hand, the Chancellor of the Exchequer punishes them if they appeal for the intervention of this House, for as recently as the occasion of the Lord Mayor's banquet he went rather out of his way to lecture hon. Members who ventured to interfere on their behalf. So that public servants are to be left absolutely defenceless against the heads of Departments or Parliamentary chiefs, who, without autocratic power, are quite as likely to act tyrannically or offensively towards those they employ as private bodies are under similar circumstances. I have thought it right to bring this matter before the attention of the House. I hope I may receive support from both sides; but if I am disappointed, then I can only appeal to a wider tribunal, and I shall be much surprised if the public outside do not resent the drastic and severe treatment meted out to a most deserving and respected body of public officials.

(7.13.) THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): I have to thank the hon. Member for the brevity of his speech; but, in doing so, I must point out that, until I came down to the House to-day, I did not know that this subject was to be brought forward, and consequently I am without any particular data to enable me to answer the statements which have just been made. I can only, therefore, reply to them in their general aspect, and I think I can satisfy the House that those statements have been put forward to the hon. Member—I will not say by him—in a very exaggerated form, and with a good deal of illustration of a not very accurate kind. The hon. Gentleman says that the men were dismissed for being members of the Postmen's Union, for attending the meetings in Hyde Park and on Clerkenwell Green, and for taking part in the agitation. As I say, I have not the papers at this moment in my hands, but I think I am accurate in stating that no man was dismissed for being a member of the Union. As to the Hyde Park meeting, that matter was discussed fully before the House rose a few months ago. The postmen were warned not to go to it, and it culminated in a disgraceful riot, in which two superior officers of the Post Office were cruelly handled by the mob. The men suspended for attending the meeting had in every case an opportunity of recovering their situations if they would make an apology and give assurances for their good behaviour in the future within a reasonable time. With regard to the Clerkenwell meeting it is possible that those who took a prominent part in that desertion of duty may have suffered for instigating the revolt, but I am not in a position to say that anybody was dismissed for attending that meeting. As to questions being put to the men with reference to the part they took in the agitation, there again I am without material to enable me to give a specific answer, but I would remind the House that the men to whom any such questions were put were already dismissed for deserting their duty, and that if such questions were put it was done with the object of enabling the men to clear themselves as far as possible from the imputation of having been instigators or ringleaders of the revolt, and not in order that they might condemn themselves. If questions were put at all it was for the purpose of eliciting extenuating circumstances on behalf of the men. The hon. Member has also referred to some men having been dismissed for taking part in a meeting of the Fawcett Association. I am very much inclined to doubt whether any man was dismissed for merely attending a meeting of that Association. The hon. Member speaks of my having undertaken to examine into each case. He must be already aware that I have given to each case all the attention which it is possible for me to give. I had all the papers relating to each individual case sent to me for consideration. I read through every letter, and carefully studied the records of character in the case of every man. There were several men who made no appeal for reinstatement, and the cases of those men were allowed to go by default; but in regard to all the other cases I gave the best attention *I could to every representation or recommendation that was made to me in their behalf, whether by persons outside or inside the Post Office. As to only two of the 15 men dismissed from the Western District Office having been reinstated, I think that that is extremely probable. I cannot now give the reasons for the action in that particular instance, but I can say that I was most anxious to find extenuating circumstances in every case, and that whenever such circumstances existed, or there was even reasonable ground for supposing the existence of extenuating circumstances, I gave the offender the benefit of them. The hon. Member says that local postmasters did not urge severity, and were astonished at my decision. Well, as to any communication by the local postmasters with the Postmaster General, and the statement that they were astonished at my decision, I fail to see how the hon. Member could become aware of such communications, because they would be strictly confidential; and I am unwilling to believe that any local postmaster would commit such a serious breach of duty as to divulge them.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I founded my allegation on the statements made again and again by the local postmasters, especially the postmaster in the Eastern District Office.

MR. RAIKES: I am unaware of any statement having been made by the postmaster of the Eastern District Office to the hon. Member or anyone else. I can only say I am surprised that any Postmaster can have committed such a breach of duty as to have entered such a protest as that the hon. Member speaks of.

MR. PICKERSGILL: It was not a breach of duty at all.

Mr. Raikes

MR. RAIKES: I can only say, speaking from recollection, that my belief is that I reinstated far more than I dismissed of the men who were recommended to me for reinstatement by the local postmasters.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman state that the number reinstated in the Eastern District of those recommended for reinstatement by the local postmaster exceeded the number dismissed?

MR. RAIKES: I am not in a position to make that statement. The hon. Member, by not giving me timely notice of his intention to raise this subject, has precluded me from the possibility of making a specific statement to-night. I am not speaking of one district in particular. It is very possible that in one district the number dismissed may have been greater than the number reinstated, but I am speaking of the whole force. It is quite possible that in some districts I reinstated more men than in others. With reference to the statement of the hon. Member respecting certain communications which are said to have passed between Mr. Tombs, the Controller, and a Mr. Cox—whose name I cannot now recall—it is quite possible that some communication did take place, and that some statement may have been made, and made in good faith, but I am persuaded there is some misapprehension in the matter, for I feel certain that the Controller would never have made any such unqualified statement as the hon. Member has alleged. I apologise for detaining the House, because the whole matter was threshed out on the Estimates in July last, and it has now been brought up again in a very loose manner, and without any particular notice. I have only further to repeat what I said on the previous occasion, namely, to express my sincere regret that I cannot with the full consideration of my public duty go further than I did in reinstating these unfortunate men. I think a great many of them are very much to be pitied, for they no doubt acted under bad guidance, and I sincerely commiserate the position in which they are placed. But my duty is first to the Service over which I have the honour to preside. I am bound to maintain discipline and order in that Service, and I believe that that discipline and order can only be attained and maintained by making examples of those who deserted their duty in the most conspicuous manner in this unfortunate affair. I have only further to say that if the hon. Member wishes I will make inquiry as to the alleged conversation of Mr. Cox with the Controller, this being the only case in which the hon. Member by giving names has enabled me to follow up the statements made.

(7.26.) MR. ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman why he has paid no attention to the Petition I presented to him from 57 dismissed postmen of the East End of London who had been in the Service for terms ranging from three to thirty years. These men, unfortunately, acting under bad advice, went out on strike for a few hours. These men did not join the Postmen's Union, and they did not attend any meetings in Hyde Park, and yet, because they struck work for two hours only, they were discharged and thrown helpless on the world. As I say, I myself presented a Petition in their behalf to the Postmaster General, and the right hon. Gentleman gave me reason to believe that the men would be reinstated if their characters were found to bear investigation.

MR. RAIKES: I hope the hon. Member will allow me to say that I never made any such statement.

MR. ISAACSON: I will read what the right hon. Gentleman said. He said that—"He would inquire into individual cases, and if he found that their characters were satisfactory, he would reinstate them, with all due regard for the Public Service."

MR. RAIKES: Hear, hear.

MR. ISAACSON: Well, the characters of the men were investigated, and were found to be satisfactory; yet when I again wrote to the Postmaster General I received a reply that the right hon. Gentleman declined to interfere in the matter. The promise made to me with regard to those men has not, therefore, been carried out. I believe the men have been very harshly treated, especially when it is considered that the feeling of insubordination at the time in question would never have arisen if a proper system had been adopted at the Post Office to put a stop to the widespread discontent that existed. I do now trust that the Postmaster General will go through these 57 cases again. The men deserve well of the Post Office. They have been diligent in the discharge of their duty—some of them for 30 years, and I think it a great shame that they should be thrown out of work and compelled—knowing no other business than that of postmen—to go skulking about London to earn a shilling where they can. I trust that the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General will look into this case, and, if possible, allow further reinstatements to be made. As it is, not a single reinstatement has been made, although the characters of these men will bear the strictest investigation.

(7.30.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): The Postmaster General has stated that this question was thoroughly thrashed out a few months ago, but I trust he will allow me to remind him of the position in which it was left just before the House rose at the end of last Session. The right hon. Gentleman then gave us an assurance that he would investigate the whole of these cases, and we are now in the position of knowing that the result of that investigation has been very unfortunate indeed for the poor postmen who had been discharged. He has said to-night that he was hardly prepared to meet the question thus brought on; but he must recollect that a large number of men who have devoted many years to the Public Service were not only discharged from the Post Office, but, having been discharged, they have thereby suffered great disadvantage in their efforts to obtain other employment. Many of them have come to me, and I have advised them to seek other employment; but they have said that the fact of their having been discharged from the Post Office has told so heavily against them that, had they lost their characters through any really serious dereliction of duty, they could not have been placed in a worse position. Even the Postmaster General must admit that the charge should be a very serious one that would prevent even one out of a total number of 57 men from being reinstated. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman can hardly deny that the action he has taken has been very severe indeed. I have taken the trouble to investigate the statements of many of the men, and as far as I could get evidence in the cases of those who have been in the Service a large number of years, they have discharged their duties well and faithfully in the past, as is proved by the fact that they have earned good conduct stripes, one of these men wearing no less than three of them, which is at least a proof that for a long period of years he has performed his duties thoroughly in the judgment of his superiors. This being the case, I think we have good cause for asking the Postmaster General to re-investigate, at least, some of these cases. I will take only two of the districts. In one of them there were 57 men discharged, of whom not one has been reinstated; and the Postmaster General has admitted the allegation made by the hon. Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. Pickersgill) as to the Eastern District, that out of the 15 men who were dismissed only two have been reinstated. My hon. Friend spoke of a man who attended the first Post Office Association meeting. He did not say the man was discharged for attending that meeting as a member of the Post Office Association, because the man was not qualified to belong to that Association; he merely attended to ask the sorters to form a Union of their own, in which they might be allowed to associate in the same manner as the other servants of the Post Office. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General must see that a new departure is wanted in the case of these men—that some very broad and generous line must be laid down, otherwise this question will arise again as soon as opportunity is given for it. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give the House a clear and definite statement as to the position these men are to occupy—whether they are to be allowed to organise themselves for their own benefit and protection or not. I certainly think that some line with regard to the right of meeting on the part of these men ought to be laid down. I will not press the question further now; but I do say that if, as the right hon. Gentleman admits, many of these men have not been reinstated, their cases ought at least to be re-investigated. The right hon. Gentleman has said that those who have not been reinstated are to be pitied. And I put it to him whether, if they are deserving of his pity, they shall not be re-appointed? They now stand in this position: In many cases they have sacrificed not only the work of a large number of years, but their chance of pensions has also gone, their prospects in life being thus entirely ruined. Under these circumstances, I ask the right hon. Gentleman can he not meet these men in a more liberal spirit?

(7.37.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): As it may be some time before we shall have an opportunity of reopening this matter on the Estimates, I think it desirable to offer some slight criticism on the attitude the right hon. Gentleman has taken on this question. He has spoken to-night in even harsher terms than on former occasions of these men being leaders in the revolt, which clearly shows that, however much he may talk of his most anxious desire to consider all the circumstances and temper justice with mercy and all that sort of thing, he nevertheless entertains the same strong view we have always known him to hold as to the right of the men to form a Union. I will not trouble the House with details, but I must say I think the right hon. Gentleman was not quite exact in speaking of the loose manner in which the hon. Member for Bethnal Green brought this matter forward. The hon. Member made statements backed up by verbatim reports, and those statements, together with others made from other quarters of this House, show that we on this side are even better informed on the question under discussion than the right hon. Gentleman himself. Without going into detail, I would simply ask the House in a broad general way whether the men are or are not to have the right which is accorded to all other working men throughout the country, of combining for their mutual interest and protection where individually they are not strong enough to obtain fair play. On this important question the right hon. Gentleman has deliberately cast down his gage, and declared that nothing shall induce him to respect the Union, or the right of the men to form a Union, but that, on the contrary, he will do everything in his power to smash any Union of those under his control. The right hon. Gentleman took up the same position on previous occasions, and has re-asserted it in rather violent language against the men this evening. That is the present position of this question, and it is a position which I ask the House not to endorse. There are one or two points which I might be allowed to say a word upon before resuming my seat. The right hon. Gentleman defended himself on the point which my hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green insisted upon as to the questions put to the men before reinstatement. But I say that those questions were put merely to induce the men to incriminate themselves, and not as the right hon. Gentleman put it, to enable them to clear themselves. The right hon. Gentleman might just as well ask us to believe that it is a principle of law or equity in this country that questions should be put to a prisoner for the purpose of enabling him by his answers to offer extenuating circumstances or to clear himself from guilt.

MR. RAIKES: After sentence.

MR. CONYBEARE: I do not quite catch the purport of the right hon. Gentleman's interruption, but it is surely a principle of justice in this country that men should not be led into incriminating themselves by having incriminating questions put to them. If the right hon. Gentleman had been so anxious to do everything in his power to reinstate these men and condone their offences he would not had done anything such as he must have seen the questions he put tended to do to make the men incriminate themselves. Such a system of dealing with—if you like to call them so—refractory servants must rather be to encourage among them the habit of lying in order to shelter themselves from consequences that might otherwise result. I will not combat the assertion of the right hon. Gentleman, but will give him full credit for sincerity when he stated that he had given all the attention possible to these cases. He was taking the waters on the Continent when the cases came on, and I hope he gave every possible consideration to them. Nevertheless, the number of those whom he reinstated was lamentably small compared with the number subjected to punishment. Last Session he asked us to believe that a great proportion of those who went out on strike were intimidated by the ringleaders of the agitation. I said at the time I did not believe there had been any intimidation, and the result of the right hon. Gentleman's investigation now shows what a miserably small amount of intimidation there must have been when so few of the men have been reinstated, because I conceive that those who were reinstated were not all subjected to intimidation, but that he also took into account other extenuating circumstances put forward by the men. The right hon. Gentleman commented severely on the breach of duty committed by certain postmasters who, as the hon. Member for Bethnal Green has stated, told the men they were astonished that so few had been reinstated. I should like to know what possible breach of duty could have been committed by these postmasters who expressed such an opinion in talking the matter over with the men. Had these postmasters come to myself or my friends and complained of what had taken place, and asked us to take it up in this House, there might have been some colour for what the right hon. Gentleman has said; but, as it is, I consider the course taken by the Postmaster General has been inconsistent with the demands of justice. The right hon. Gentleman has complained of the inconvenience of discussing this question on the present occasion, when the notice has been so short. For my part, I feel the inconvenience quite as much as he does. I was not aware of my hon. Friend's intention to bring it forward to-night; but we are discussing it, and the discussion is not wholly irrelevant or premature because the matter was discussed at some length last Session. This being a new Session, we are entitled to bring forward old grievances; if not, I do not see why we should keep the House open at all. I, for one, shall take every opportunity to protest against the harsh, high-handed, and unjust, if not wholly unconstitutional tional, acts for which the right hon. Gentleman is responsible.

(7.50.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I have no desire to discuss this matter at any length in an almost empty House, but I wish to join my friends in asking the Postmaster General to extend a little mercy to these poor men. It is in the recollection of hon. Members that when the House prorogued last Session we received what we conceived to be a distinct pledge from the Postmaster General that he would deal as tenderly and mercifully as possible with the postmen who had, unfortunately, rushed into a contest with their superiors. I then took the opportunity of stating that, as far as the small band of Members with whom I usually co-operate in this House was concerned, we were in no way responsible for that unfortunate strike; and that had the men followed the counsels we gave them, that strike would not have taken place. We promised to do the best we could to ventilate their grievances in this House, and, if possible, get justice done to them without their resorting to the foolish step they took. Our counsels were, however, overruled by some evil genius, and we know the unfortunate results which followed. I will not say that the Postmaster General violated his pledges to us—I will be more charitable, and say we misunderstood him; but, at any rate, we hoped he would restore to their places nearly all the men who had been so foolish and had acted so precipitately. I once more appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to exercise a little more clemency in the case of these poor men. Surely when the right hon. Gentleman has triumphed over the men as he has done he can afford in the hour of victory to give a little more consideration to those who are now in a starving condition, and from whom comes up the bitter cry that their wives and families are so in need. I hope before the Estimates come under consideration the right hon. Gentleman will render it unnecessary that we should again raise this question, and that he will not, after these men have suffered months of privation, continue conduct which I cannot but describe as cruel. These men acted foolishly I admit, but I would put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether he would like to face his family suffering from privation, or be deprived of his situation merely because his colleagues considered that he had been insubordinate? The right hon. Gentleman may smile at the suggestion; but if he saw these men and their dependents wanting, as they are, the necessities of life, I think, rather than smile, he would feel grief, and be moved by it to generous action. In what I have said I have no particular interest or party purpose to serve; I simply make an appeal in behalf of suffering fellow-men, and bespeak for them considerate treatment even at this the eleventh hour.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

POILLEN FISHERIES (IRELAND) BILL.

(No. 91.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.), in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, said that it had been submitted to a representative body of fishermen, and he thought he might assure the House that they fully approved of them.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

MOTION.

MIDWIVES REGISTRATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Fell Pease, Bill to provide for the registration of Midwives, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Fell Pease, Sir Frederick FitzWygram, Sir Guyer Hunter, Sir Roper Lethbridge, Dr. Farquharson, Mr. Rathbone, and Mr. Pritchard Morgan.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 133.]

LAND PURCHASE ACTS (IRELAND) (APPLICATIONS).

Return ordered—

“Giving particulars of the cases in which the Land Commission has received applications from purchasers of their holdings under the Land Purchase Acts, 1885 and 1888, for an extension of the time of purchase or an abatement in the amount of instalments due.”—(Mr. John Ellis.)

House adjourned at Eight o'clock till Monday next.

Monday, 1st December, 1890.

MR. SPEAKER'S CONTINUED ABSENCE.

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House that Mr. Speaker was again unavoidably prevented from taking the Chair of the House this day.

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

QUESTIONS.

UNEQUAL PUNISHMENTS IN INDIA.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that one Kamar-ud-din, a Mahomedan resident in Calcutta, struck a servant, ruptured the servant's spleen, and thereby caused his death; that on the trial at Alipur the jury found the prisoner guilty of simple hurt only; and that the Judge inflicted one year's rigorous imprisonment, being the maximum punishment permitted by law; and whether he is also aware that Lance Corporal Rigney, at Delhi, in like manner, ruptured the spleen of a servant, causing death, the excuse alleged for the assault being that the servant was not pulling the punkah quickly enough, and that the Magistrate, Mr. Clifford, fined the accused Rs.25 only; and whether the Secretary of State will direct the Viceroy to make inquiries as to the circumstances under which such unequal punishments were inflicted for apparently identical offences?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): Mr. Deputy Speaker, the two cases which form the subject of the hon. Member's question were tried in different Provinces in India, and the differences in the circumstances of the two cases, which appear to be unknown to the hon. Member, might very well account for the differences of punishment awarded. The inadequacy of a sentence may, in India, form ground of appeal. The Secretary of State has no information on the cases, and does not see any reason for instituting an inquiry.

EMPLOYÉES ON THE BURMA STATE RAILWAY.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he can state how often the employés on the Burma State Railway are paid; whether some, and which, classes of railway officials are paid monthly, and whether some, and which, classes of railway servants are paid at much longer periods; whether he is aware that the poorer employés complain of the hardship of these postponed payments; whether there is any sufficient reason for not making such payments weekly; and whether the Secretary of State will take any action in the matter?

SIR J. GORST: Mr. Deputy Speaker, the questions of the hon. Member relate to matters of detail in connection with the management of an Indian railway, as to which the Secretary of State has very little information, and the regulation of which is within the proper functions of the Local Government. If any of the employés have grounds of complaint their proper course is to make representations to the Local Government. In the improbable event of such representations not receiving due consideration they can appeal to the Government of India and ultimately to the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State can take no action except upon Memorials and information transmitted to him through the Government of India in the regular and proper manner.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to give notice that I shall take such means as the proceedings of this House may afford me during this Session to make a full statement as to the disgraceful character of the condition of these men, especially as I understand that the Secretary of State proposes to make no inquiry into it.

IRELAND—ADVANCES UNDER LAND ACTS.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what sum of principal and interest, under the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Acts, 1885 and 1888, fell due for payment on 1st November last, and how much of this remains unpaid; and what arrears now exist of any instalments of principal and interest falling due for payment before 1st November, 1890?

M

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): My right hon. Friend has asked me to reply to this question. The Land Commissioners report that the sum of principal and interest under the Purchase of Land Acts, 1885 and 1888, which fell due for payment on November 1 last was £109,094. Of this the Commissioners received during the first 27 days of November £79,860, leaving in course of collection £29,234. The instalments of principal and interest which fell due before November 1, 1890, amounted to £409,698. Of this the Commissioners have received £408,276, leaving in course of collection £1,422.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when the Report of the Land Commission for the year ending August, 1890, will be distributed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Report of the Irish Land Commission for the year ending 31st of August, 1890, is being laid on the Table to-day.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the number of holdings in which the Land Commission have refused to make advances under "The Land Purchase Act, 1885," and the amount of money applied for; and whether he can state in how many cases the ground of refusal was that the terms agreed upon were excessive, in the sense that there was no sufficient security for the advance of money by the State?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that up to the 31st of October last the total number of holdings on which the Commissioners refused to make the advances applied for was 3,460, the total amount applied for in such cases being £1,448,364. Advances, however, in 1,087 of these cases were subsequently sanctioned for sums amounting to £433,423, the original sum applied for in such cases being £517,988. Of the 3,460 cases refused, about 2,500 were refused on the ground that there was not sufficient security for the advance applied for.

THE IRISH LAND BILL.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I wish to put a question to the Chief Secretary for Ireland, of which I have not given him notice. The right hon. Gentleman has two Land Bills before the House. I desire to know whether the two Bills are to be discussed at the same time, and whether the Second Reading of Bill No. 2 will follow immediately after that of Bill No. 1?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I apprehend that that is a matter for the Chair to decide. No doubt the most convenient course would be to discuss the general proposals of the Government at the same time. But each Bill is independent of the other, and can be considered by itself. There are subsidiary matters contained in the second Bill which need not, as a matter of necessity, be discussed in connection with the first measure.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Does the right hon. Gentleman propose to take the Second Reading of both Bills before Christmas?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That, Sir, is my hope.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can now state what is the result of the consideration which he has given to the claims to superannuation of the attendants and messengers at the South Kensington Museum?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I would refer my hon. Friend to the answer which I gave to a question on this subject on August 22 of last year, in which I stated the decision of the Treasury that these messengers and attendants have no legal claim to the benefits of the Superannuation Acts, but that I would see whether it would be possible to meet in any way what I might describe as a sentimental feeling on the part of the men that they had a claim to some consideration. In fulfilment of the pledge then given the Treasury submitted a proposal to the Science and Art Department. Some objections have been raised to it which I have carefully considered, and the Treasury is about to make some modifications which I hope will finally settle the matter.

POST OFFICE REGISTERED ADDRESSES.

MR. BOULNOIS (Marylebone, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether a list of abbreviated addresses registered at the Post Office can be published and sold to the public at a cheap rate?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): In reply to my hon. Friend, I have to say that the firms and private persons in London who have registered abbreviated addresses for telegrams have been consulted, and that so many of them have objected altogether to the publication of their addresses that I should not be justified in adopting the suggestion which has more than once been made to me that an official list should be issued.

THE SAVINGS BANK DEPARTMENT.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that many of the clerks in the Savings Bank Department have, during the past three years, been repeatedly employed for periods of 10 and 11 hours per day; whether he has received any communication on the subject showing that some of the Post Office employés work as much as 13 hours per day; and whether it is possible to make arrangements for such additional clerical and other assistance as shall obviate the necessity of working such long hours?

*MR. RAIKES: The extra duty devolving on the clerks in the Savings Bank during the past few years, between the 1st of January and the 30th of April, has been in excess of the amount which is desirable. Some time ago I received a communication to the effect that this duty was excessive, and on the 8th November I caused a communication to be made to the staff, intimating that I would take measures to diminish the strain during the period in question.

ETHER DRINKING IN IRELAND.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the address delivered by Mr. Ernest Hart on ether drinking in Ireland, wherein it appears that large quantities of duty free methylated ether is retailed as a beverage and cheap intoxicant in South Derry and Tyrone, in virtue of the provisions of the Act 18 & 19 Vic. cap. 37; and whether he will take steps to restrict this sale, and thus prevent the serious evils which arise from it?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The improper use of ether in certain rural districts of the North of Ireland as an intoxicant and the serious and sometimes fatal results ensuing from this practice have received the careful attention of Her Majesty's Government, who consulted the Royal College of Physicians in Dublin on the matter. In accordance with a recommendation of the college, an Order of the Lord Lieutenant in Council was passed on Saturday last scheduling sulphuric ether as a poison, and it can now be only sold by qualified chemists and as a poison. It is hoped that this measure will effectually stop the supply of ether to the public as an intoxicant.

THE REVENUES OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in completing the Return on the revenues of the Church of England, the first part of which was issued in September last, it will be possible, in respect to Sections 1 and 2, to re-issue the Return with an additional column setting forth the present total income from all sources of the archiepiscopal and episcopal sees and the cathedral bodies; in respect to Section 3, whether the "gross annual income" there given includes the payments by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners out of their Common Fund; and, if not, can he explain why; whether the revenues of each parish can be given separately, as in the case of the Report for 1835 of the Church Inquiry Commission; and, if not, can he explain why; and whether the totals will be given for each county, and the gross total for all the counties together, and the totals under each source of income?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): In answer to the hon. Member, I have to say—first, that it would be misleading to show the total of the income from all sources of the archiepiscopal and episcopal sees, and the cathedral bodies under Part I. and II., as it would involve the inclusion of the incomes derived by certain sees and chapters from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, whereas that portion of their income is included in the sum of £950,000 referred to in the note at the foot of page 14 as the charge upon the gross revenues of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, which are fully set out in Part IV. The same objection applies to inclusion in Part III. of the sums paid by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to benefices by way of grants out of the Common Fund, as these also form a part of the £950,000 above referred to. Secondly, that the publication of the particulars of each individual benefice would involve an expenditure of time and labour and the incurring of cost out of all proportion to the end which would be gained. The Return ordered was limited to the giving of the particulars "in counties as far as practicable," and this has been done. Thirdly, that when the remainder of the Return is presented, if thought desirable it can be printed as a whole, and a summary given.

CHIEF CONSTABLE OF CARDIGAN-SHIRE.

MR. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardigan-shire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department with regard to his refusal to sanction the appointment by the Joint Standing Committee of the Cardiganshire County Council of the late Mr. David Evans, of Aberystwith, an officer of long standing and tried experience in the police force, and a man highly respected and of unimpeachable conduct, to the office of chief constable of that county, for the sole reason that Mr. Evans was a sergeant in the same force, whether the freedom of selection by standing committees in making such appointments is to be limited by the refusal of the Home

Mr. Pictou

Office to promote officers or sergeants in the same force?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The Statute requires the appointment to be subject to the approval of the Secretary of State. Each case has to be decided by him on its merits, with a view to discipline and efficiency in the force, and upon consideration of the reports received from the inspector of constabulary as to the qualifications of the particular candidate and the circumstances of the particular case. I followed this course in the case of Mr. Evans. It must be a very exceptional case in which it could be expected that the duties of chief constable in a county police force should be adequately discharged by a person promoted directly to that office from the rank of sergeant in the force.

*MR. B. ROWLANDS: Will the right hon. Gentleman say what the merits of the case were which influenced his decision other than that of promoting a sergeant in the force to the position of chief constable. Did the right hon. Gentleman in his letter to the County Council assign any other reason?

MR. MATTHEWS: In my note to the County Council I stated that Mr. Evans was a person entitled to the greatest respect. I do not wish to say anything now that might be painful to that gentleman's friends. I only assigned one reason, and I thought it a sufficient one.

*MR. B. ROWLANDS: May I ask if there was anything in connexion with Mr. Evans which the right hon. Gentleman did not state?

MR. MATTHEWS: I acted to the best of my judgment, and I decline to make it a personal question.

TOBAGO.

MR. PICTON for Mr. JUSTIN M'CARTHY (Londonderry): I beg on behalf of my hon. Friend to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, whether the Colonial Office has received the petition of certain dissatisfied litigants from Tobago, complaining of the judicial decisions of the Chief Justice, Sir John Gorrie; can he explain why these complaints, which had already been referred to the Privy Council, were not entertained; and also on what grounds the Secretary of State for the Colonies has intimated to the Governor of Trinidad, for the information of the petitioners, that should they have any precise charges to make against the judicial conduct of Sir John Gorrie, the Governor can deal with them in Executive Council: and, whether the Governor of a Colony is at liberty to try and to decide on the conduct of the Chief Justice acting in his judicial capacity?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Secretary of State received several petitions addressed to the Queen in Council complaining of the conduct of the Chief Justice in connection with actions before the Supreme Court in Tobago. These petitions were referred to the President of the Council, who considered that they did not disclose any matter at present appealable to the Judicial Committee in the exercise of its ordinary functions, and the Petitioners were so informed. The Secretary of State also received a petition addressed to himself by inhabitants of Tobago, complaining of the judicial conduct of Sir John Gorrie, and asking for the appointment of a Commission of Judges to inquire into their complaints. The Governor was directed to inform these Petitioners that the Secretary of State could not appoint a Commission of Judges to inquire into the action of the Chief Justice, and that if they had any grievances against Sir John Gorrie, apart from his decisions, which can be brought by way of appeal before a Higher Court, they should represent them to the Governor, stating their complaints in a definite and precise manner so that, if necessary, further inquiry might be made by the Governor and Executive Council. For the reason for giving that answer, and also in reply to the last paragraph of the question, I may refer the hon. Member to a Memorandum drawn up by the Lord President, and approved by the Lords of the Council, which will be found in Parliamentary Paper No. 139, of June, 1870, from which it will be seen that, in the opinion of the Privy Council, charges of misconduct against a Colonial Judge are most conveniently dealt with in the first instance by the Governor and his Executive Council, who may either remove a Judge under the Act 22 Geo. III, c. 75, subject to an appeal to the Privy Council, or suspend him under the general power to suspend Colonial Officers subject to confirmation or disallowance by the Queen, through the Secretary of State, who would, except in some very special case, advise Her Majesty to refer the matter to the Judicial Committee.

PORTUGAL AND THE EAST AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

MR. ALEXANDER M'ARTHUR (Leicester): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Her Majesty's Government has received information from the Governor of the Cape respecting certain natives of Mozambique, who escaped from the Rei de Portugal which called at Cape Town in August on its passage to St. Paul de Loanda, who are alleged to have been part of a cargo of slaves, and who were liberated by order of the Chief Justice of the Colony; whether Her Majesty's Government is aware that a regular traffic in East African Natives, for employment on the West Coast, is carried on by Portuguese vessels calling at Cape Town; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will take steps to prevent a continuance of this illegal practice?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The natives who escaped from the vessel in question were not liberated by order of the Chief Justice, the Court simply abstaining from making an order for their return to the steamer. They were stated by the Portuguese authorities to be military conscripts, not slaves. Her Majesty's Government have no reason to suppose that there exists such a traffic as that mentioned in the second portion of the question, but they have full confidence that the Cape Ministry would take the necessary legal measures to check it if did exist.

GOLD COAST—SLAVE TRADE.

MR. PICTON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Her Majesty's Government has yet received a Report from the Governor of the Gold Coast, with regard to cases of slave dealing in that Colony, investigation of which was promised to the Aborigines Protection Society by the Secretary of State in August last; and, if not, whether Her Majesty's Government will inform the House as to the steps which have been taken to secure a searching inquiry into this matter?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The letters of the Aborigines Protection Society were sent to the Governor in despatches, dated the 27th of August and the 17th of September last, but no reply has yet been received. It must be evident that for the Governor to make such a searching inquiry into the matter as is desired must take some little time, and that his Report cannot therefore be expected immediately; and, moreover, he has for some time past been much pressed with work owing to the absence and ill-health of many of his officers.

MR. PICTON: Have the Government communicated by telegram with the Governor of the Gold Coast?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The Governor has been informed of the circumstances.

GOLD COAST—CASE OF AKOTO MAMLEY.

MR. PICTON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Her Majesty's Government has received information as to the death, at Elmina, of Akoto Mamley, an old woman, who was sent to prison without trial by order of the Governor of the Gold Coast; if so, whether he can acquaint the House with the date and circumstances of her death; if not, whether Her Majesty's Government will call for a copy of the medical certificate, or Report of a coroner's inquest on the occurrence?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The circumstances under which Akoto Mamley was detained at Elmina were fully stated in my replies to questions put to me in this House on the 8th and 11th April, 1889, and are hardly correctly described by the hon. Member. The Governor reported on the 4th April last that Akoto Mamley had died on the 28th March of acute dysentery in the Colonial Hospital at Elmina. I may add that the other two Taviave prisoners, Bella Kwabina and Napadsehch, have since been released and sent back to their own country.

MR. PICTON: Was this woman sent to prison by order of the Council?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I cannot admit that that was so.

Mr. Picton

ZONE FARES ON AUSTRIAN RAILWAYS.

MR. BLUNDELL MAPLE (Camberwell, Dulwich): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can obtain a translation of the documents issued by the Austrian Government giving explanatory details of the Zone system of fares recently adopted upon the railways of that Empire, and whether he will lay the same upon the Table?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The Zone system of fares on railways is in force in Hungary, but not in Austria; and as yet only for passengers and not for merchandise. We have not received any documents giving explanatory details. Her Majesty's Consul General will be instructed to make a Report on the subject.

IMPORTATION OF FOREIGN CATTLE.

MR. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether his attention has been drawn to the report that recently, from one ship, in crossing the Atlantic, some 300 head of cattle were lost; and whether the Government are taking steps to minimise such occurrences?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): My attention has been called to the losses which occurred on board a ship which arrived at Newcastle from Montreal on November 9th, the Linda having lost during the voyage 379 cattle out of 554, after great suffering from exhaustion and suffocation. Acting under the powers vested in the Board of Agriculture by 47 and 48 Victoria, cap. 13, section 4, I have directed an order to be issued to prohibit the carriage of cattle by the vessel referred to.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether the statement made in the Annual Report of the Secretary of Agriculture in the United States that "Not a single case of contagious pleuropneumonia has been detected among American cattle shipped to Great Britain since March last," accords with his official information.

And whether any such cases have been detected on the landing of American cattle since American veterinarians have been appointed to inspect American cattle landed at British ports?

*MR. CHAPLIN: The only Annual Report which has been received from the Secretary of the Agricultural Department of the United States is for 1889, but we are unable to find any statement therein such as that which appears in the hon. Member's question. I am informed that no cases of contagious pleuro-pneumonia have been detected among cattle landed from the United States since the 29th of March last, and therefore none since the arrival in this country of the three veterinarians appointed by the United States authorities to visit the foreign animals' wharves in Great Britain where American cattle may be landed. But so recently as September 30th a Report was received from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Washington reporting the re-appearance of pleuro-pneumonia in the State of New Jersey, a district which was supposed to be free from that disease, as no cases had been reported therein since January 20th of this year.

CYPRUS—REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE.

MR. LEVESON-GOWER (Stoke-upon-Trent): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been directed to the unsatisfactory account of the revenue and expenditure of the Island of Cyprus contained in the Report of Her Majesty's High Commissioner for 1888-9; whether they have observed that whilst the revenue of the year amounted to £149,362, and the local expenditure to no more than £109,963, the payments made by Her Majesty's Treasury to the Porte under the Convention of 1878 was £82,799, and the Parliamentary Grant given in aid of such payments was £55,000; and whether, in view of the general agricultural and commercial depression prevailing in Cyprus according to the Report, and of the continued non-fulfilment by the Porte of its engagement under the Convention of 1878 to introduce reforms into the administration of Armenia, Her Majesty's Government will consider the advisability of devoting such tribute money to the relief of the inhabitants of Cyprus until the Porte shall have fulfilled its part of the Convention of 1878 by establishing some form of Government in Armenia under which the lives and property of Christians may be secure?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The figures in the second paragraph of the question are correct; but the Tribute is not actually paid to the Porte, being applied to the service of the Turkish loan of 1855, which was guaranteed by Great Britain and France.

CYPRUS—CRIMINAL ADMINISTRATION.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in accordance with the promise he gave on the 10th of June last in reply to a question addressed him as to crime in Cyprus, he has made inquiries with regard to the murder of an advocate, named Michaelides, at Kyrenia, in February last, and to the case of poisoning of Aghissilaos Artemis, another advocate; whether he is aware that these two crimes attracted great public attention in the Island; whether, in respect of the first case, any and what persons were suspected of having an interest in the death of Michaelides; whether he is aware that it is a matter of notoriety in the Island that he had incurred the displeasure of certain persons shortly before he was murdered; whether it is known in whose company he was before the murder; whether anyone has been apprehended for the same, and, if not, what steps have been taken to trace the perpetrator of the crime referred to; with regard to the case of poisoning, has any report been obtained from the district medical officer as to whether he considered that Mr. Artemis was poisoned; whether he treated him as having been poisoned; whether he made any chemical examination of the vomit, and, if not, what prevented him from doing so; whether any person was suspected of this poisoning; and, whether, although the district medical officer directed that the vomit should be kept, it was thrown away, and, if so, by whom and by whose direction was that done?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Inquiry has been made as promised. A Report has been furnished by the Chief Commandant of Police, which the hon. Member can see if he will be good enough to call at the Colonial Office.

LIGHT GOLD.

MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he intends to introduce the Bill dealing with the light gold still in circulation; and, whether he proposes to issue one pound notes against a portion of the gold which may be demonitized?

MR. GOSCHEN: A Bill dealing with light gold has long since been in print, and I should have asked the House to deal with it last Session if there had been time, but I have not yet made up my mind whether I should introduce it in precisely the same form. I have observed that many people seem to see a special relation between the withdrawal of light gold and the issue of £1 notes, yet the expediency of either measure is independent of the other.

THE WEST HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS COMMISSION.

DR. M'DONALD (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government have considered the Report of the West Highlands and Islands Commission; and how soon is the result of their deliberations on the said Report likely to be made known to the House?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Report of the Commission is under the consideration of the Government, and a statement on the subject will be made later in the Session—a statement which, I hope, will not be long delayed.

THE IRISH MAILS.

MR. PICTON: On behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) I wish to put a question to the Postmaster General of which he has received private notice, namely, why a special train was not sent down to Derry to-day with the late English mails?

SIR J. GORST: I have been requested by my right hon. Friend to answer the question. The arrangement for the use of a special train, under certain conditions, for the transmission of the English mails for Belfast was a provisional arrangement and limited to Belfast. In the event of it being adopted permanently, the question of making it applicable to Derry will be carefully considered.

HOURS OF ADULT LABOUR.

Address for—

"Return showing any laws or regulations affecting the Hours of Adult Labour in each of the Colonies, also showing in each Colony the hours worked per day, and wages paid in various industries, so far as the same can be ascertained."—(Mr. Bradlaugh.)

POST OFFICE TELEGRAPHS.

Copy ordered—

"Of Account showing the Gross Amount received and the Gross Amount expended in respect of the Telegraph Service from the date of the Transfer of the Telegraphs to the State to the 31st day of March, 1890 (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 50, of Session 1890)."—(Mr. Jackson.)

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 22.]

QUEEN'S SPEECH (ANSWER TO ADDRESS).

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Lord ARTHUR HILL) reported to the House, That Her Majesty, having been attended with their Address of the 25th day of November last, was pleased to receive the same very graciously, and to give the following Answer:—

I have received with much satisfaction your loyal and dutiful Address.

I am confident that the matters which I have recommended to your consideration will receive your earnest attention; and you may rely on My co-operation in your endeavours to promote the well-being and happiness of My people.

EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS (SCOTLAND) (ANDERSON'S INSTITUTION, ELGIN).

ANSWER TO ADDRESS.

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD reported to the House, That their Address of the 7th day of August, in the last Session of Parliament, relative to Educational Endowments (Scotland) (Anderson's Institution, Elgin), had been presented to Her Majesty; and that Her Majesty had been pleased to receive the same very graciously, and to give the following Answer:—

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

I have received your Address praying that I will withhold my Consent from that part of the Scheme of the Educational Endowment (Scotland) Commissioners for the administration of the Endowment in the Burgh and County of Elgin, known as the Elgin Institution for the Support of Old Age and the Education of Youth, which consists of the following words, viz.:—"for girls" and "female" in the third line of Section 29; the word "girl" in the second and fifth lines of Section 32; and the word "girl" in the first line and "female" in the third line of Section 33 of the said Scheme.

I have given directions for these words to be omitted accordingly in compliance with your advice.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY BILL.—(No. 110.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(3.58.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Mr. Deputy Speaker, in the few observations which it will be my duty to submit to the House I shall not address myself in any way to the Amendment which the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Rendel) has placed on the Paper. The hon. Member asks this House to affirm—

"That no measure dealing with tithe rent-charge will be satisfactory to the people of Wales which does not recognise the fact that tithes are national property, to be devoted to national purposes, and that the tithe rent-charge in Wales ought to be applied in accordance with the constitutionally-expressed wishes of the people of the Principality."

Now, Sir, I do not agree with the view of the hon. Member and his friends that Parliament has any right to deal with tithe rent-charge as national property. But I decline to argue that question now, with every respect to them and with a complete admission of the importance of the Amendment in itself, because I would venture to submit to the House now, as I submitted last year, that this is not a Bill which in any way proposes to deal with the appropriation of tithe. It is a Bill solely intended and purporting to secure the better payment of tithe, to prevent property which, whether it belongs to the tithe owners, as we think, or to the nation, as hon. Members opposite think, is a valuable property, from being lost by remaining in the pockets either of the owners or occupiers of titheable land who have no right to it. Therefore, Sir, I shall confine myself to an attempt to explain to the House the provisions of this Bill and the difference between this Bill and that which it was my lot to introduce last Session. In the first place, hon. Members will have observed that this measure contains no provision for redemption. In 1889 a very general desire was expressed among Members on both sides of the House that the law relating to the redemption of tithes should be amended, and last Session we inserted in our Bill certain proposals with a view to facilitating the redemption of tithes. I am bound frankly to admit that those proposals did not meet with any very encouraging reception, and I think that, generally speaking, there has been shown since they were made a disposition on the part of hon. Members who have principally taken an interest in this question to prefer that there should be some inquiry, both into the principle of the law of redemption of tithes and the mode in which that law has been administered, before any fresh legislation is proposed on the subject. We have, therefore, omitted from this Bill any provisions as to the redemption of tithes, and it is our intention to advise the appointment of a small and competent Commission which shall examine into the matter, and which will, I hope, without any undue expenditure of time, make such a Report on the subject as may enable Parliament to deal with it to the benefit of owners and payers of tithes. Therefore this Bill is confined simply to amending the law relating to the recovery of tithes, and in the first and second clauses of the Bill we have endeavoured to carry into effect the proposition that the owner of titheable land should be prevented from contracting himself out of his liability to pay rent-charge, and that the law should be altered to give the tithe owner a direct remedy against the owner of the land instead of the tenant. Last Session I was told that I was treating this matter as if it were only a Welsh matter. There is no doubt in my mind that the urgency of this question mainly arises from the widespread resistance to the payment of tithes in Wales, and to the scenes of disgraceful violence by which that resistance has too often been accompanied. But we are prepared to maintain that it is quite as necessary in England as in Wales that the owners of land should in the future be prevented from making their tenants parties to a transaction with which they have nothing whatever to do, and that the produce and stock of a tenant should be safe from being distrained upon for a debt due by the landlord. There are two important changes in the procedure proposed in the first and second clauses of the Bill. The first clause proposes, as the Bill of last year proposed, that tithe rent-charge should be payable by the owner of the land, notwithstanding any contract between him and the occupier of the land, and as that imposes a liability on the owner, it goes on to provide that where the occupier is liable under any contract made before the passing of this Act to pay the tithe rent-charge, then he shall cease to be bound by that part of the contract; but during the period he shall, unless he otherwise agrees, owe to the owner such sum as the owner has to pay for that tithe rent-charge. Last Session the Bill proposed that the sum to be paid by the occupier should be owed as rent, and that therefore it would be recoverable in the same way as rent. This Bill proposes that it shall only be recovered as tithe rent-charge is recoverable—namely, by distress under the Tithe Act. Therefore I think it will be clear to the House that in this respect the tenant is in no way placed in a worse position by the provisions of the Bill than that in which he has placed himself by voluntary contract on his part, and, of course, it will be in his power—in the power either of the landlord or the tenant if they dislike that position to terminate the contract in the ordinary manner. There is another important change of procedure in the second clause, which deals with the recovery of tithe rent-charge.

Sir M. Hicks Beach

Last Session's Bill proposed that recovery by means of a Receiver should be substituted for distress under the Tithes Act. That was objected to very strongly, because it was contended that such a procedure would be very oppressive upon the owners who were also the occupiers of the land, and particularly on small freeholders. Now, the Irish Act, under which owners of land there were made subject to the payment of tithe rent-charge, provided a mode of recovery which we have imitated in the present Bill. It provided for the appointment of a Receiver by the Court only in cases, where land was let, and therefore there was some rent to receive, and it provided also that where the owner was the occupier the recovery should be by distress. That is practically our proposal in the second clause of this Bill. Where the owner is also the occupier we propose to retain the power of distress under the Tithe Acts. Some Members may ask what is the object of enforcing this through the County Court. I will endeavour to explain. I believe it will be a great advantage to the tithepayer because, while now he is liable to be distrained upon at the will of the tithe owner by any agent appointed by the tithe owner, in future he can only be distrained upon by a qualified officer, after being heard by the County Court, which will decide, after giving him full advantage of the provisions of the third clause of the Bill. It will also be an advantage to the titheowner, because the direction of the Court will save him from the damages to which he might become liable if he distrained on a mere tenant under the mistaken belief that such tenant was the owner of the land. These are the main alterations in the procedure proposed in the first and second clauses in the Bill; and now I come to the third clause. It has been contended very often before, and I daresay it will be contended again, that the proposals of this Bill amount to an alteration of the Act of 1836, in favour of the titheowner, and that Parliament ought not to take this step without making some corresponding alteration in favour of the tithepayer. Well, that argument ought not to be carried quite so far as it has been, because it is absolutely contradicted by the simple fact that on no less than 14 occasions since the passing of the Act of 1836 that Act has been amended by Parliament, in favour of one side or the other, without taking any corresponding advantages into consideration at all. I think that view to which I have referred underlies both the Amendments on the Paper by the hon. Members for Suffolk and Essex. The Member for Essex goes further than the Member for Suffolk. He refers in his Amendment to appreciation or depreciation in a way which I confess I do not understand. He proposes—

“That it is desirable that, before any legislation affecting the appreciation or depreciation of tithe rent-charge is presented to Parliament, an inquiry should be made, either by Royal Commission or otherwise, into the working of the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836, under the present altered and unforeseen conditions of agriculture.”

Well, if the effect of this Bill was to depreciate the tithe rent-charge, I cannot see on what ground, from the hon. Member's point of view, his proposition could be sustained. His contention is that it would appreciate the value of the tithe rent-charge; but I venture to say that if we have due regard to the great and increasing number of cases in which the tithe rent-charge is paid directly by the owners of land to the tithe owner, and also to the fact that there will be cases, if this Bill becomes law, in which it will be inconvenient to the tithe owner rather than to his advantage—if we have due regard to these facts I do not believe that such calculations as have been made of the great appreciation of tithe rent-charge which the Bill will produce will be found to have any real foundation whatever. I believe that any appreciation of tithe which may be the result of this Bill will be amply met by the proposals which are contained in the third clause. But what do the hon. Members really want? What I think they really want is contained in the words of the hon. Member for Suffolk (Mr. F. Stevenson), who proposes

“That, in the opinion of this House, no measure dealing with the mode of levying tithe rent-charge will be satisfactory which fails to make provision for an equitable revision of tithes in accordance with the altered conditions of agriculture.”

That is their view; they ask that tithe rent-charge should be lowered where the value of the land out of which it issues has decreased since 1836; but when the matter was discussed in the House last Session, the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Pictou) and, I think, the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) also, pointed out that the matter could not stop there, and that, in fact, whoever may be the person who stands in the position of the tithe owner, whether the existing tithe owner or the nation at large, in common justice we could not require him to have his good bargain under the Tithe Act of 1836 set aside, and his bad bargain under that Act enforced, and that, therefore, equitable revision would mean that where the tithe was too high it should be lowered, and that it should be raised where it was too low. I, however, venture to submit that it would be absolutely impossible for any Commission to recommend, or for the House of Commons to adopt, such a proposal as that, because to do so would be to reverse the great principle of the Act of 1836, which was universally accepted at that time, and which, I believe, would be universally accepted at the present day—namely, the abolition of the growing tithe. For more than 50 years the owners of titheable land have been rendering their land more productive by expending large sums upon its improvement on the faith of the principle so embodied in the Act of 1836 that growing tithe should be abolished, and I should like to know how it is possible now to turn round upon those men and say, “We have lowered the tithe in certain cases owing to the depreciation in the value of land, but we intend to raise the amount of the tithe charged upon your land because owing to your expenditure it has increased in value.” A policy such as that would be an impossible one, and therefore I consider that the so-called equitable proposal put forward by the hon. Members for Essex and Suffolk would not be entertained by the House of Commons for a moment. What I think, however, can be done is to meet reasonably these hard cases which are due to the temporary depression of agriculture. I call that depression temporary because it is the opinion of those who are most experienced in such matters that the present depression is by no means likely to be of a permanent character. The principle upon which we have attempted to deal with these hard cases is that the tithe rent-charge should never be permitted to exceed the net profits of the land. I think that to apply that principle boldly would be in the interest of the tithe owner. I think that it is generally felt that it would be impossible for us to apply fairly the principle I have just indicated without the intervention of some local tribunal accustomed to the practice of local valuation, because, where land is not let, it would be difficult to arrive fairly at the net value of it in any particular year without ascertaining the rent that it might reasonably be expected to let for. Therefore it was that last year I proposed that the net profit should be a special rateable value fixed by the Assessment Committee of the Union in which the lands are situated, and that the tithe rent-charge should never exceed the amount so fixed, the result of which would have been that an allowance varying with local circumstances of from 10 to 15 per cent., being the difference between the gross estimated rental and the rateable value, would have been made in all cases to the owner of land for repairs and other expenses, the remaining balance being taken as the net profit of the land. I confess that last year I found some little difficulty in explaining that proposal, even to Members of this House, but that, I have no doubt, was my own fault. I feel, however, pretty certain that, owing to the peculiar nature of our rating laws, it would be very difficult indeed to frame that proposal in such a shape as to be intelligible to the Assessment Committees, who would have to administer the law, and, therefore, this year we have departed from that proposal, and have substituted for it that which is embodied in the third clause in the Bill, namely, that the assessment of the land under Schedule B of the Income Tax shall be taken as the gross annual profit of the land. Of course, that amount would be merely the basis for the calculation of the net profits, because it would be necessary to make certain deductions from it in order to arrive at the net profits of the land. What those deductions should be is a matter for future discussion, but we propose that they shall be taken as one-third. Therefore, in no case would

the tithe rent-charge exceed two-thirds of the amount at which the land was assessed under Schedule B of the Income Tax. I believe that that proposal is more favourable to the tithe rent-charge payer than that which was contained in the Bill of last Session. I believe that it will in all cases allow not merely for repairs and maintenance and management of the property, but that it will also leave some beneficial interest to the payer of the tithe rent-charge. I must say that, in my opinion, neither those who originally gave the tithes nor those who framed the Act of 1836 intended that the tithe rent-charge should deprive the owner of the land of all interest in his property. Our proposals could not result in permanent loss to the tithe owner, because if through them the amount of the tithe were to be reduced in any case owing to the depreciation in the value of land, and the value of the land were to increase subsequently, the Surveyor of Taxes would, undoubtedly, raise the assessment of the land under Schedule B of the Income Tax, and thus the tithe rent-charge would be raised automatically. There are provisions in the clause which will prevent it from being unfairly applied against the tithe-owner, where there has been a special apportionment of tithe rent-charge on a certain portion only of the land of a parish, or where land is intentionally kept in an unprofitable condition for building purposes. I do not think that it is necessary for me to say anything about the other clauses in the Bill, but I venture to contend that by the proposals in the third clause we have done something to meet the desire that this Bill should contain an alteration in the law favouring the tithepayer as well as the tithe-owner. We were twitted last Session, and I daresay that we shall be twitted again this year, with changing our proposals in this matter. I can only say that I am not in the least ashamed of having altered proposals relating to the details of legal procedure in a matter which is about as complicated and technical as any which the House could be called upon to deal with, but I should be ashamed if I had neglected to avail myself to the full of the criticisms and the suggestions which can be drawn not merely from the discussions of last Session, but from the Amendments which were then placed upon the Paper. We have endeavoured as far as is legitimately consistent with the principles of our Bill to meet those criticisms and suggestions, and we shall continue to follow that course with regard to any suggestions that may be made in the course of the Debate on this Bill, and which appear to spring not from a mere desire to delay and to obstruct legislation, but from a real anxiety to secure, with fairness to both sides, an amendment of the law which all parties profess to desire in itself, and which, in my humble opinion, has been too long delayed. I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir M. Hicks Beach.)

(4.28.) MR. HERBERT GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden), in whose name the following Amendment stood upon the Paper:—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that, before any legislation affecting the appreciation or depreciation of tithe rent-charge is presented to Parliament an inquiry should be made, either by Royal Commission or otherwise, into the working of the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836, under the present altered and unforeseen conditions of agriculture," said: I am glad to notice that the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman have not been addressed to the criticism of his Bill, and I think that both he and the Government have great cause to be thankful at the position of the question, because I notice that in the present measure the Government have retreated from all the propositions which they have brought forward in all their previous measures, such propositions involving not merely matters of legal procedure, but vital principles. Her Majesty's Government have in reality turned a complete political somersault, and have brought in an entirely different measure. In the Bill brought in in 1888 the onus of the tithe was absolutely placed upon the occupier. I ask the House whether these are mere questions of procedure? Therefore, I say the right hon. Gentleman and the Government are open to the criticisms I have ventured to offer. Well, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has made an important statement in the course of his speech in moving the Second Reading of the Bill. He has stated that he shall ask the House to assist in the appointment of a Commission to consider the redemption of tithe. Now, that is a subject on which many hon. Members hold different views; but speaking from the point of view from which I regard it, from which my own constituents regard it, and, I may say, from which the tithepayers of the Eastern and Southern Counties regard it, I say that we should not welcome any Commission for the Redemption of Tithes if it were not also charged with the establishing what we consider a fair tithe would be. The right hon. Gentleman went on to drag the red herring of growing tithe across the path of those gentlemen who are opposed to the view which those in the Eastern Counties take on this subject, but I hope the House will permit me to point out that in the Amendment which stands in my name I have merely asked the Government for an inquiry with a view of seeing whether it is necessary that any revision of the tithe should take place. Neither am I in any way opposed to legislation on the subject. On the contrary, I hold that legislation may be necessary and salutary in regard to this highly difficult and important question. Just as our predecessors in 1836 were able to carry through their exceedingly difficult, technical, and much misunderstood Act, so, in the present Parliament, if some reasonable and well-digested measure were approached in a moderate and conciliatory spirit by both sides of the House, it would be possible to legislate on this subject in the right direction. But whatever may be said by Her Majesty's Government, I am certain that this measure can only be regarded as a very small measure, and, also, as a most incomplete measure. It professes to deal, in some way, with the interests and grievances not only of the tithe owners, but also of the tithe bearers. With regard to the tithe bearers, as far as I can see, this Bill only touches the fringe of the question, and when its contents come to be known in those counties which are most concerned in the matter, it will be unanimously rejected by them as useless and unsatisfactory. When there are two or three parties to a dispute such as is raised between the tithe owners and tithe payers, legislation to be permanent must not be conceived in a one-sided spirit. If legislative action is to be satisfactory it will most probably take the form of a compromise, but it must be a fair compromise, in which both parties will be able to shake hands, and the result will be of a soothing character. But this Bill is not a sedative; it is rather an irritant; and, in my opinion, small as is its scope, it will have the effect of arousing and exciting the attention of the tithe payers, and inducing them seriously to consider their grievances; and, when the Government have thus aroused and excited the tithe payers' attention, the Bill they have introduced will leave them with the impression that they are, in reality, worse off than they were before. I do not suppose that anyone even on the Benches opposite will dispute that this question is a most highly complicated and difficult one. The Prime Minister certainly admitted this when I, and others, waited upon him as a deputation at the Foreign Office at the commencement of his term of office. He also admitted that this was his opinion when he introduced his Bill in the House of Lords, and he has again made the same admission, both in the Press and on the platform. But there is another and a very significant circumstance which may be regarded as conclusive of the fact that the Government look upon the question before us as one of an exceedingly difficult and complicated character, and that is the fact that, although we are now entering on the fifth Session of the present Parliament, during which they have held office for four years, and although this question is admitted by them to be of the highest importance, Session after Session has been allowed to pass, and yet, up to the present moment, although possessed of a large and overwhelming majority, Her Majesty's Government have been unable to induce Parliament to accept one of the measures they have brought in dealing with this question. I think I stand upon strong ground when I say that this is so difficult and technical a subject that the Government have not been able up to the present time to find a solution of the problem it presents. If Her Majesty's Government in the hey-day of their youth and strength have not been able to pass a simple measure on the subject, how can they hope to be more successful in coming to us at a period when Parliament has long passed middle-age, and asking us in an exceptional Session to accept such a proposal as that which they have now brought forward? I think the House may well pause before it accepts, under such circumstances, a measure which the Government have hitherto been unable to pass. If the Government, with the best intentions in the world, have not been able to deal successfully with this question, the reason is obvious and simple—it is because it is idle to tinker with a great question of this sort. If they re-open the settlement of 1836, as they do by this Bill, and as they have done by every Bill they have brought in on the subject in the past, they must do it in a broad and statesmanlike manner, and not approach it in a small tinkering spirit such as that in which they approach it now. Having said so much, I will venture to offer a few criticisms on the measure as it stands. To my mind it is almost as unsatisfactory as was the previous measure; although no doubt the Government, bearing in mind the criticisms passed on their previous attempts at legislation on this subject, have to some extent modified their previous proposals, still, the present Bill does not in any material degree differ from their previous effort. True, it changes the incidence of the burden of the tithe from the occupier to the landowner, but, so far as the tithe payer is concerned, it contains nothing that will make it more acceptable to him. The object of the present proposal is apparently to make the landowner directly responsible for the payment of the tithe rent-charge. Personally, I have no objection to that; but I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, and those who have assisted him in bringing in this Bill, consulted the occupiers, and, if so, what was it the occupiers said? Did the demand for the change of incidence come from the occupiers in the eastern or southern counties? I venture to say "No." The demand has in reality come from the tithe owners, who wished to appreciate their tithes by obtaining greater facilities for their collection. The farmers say that if, as is the case in your present Bill, you put the charge on the landlord, the landlord will most certainly, when he has the opportunity, add the amount on to the rent, so that the occupiers will not be one penny the better for the change. Indeed, the farmers put this forward as a contention against the Bill; they say that, during periods of agricultural distress, when the tithe has been unduly oppressive, they have hitherto been able to go to the tithe owner and appeal to his generosity for some concession in regard to the tithe, and that in many cases, for instance, as I hear, in the County of Hampshire, Lord Winchester and several other lay impropiators have reduced the tithe by a large percentage. But what do you do by this Bill? You put the landowner in front as the tithe payer, and thus you make it impossible for the occupier to appeal to the generosity of the tithe owner. I must also say that in places where at the present moment the tenants are on the most amicable terms with the landowners this Bill would bring about a state of things very undesirable to both parties. We are told that it is only the landowner who is to pay the tithe. The landowner in the opinion of some of my hon. Friends, is a millionaire, or at any rate one of that class of whom it is said, "They toil not, neither do they spin;" but I would point out that this measure will affect a large number of landowners who possess very small areas of landed property, namely, all those coming within the yeomanry class. I do not desire to weary the House by going into statistics, but I saw in a return for the year 1873 that in the county of Kent, which is a county that at the present moment is one of the heaviest-tithed parts of the kingdom, there are only 382 landowners who hold more than 500 acres each, while there are 7,000 who hold land varying in extent from one to five hundred acres. These are the men you are going to make responsible for the payment of the tithe. If you were dealing only with wealthy landowners there might not be so much objection to the proposal; but how will this Bill compare with the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836? In this measure you insert a clause making the tithe recoverable in the County Court. See what effect this will have, and what a difference it will make in the case of the small yeomen with regard to the question of costs! Under the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836 the whole preliminary expense in a case of legal procedure for tithe consists of half-a-crown for a statutory notice. By this Bill you transfer the procedure to the County Court, and I will venture to say that, in a disputed case where, say, £20 is sued for, and witnesses have to be called, the cost will amount to something like £10, or 50 per cent. of the whole amount at issue. Now, let me come to the famous clause which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade has put forward as such a tempting sop to the tithepayer. I refer to the clause which deals with the question of the remission of the tithe rent-charge. No one who has studied the question can help seeing that this two-thirds average is far too high, and that it will not touch one-fiftieth part of the cases of distress. I have not before me the statistics which are doubtless in the possession of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade; but, without having seen them, I have no hesitation in saying that this clause will not touch 100 cases of distress out of the whole number. At what cost are we going to purchase this small concession to the tithepayer? Why, by declaring by a solemn vote of the House that two-thirds of the annual value of the land is in our opinion a fair, just, and non-excessive tithe. In this matter I think I shall have the sympathy of my agricultural colleague the Member for Maldon. The hon. Member has attended many meetings of tithepayers, but I ask him what sympathy he could expect to meet with from them if he gave his vote in Parliament in support of the proposition that two-thirds of the annual value of the land is a fair and just and equitable tithe? Now, I should like to put before the House some reasons why there should be a Committee of Inquiry before legislation, as the fairest way of approaching the question. In the first place, all on this side of the House hold that tithe is the property of the nation, and that Parliament, as guardians of the public purse, whether they be in favour of the Established Church or of Disestablishment, are bound to see that that national property is neither lost, destroyed, nor endangered. I know that if you leave such a cause of friction among many of the tithepayers of the counties of England, you will come within very near distance of an agitation for the abolition of tithe. This is said to be a purely landlords' question, but, if that is the case, then I must say that the farmers show a most loyal, and I would even say a quixotic, interest in the landlords' affairs. But they hold that it is not a landlords' question. They hold, rightly or wrongly, that the land of this country is the raw material on which they work, and that if you put an excessive charge on that raw material you must injure the manufacture. The fear of an agitation for the abolition of tithes was one of the great reasons for the passage of the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836. It was the fear of its utter loss to the nation and to the Church which induced men so different in politics as Mr. Hume and Sir Robert Peel to vote for the Bill on that occasion. Sir, there is the question of the septennial averages. By the test of 1836 the tithe is calculated on the average value of wheat, barley, and oats for the seven years preceding that in which the tithe is paid. The result is that the farmer may be called upon in his first year of the tenancy, though that year is one of a disastrous nature to agriculture, to pay tithe based on the average prices realised in the seven preceding and prosperous years. It is admitted by all parties that the subject of the septennial averages is one which might well be inquired into. Many hold that the return of the averages, made by official inspectors, is a fallacious return. It is held that they are made upon small samples of the best qualities of wheat, barley, and oats, and therefore the prices fixed are fallacious. I am not supporting this argument myself, but this argument is undoubtedly true—that it was the intention of the Tithe Commutation Act that the tithe in future should fluctuate with the price of cereals, as it had done in the past. That intention is borne out by a remark of Lord Lansdowne on the Second Reading of the Bill in the House of Lords, where he said that it was necessary in equity that the payment of the tithe should fluctuate with the value of produce. But let us suppose that the three cereals were chosen as the standard because in the opinion of the statesmen of that day they were less fluctuating than other articles or money would be. They supposed gold would not appreciate but rather depreciate in the coming year. They had many reasons for supposing that corn would remain more or less stable in value. The direct contrary has come about. Since the Act of 1836 gold has appreciated and corn has fluctuated. If this be true, no sound financier would in the present day take three cereals as the stable standard of value. If that intention be true, as to the vital principle of the Act of 1836, you certainly have a reason why, at any rate, there should be some inquiry into the subject. The Act of 1836 has not carried out the intentions of its original framers. Lord John Russell, in introducing it, said it was a plan which in future years would leave persons at liberty to cultivate their land without any apprehension of the augmentation of tithe. Every one connected with agriculture knows that the value of tithe, measured by the value of produce, has already augmented to such an extent that in some cases the land has been driven out of cultivation, while in many cases the tithepayer has been unable to cultivate his land at a profit. Yet by this very Bill you wish us to admit that two-thirds of the annual value of the land is the just and equitable value of tithe. Those who framed the Act of 1836 would have laughed such a suggestion to scorn. I think I have made out some case in regard to the matter. At the same time, if I moved my Amendment in a direct form it would limit discussion, which I have no wish to do. I do not wish for a moment to press anything more than I have stated in my speech. Dull and wearisome as this subject may be, it is one which affects a vast property of £60,000,000 belonging to the nation, and it also affects what was formerly the principal, but now is, unfortunately, a decayed, industry of this country — agriculture. It is for the House to decide whether my arguments are of value, and worthy consideration. It is for the House to decide moreover whether, by accepting the Second Reading of this Bill, they will reopen a great question affecting a great National property and a vast National interest. Leaving a partially futile and incomplete proposal, they will proceed, I venture to think, on the broader and safer lines of inquiry before legislation—the lines which, in my humble judgment, are sanctioned by every precedent of moderation, equity, and justice.

(4.48.)* MR. C. W. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): Mr. Deputy Speaker, I agree with some of the remarks of the hon. Member for Saffron Walden, but I fancy there are not many hon. Members opposite who go with him in the recommendation that the tithe should be lowered. What we have to consider from the tithepayer's point of view is whether it would be better that this Bill should be read a second time, thus certainly affording some measure of relief to the tithepayer, or would it be better to say "No" to the Second Reading of the Bill, and trust to hon. Members opposite going further for the relief of the tithepayer than the present Government proposes to go. The hon. Member for Saffron Walden has told us that the farmers of the Eastern Counties disapprove of the proposals contained in this Bill to transfer the onus of paying the tithe to the landlord. Where he got his information from I cannot imagine.

MR. GARDNER: That I understood to be the decision come to by the Essex Chamber of Agriculture.

MR. GRAY:* I am very glad to obtain that information. But if the hon. Member thinks that that Chamber always expresses the opinions of the farmers of the Eastern Counties, I beg him not to be thus misled. I have every respect for the Essex Chamber, belonging to it as I do, but it sometimes gives expression to opinions which are not entertained by a majority, or even by a majority, of the farmers of East Anglia. Again I ask the hon. Member how it is, if it is so unfair from a tenant-farmer's point of view to transfer the onus of tithe-paying from the tenant to the landlord, how is it that Members of the Opposition voted with me when I brought this question to an issue a Session or so ago. Evidently, at that time the hon. Member did not disapprove of that which he says the farmers of East Anglia to-day disapprove of. I am fully as anxious as my hon. Friend that those very hard cases to which I have often alluded, in which the tithe has become a more valuable property than the landlord's beneficiary rent, should receive attention. I hope to have something to say on that matter in Committee; indeed, I think the very drafting of this Bill challenges a discussion on that point. But where should we be if we refused to pass this Bill and awaited the Report of a Commission such as the hon. Member proposes. In the first place, we should have to wait for the Report of the Commission, and all that time the vexed question would remain unsettled in Wales, and the tithepayers in East Anglia would have no relief whatever. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade in his speech, which, if I may be allowed to say so, was the best on the tithe question I have ever heard in this house, said there had been tithe legislation thirteen or fourteen times since the passing of the Commutation Act, and on each occasion the tithepayers' interest had been ignored. I took it he adduced that as a reason why in the future their interest should be considered.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH:* My hon. Friend misunderstood me. I said that in some cases the advantage of the tithe-owner, and in others that of the tithe-payer, had alone been affected.

MR. GRAY:* I certainly did misunderstand the right hon. Gentleman. I am glad we have some precedents for considering the tithepayers' interest. The hon. Member for Saffron Walden asked how the tenant-farmer would be benefited by transferring the payment of the tithe to the landlord. As matters stand, there are many difficult questions in connection with the collection of the tithe, such as the taking of the corn averages, and it is obvious that if the tenant-farmer is relieved of the payment of the tithe he will also be relieved of his anxiety in regard to the settlement of these difficult questions. In my opinion, the changes which have been made in the Bill are good in every respect; but it is hardly fair on the part of the hon. Member for Saffron Walden to claim these changes as the result of action taken by himself or his Party. There are many hon. Members on the Government side of the House who have acted most cordially with myself in making our views understood by the Government. And those hon. Members may certainly congratulate themselves on having made some impression on the Government. I do not believe that the yeoman farmer will be in the least degree injured by the present proposals; but I did see a danger to the yeoman farmer in the last Tithe Bill. In most cases the present Bill will leave him much in the same position, but there will be far more cases of relief afforded than is supposed by the hon. Gentleman opposite. The man farming his own land who on his assessment can show that his tithe will be more than two-thirds of the annual value will obtain the same relief as the large landlord will obtain. As to the relief clause, I most earnestly hope that, before the Committee stage is reached, the Government will once again consider some of the suggestions made by their own supporters, and especially I hope that they will reconsider the possibility of altering, with fairness to both parties, the point at which relief can be obtained from two-thirds to one-half. The question is not merely one of the remission of the tithe rent-charge when it exceeds two-thirds of the annual value of the land. The assessment is based upon what may fairly be called two rents—the rent paid to the landlord, and the rent paid to the tithe owner. So the Bill really provides that remission shall be given only when the tithe exceeds two-thirds of itself, plus the rent to the landlord. Such a provision very greatly limits the scope of the relief afforded by the Bill; and many hard cases will obtain not a shade or shadow of relief. For instance, let the House consider the case of the farm upon which successive landlords have spent immense sums of money, and which now pays a rent of 4s. an acre to the landlord and a tithe rent-charge of 5s. an acre. At the time when the tithe was adjusted, in 1836, that farm was perhaps paying a landlord's rent of 25s. or 30s. an acre, while it paid a tithe of only 6d. or 8d. an acre more than it does at present. In this case no relief will be afforded by the Bill. As this question is being opened up I hope that the Government will go further than they at present propose to do. If they cannot at once accept my suggestion as to the change from the two-thirds to one-half, let them at least leave it an open question to be decided by the House. I should like to see what the hon. Member for Saffron Walden will do if such an Amendment has a fair chance of being carried by the House. I should like to know what the leader of the Opposition will say about it, because I am aware that there are many hon. Members on the other side of the House who maintain that there should be no relief whatever given to the tithepayers as long as there is a single penny coming from the land. When I bring forward my Amendment in Committee I hope that the Government will allow it to have a fair chance, and that they will not appoint the Government Whips to tell against me. I think on the whole that the tithepayers of East Anglia will consider that a spirit of compromise has been shown in this Bill; and, although it cannot be looked upon as a final measure to settle the entire vexed question, at any rate it is a Bill which has considered the interests of both parties concerned in the question. I have no doubt that a final settlement of the question must come under some scheme of redemption, but the House of Commons is not quite ready to pass such a measure as I should consider fair to the tithepayers. A good deal more information is needed before Parliament is really able to settle what a fair scheme of redemption would be. That is the reason why I was so anxious to get the redemption clauses cut out of the last Bill. That has now been done, and we have the promise of the appointment of a Commission to consider the possibility of redeeming the tithe—a promise worth a hundred such visionary offers as have been made by hon. Gentlemen opposite. I hope the Bill will be read a second time, although I shall do everything in my power to press upon the Government in Committee the adoption of the Amendment substituting a half instead of two-thirds as the point at which relief is to be forthcoming.

(5.20) MR. PICTON (Leicester): I congratulate the Government on having brought in a Bill infinitely superior to any before laid on the Table of the House. As they have been told by the hon. Member who last spoke, the weak point of the Bill is the stage at which the relief is to be granted. The hon. Member desires to make it at one-half instead of two-thirds. Some of us would desire to see it lower still, but at any rate by this Clause the Government have laid themselves open to very serious attacks. So far as the Bill removes the payment from the occupier to the owner, I think that it only carries out what was originally intended by the Act of 1836. Lord Grey, as the last survivor of those who took an active part in the negotiations of that year, explained in the Nineteenth Century last year that this was undoubtedly the intention of the measure. I think that on the whole the present Bill carries out that intention very satisfactorily. I am pleased, therefore, to observe subsection 3 in Clause 1, which removes some of the objections felt by many hon. Members on the Opposition side as to the rigour with which tithe was to be exacted from the occupier. I understand that that portion of the rent which is paid by way of tithe, through the landlord, is only to be exacted by the same means as are now used for its recovery, and that the distress, if any, is only to be on the produce of the land. That being so I should have the greatest pleasure in voting for the Second Reading of the Bill. But I believe that an Amendment will be moved on a matter of principle by an hon. Member on my own side of the House, and if this is done I shall be bound by my convictions to give that Amendment my best support. We have heard a great deal about the hardship which is inflicted on landowners, and it is evident that these pleas ad misericordiam will be used as a lever whereby to reduce the provision of two-thirds to a half, or even less. I think that those pleas are altogether unfounded in justice. Hon. Members argue as though tithe were an additional charge on top of rent. It is nothing of the kind. Tithe is a portion of the rent taken away from the landlord for purposes at present ecclesiastical, but I venture to predict that soon it will be applied to secular purposes. It should be set apart for national and public purposes, and I hold that hon. Members will be utterly untrue to their trust as defenders of the public interest if they give their consent to allow it to be diminished to any extent whatever. If it be said that the land cannot bear the burden, then I say, let the land be surrendered. We hear a good deal urged about the excessive amount of the tithe, but the cases referred to are exceptional. When the Commissioners fixed the amount of the tithe, as Lord Grey shows, they did not estimate what was the value of one-tenth of the gross produce of the best cultivated land; they took the parish as a whole, they ascertained the average amount of tithe yielded by the parish for the previous seven years, and apportioned the amount over the land in the parish. I say it is not fair to take extreme cases as instances of the way in which the system works. It was agreed in 1836 that the arrangement then come to should be a final settlement, and I contend that we have now no right to vary it. So strongly do I feel this that in Committee I shall oppose Clause 3. I know that the arrangement therein proposed is not intended to be permanent, but it will put money into the landlord's pocket, and it is unsatisfactory because it is a surrender of the nation's rights.

*(5.26.) MR. W. J. READEL (Essex, Chelmsford): It seems to me that the Government have opened up a very wide question, especially if, as the hon. Member who last spoke suggests, in case the land cannot bear the tithe, it is to be surrendered, and pay no rent to the landlord at all. Now, the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836 was passed for the purpose of making that which was an uncertainty into a fixed charge, subject only to septennial averages, and tithes have since been considered to be just as much a fixed charge on property as if a rent-charge had been left subject to the septennial prices of Consols. The tithe owner therefore felt that he had a certain sum fixed, so to speak, for ever, subject only to the septennial averages of wheat, barley, and oats. Hon. Members who have studied this question know that, so far as two of those cereals are concerned, the average is very nearly the same as in 1836. The whole of the depreciation in the value of tithe is owing to the fact that the average price of wheat has been so materially reduced. Hon. Members are not prepared to do that which is to the interest of the country, namely, see whether we cannot approximate the price of wheat somewhat nearer to that at which it stood in 1835. If we could do that, there would be no necessity to bring in a Tithe Bill, and there would not be that terrible depreciation in the value of land which exists now, to say nothing of the desperate condition of the tenant farmers, still more the lamentable position of the agricultural labourers, whose wages are kept down because the land will not allow a fair return to be paid them for their labour. I would support a Bill which takes away from a tenant the payment of the rent-charge. For a great many years I have been professionally concerned in landed matters. I have always felt that the tithe rent-charge was a charge upon the land, and where I have acted for large estates, I have always paid it on the part of the landlord instead of permitting it to be collected from the tenant. Where the tithe was the support of the rector or vicar I did not think any man occupying the position of spiritual pastor of a parish, ought to be obliged to dun his parishioners in order to get his daily bread; therefore, any measure which will transfer the tithe from the tithepayer, and make it a charge absolutely on land, meets with my hearty approval. I also think the change of recovery from distress to the County Court is right in principle. There is nothing so severe as the law of distress if exercised to its fullest extent. But not only that; if the tithe is a charge on the land, and a distress is issued on the tenant's goods, you are virtually distraining the goods of another. Therefore, for these reasons I shall support the Second Reading of the Bill.

* (5.32.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I shall not detain the House long, as the reasons which make a revision of tithe necessary have been explained very fully by my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. H. Gardner), and as it will be impossible, under the rules of the House, for me to move the Amendment I have placed on the Paper, I think it would be better to reserve what I have to say upon the Amendment until a later stage. I think hon. Members must have been struck with the change in the attitude of the hon. Member for the Maldon Division of Essex (Mr. Gray). Two Sessions ago the hon. Member took the initiative in moving an Amendment to the Tithe Bill, and in the Division which took place the Government majority was reduced to four. Last Session the hon. Member spoke in favour of the Instruction I moved on going in Committee in favour of an equitable revision of tithe; but he voted against the Instruction. Now, however, he proposes to support the Bill as a whole. He has put down one or two minor Amendments which he intends to move in Committee. For instance, he proposes to reduce what is described as the two-thirds of the annual value to one-half. The question which naturally suggests itself is whether a change has come over the hon. Member, or over the measure of the Government. It seems to me the change is rather with the hon. Member than with the measure. It is true there is nothing in this Bill about redemption, but the other portions of the measure very much resemble those of the measure of last year. There is novelty in the proposal that under certain circumstances when the tithe exceeds two-thirds of the annual value the tithe should be reduced by the amount by which it exceeds two-thirds of the annual value. In last year's Bill there was that somewhat objectionable special rateable value clause, but the proposal the Government now make does not appear to me to be at all satisfactory as compared with the amendment which the Attorney General proposed in the measure of the year before last, which was to the effect that the Court, on being satisfied by evidence of its justice, should make such order for the remission of part of the sum claimed as should prevent the total sum of the tithe rent-charge from exceeding the annual sum or what in the circumstances of the case might reasonably be taken to be the net profit of the land. That proposal appears to be very much fairer to the tithepayer than the proposal of this year. The President of the Board of Trade referred to the Commission which he proposes should be appointed to deal with the question of redemption, and the hon. Member for Maldon described that Commission as a bird in the hand. Is it intended that the Commission shall deal simply and solely with the subject of redemption, because, if so, I entirely fail to see how it can benefit either the tenant-farmers, or the yeomen farmers, or the rest of the agricultural community as far as their immediate needs are concerned. But if the Commission is to deal with other subjects in addition to that of tithe redemption, I think we are entitled to hear a little more on the subject that what was stated at the commencement of the Debate. Will the question of corn averages come within the powers of the Commission?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I simply referred to redemption.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON: Then I think the bird is a very insignificant one. What has been urged again and again on this side, and I think also by hon. Members who sit behind the present Ministry, is that one of the greatest grievances in connection with this question is the grievance surrounding corn averages. Is that question going to be dealt with at all by Her Majesty's Government, either by reference to the Commission or in any other form, because, if not, we have a right to do our best to incorporate provisions in that direction in the present measure. There are very grave and serious questions connected with the matter of corn averages. For example, that which is set down as the average price of corn is not the actual price which the farmer gets for corn, because regard is not paid to the numerous sales and re-sales of corn which take place, or to the fact that the farmers only sell their best corn. We have been twitted by the President of the Board of Trade and also by the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) with a desire to reduce the tithe as a whole, to impair the corpus of the tithe. There is no desire to impair the corpus of tithe, but there is a sincere desire to minimise as far as possible the grievances that are common to so many agricultural classes. I believe there is the strongest desire in every quarter of the House to preserve, as regards the principle of it, what is at the present time national property devoted to Church uses, and what may, under a different set of circumstances, be national property devoted to other than Church uses. It seems to me to be somewhat shortsighted on the part of those who advocate the maintenance of the tithe at its existing figure from the point of view of the Church revenues, and also on the part of those who advocate the maintenance of tithe at its present figure on behalf of those upon whom the tithe may eventually be bestowed to resist the proposed amendment. If the property is national property surely that is no reason why certain people who have to pay tithe should be unjustly treated. The contrary view must be the correct one. If the grievances are removed the property as a whole will be rendered more secure in the long run. The hon. Member for Saffron Walden referred to what he called the extreme views of certain tithepayers. I think he said there were certain persons who declared that tithe was merely one-tenth part of the prairie value. I do not suppose that there is any hon. Member who will countenance that view, but so far as principle is concerned there is a good deal to be said for that view. Tithe is the tenth part of that which is the gift of nature, and no doubt in its origination it was intended that one-tenth part of what was the gift of nature should be bestowed as an act of gratitude. That was, of course, in a day when agriculture was not based to the extent to which it is now on the widespread application of capital. In the days before the introduction of agricultural machinery and artificial manures, and manures based on the use of artificial food, there was in principle a good deal to be urged in favour of that extreme view. We, of course, take a totally different view. We take up our position on the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836, but we say that that Act did not contemplate the new conditions of agriculture; it did not take into account the necessity for making a different use of the system of corn averages. That system was in force at the time, and was adopted by the framers of the Act. We have been able during the last 50 years to see what the operation of the Act has been, and surely in face of the depression of agriculture and of the great injury done to a great class in the community, it is high time we should adopt some more stringent method of dealing with this great national question. Reference has been made to what was the opinion of Joseph Hume in 1836. Joseph Hume expressed the view that the Tithe Commutation Act was rather in favour of the tithe owner than of the tithepayer. I should like before I sit down to refer to one matter on which it would be desirable to obtain one or two words of explanation. I want to know what is the method of application to the County Court. As I read Clause 3 no remission can be granted to a tenant unless proceedings have been previously taken in the County Court. No automatic procedure is provided by the clause. There is also another point on which some explanation appears to be desirable. The President of the Local Government Board has told us that there is no personal liability involved in the Bill, but I should like the Attorney General to say whether it would be possible to construe Sub-section 3, Clause 2, into an admission of personal liability. As it will not be possible for me to move my Amendment, inasmuch as no Division can take place upon it, I shall content myself with taking such steps later on as may tend in the direction the hon. Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. H. Gardner) has alluded to. The appointment of a Commission to deal with the question of redemption would perhaps postpone the settlement of the matter till a very distant period. The Commission would take a long time in reporting, and even after it had reported there would still be the question of corn averages to be dealt with. I do not feel prepared under the circumstances I have alluded to, to give the Bill the support which under other circumstances I should be only too glad to afford to it.

*(5.53.) SIR W. BARTELOT (Sussex, N.W.): I think no one who has considered the difficulties of the tithe question will refuse to admit that any Government attempting to deal with a question of this complicated nature must have a vast number of opinions expressed and many of them adverse to their proposals, but I believe Her Majesty's Government have made a fair and honest endeavour, after considering the opinions expressed in all parts of the House, to secure the settlement of an important part of this very difficult question. As to the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. W. J. Beadel), we must not forget that the tithe was originally one-tenth of the produce of the land. I feel certain my hon. Friend will not deny that if the old system had been maintained till the present day, there are large tracts of country in England which would have really paid little or no tithe at all. In 1835, when the Poor Law Act was passed, the burden was something like 10s., 11s., or 12s. in the £1. Since that Act came into force, however, it has sunk to something like 2s. 6d. or 2s., or even less in the £1. The tithe owner got the full benefit of the reduction, as the calculation on the enormously higher charges for the seven preceding years was made. In 1845 came Free Trade, which is admitted by a large proportion of Members of this House to have been a great benefit and a great blessing to the country. The price of wheat has, however, gone down immensely. I think if the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) were a large land-owner he would take a very different view of the question from that which he has stated. I appeal to him as a fair man, and I venture to say if he considers the question from the point of view of fairness and justice, he will not be in favour of exacting the last farthing from the owners of a certain class of land which is hardly capable of paying anything. Those who are conversant with the way in which the commutation took place, will know how much fairer it was to some parishes than to others, not from the fault of the Commissioners, but from the fault of the people themselves. I know a parish where the clergyman of that day was a remarkably shrewd and intelligent man, and he took down the exact amount of tithe he collected from each farm, so that when the Commutation Act came into force he was able to show that so much had been collected from the various farms. The tenants had not taken the trouble to put into writing what had been taken from the farms, and naturally the clergyman got the best of the bargain, and obtained more tithe than the land had a right to bear. I merely mention this as an absolute fact, although I am not urging the reopening of the whole of this very grave question. But I wish to point out it is necessary to deal leniently with certain classes of poor land that under no circumstances are able to pay a heavy tithe. The hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Picton) has taken one view, but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Forster) took another view. In the debate which took place in the early part of this year he pointed out as clearly as any man could from the falling-off shown in the Returns of the value of agricultural land that this land has very largely depreciated from its value a few years ago. When tithe was 12 per cent. above par, tenant-farmers and others paid the charge. I do not say they paid it with alacrity, but they paid it because they were making a good profit out of the land and were able to pay the full tithe. But now that tithe is 23 per cent. below par—not as my hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire said that it has fallen 35 per cent. below—he takes the figures from the highest to the lowest, whereas he should have taken the fall from par. Now, I say, when tithe is 23 per cent. below, people are less able to pay tithe than when it was 12 per cent. above par. I am sorry I did not hear the earlier part of the speech of my right hon. Friend (Sir Michael Hicks Beach). No man understands the subject better than he does, and few have suffered more than he has from the bad times. In that part of his able speech I did hear, he did give us some hope that in regard to a certain quantity of land that does not pay its way—is not able to pay tithe on its produce—the Government are prepared to consider the position of this class of land. My hon. Friend the Member for Maldon (Mr. C. W. Gray) has stated that he intends in this connexion to substitute “one-half” for “two-thirds,” and I venture to hope my right hon. Friend will give this proposal a fair and candid consideration. I echo what the hon. Gentleman the Member for Eye (Mr. F. Stevenson) said. I hope there will be no mistake about the question of personal liability. I have asked the question before, and my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General gave me that assurance which I believe he will again give to the hon. Member, that there is to be no personal liability. That was a question settled by the Act of 1836, and I feel sure that my right hon. Friend will not depart from that settlement. There is one other question—that of redemption, I may say this much, that, while I agree to a certain extent that in certain instances re-valuation might be necessary, yet the question is such a large and such a grave one that you cannot expect Her Majesty's Government now to enter into it. With regard to redemption it is different. I will venture to say there is no man having the welfare of the English agriculturist at heart who does not believe that every burden that can be taken off the land should be removed. The way to that is by a fair, reasonable and just scheme of redemption between tithe owner and tithepayer. I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with that liberality for which we have to thank him as applied to local rates, will find it in his heart and in the interest of the country in dealing with this question to be a little more liberal than the proposals suggested last year. It is a question undoubtedly of paramount importance—it is the only way to settle this grave and complex question. I will only venture to say in conclusion that I am sure my right hon. Friend has again taken this Bill in hand with the full intention of pushing it through, and I am equally sure he will give fair consideration to all fair and reasonable suggestions made in Committee. I hope the Government, having for the fifth time brought a Tithe Bill forward, will not be satisfied until it is passed with such Amendments as may be found necessary. It would be discreditable to the Government if this should not be so, it is demanded in the interests of tithe owners and tithepayers. Though I do not care very much for some parts of the Bill, yet I believe it will effect a necessary settlement in some parts of the country, and I heartily support the Second Reading of the Bill.

(6.8.)* MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): I rise to move the Amendment of which I have given notice, and I have reason to believe that the Amendment commands the support of something like seven-eighths of the Welsh Representatives. The right hon. Gentleman has treated this particular Amendment as having only an indirect bearing on the Bill before the House, but I think the House will admit it has a direct bearing on it from the Welsh point of view. And as the Bill is essentially a Welsh Bill, and is most distinctly aimed at Wales, I hope the House will extend some forbearance to Welsh Members who desire to state their case against the Bill. One must begin by making a hackneyed statement and reminding the House that the Welsh are essentially a law-abiding people. How is it that the Welsh people, who have proved a law-abiding people for so long, are the cause of this exceptional measure standing in the forefront of the Government programme, and being brought again and again before the House? Have there been any facts of sufficient solidity to show that upon this question of tithe the Welsh people, who by the tradition of centuries claim the character of a law-abiding people, to-day furnish the necessity and argument for this Bill? If the House will bear with me for a moment, I would remind hon. Members that the right hon. Gentleman put the case for the Bill on the resistance to the payment of tithe and scenes of disgraceful violence in the Principality. Well, if these scenes have occurred in rare cases over a very considerable period of time, it is quite clear that any disorder among a few irresponsible persons has been met by the force the law has at its command, and I do not believe that it is possible to show from any but a partisan view any necessity for this measure from this cause, and this will be clear the moment the Government take measures to procure independent and judicial evidence. The Government will find then that the case is against them. I appeal to the Attorney General, through whom, at a very early stage, an eminent, able magistrate, Sir John Bridge, was sent into Wales in connection with these matters. It will be within the recollection of the hon. and learned Gentleman that the Report of Sir John Bridge was of the most reassuring character. Thirty-one unfortunate men had been committed for trial for a breach of the peace, and he advised the Crown not to press the charge against three-fourths of these, and the remainder were let off with a trivial fine of half-a-crown. Then I may mention a still more eminent judicial authority—Mr. Justice Field—and I would cite his testimony, as it appears in the report of his charge to the Grand Jury at the Assizes in North Wales, in the summer of 1889. It is a long way back, but there has been no disturbance since worth much notice. Mr. Justice Field said he was glad to find that there was almost a total absence of crime in the country, and he was happy to see that by a mixture of firmness, conciliation, and good sense, the majority of those who had refused to pay tithe had come round to payment, and that only a small remnant indeed refused obstinately to obey the law. Though the tithe might be in some cases a heavy burden, it must be met by representations to the Legislature and the Executive. Then the Judge went on to express approval of the course taken in Montgomeryshire and followed in other counties. This is independent, judicial, and impartial evidence, and I think it should be met by something more than partisan evidence on the other side. How is it that these disturbances arose at the outset? They began at the lowest water-mark of agricultural depression, and among a set of farmers who had been diligently taught that tithes were among the other burdens on the land which the Government of the farmers' friends proposed to lighten. They really believed that the tithes were as liable to reasonable abatement in bad times as rent. I think Mr. Justice Field's words gave support for that belief. They asked for an abatement from such bodies as Christchurch College and from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and this request the Commissioners and the Christchurch College Authorities thought it their duty to resist. Can we wonder that feeling should have run high in such a case as that of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners? Their position is this: they draw large sums in tithe from the Principality, and they are also large land owners; they took credit for the fact that as land owners they were making an abatement of 12½ per cent. on the rent, but they refused any abatement on the tithe on the ground that they gave more tithe to Wales than they took from the Principality. Now, a very little consideration will show that this was adding insult to injury, because the extra tithe so given was a subsidy to a Church Establishment not supported by the people, not in sympathy with the people, and therefore the Welsh people had all the stronger inducement to make their lawful protest against the payment of this particular tithe, which they did. This it is that constitutes the case for the Bill—this opposition in these particular cases, opposition of an exceptional origin, of a very scattered character, which after all has shown no symptoms of rising to a serious point, and might now be treated as practically obsolete. But the right hon. Gentleman regards the Amendment which the Welsh Members were desirous of submitting to the House as not germane to the Bill, on the ground that the question whether tithe is national property, does not arise out of anything in the Bill. I can hardly understand how that can be maintained, because it would seem that unless tithe be regarded as public property, this Bill would be an extremely bold and audacious interference with private property. I can hardly understand under what constitutional title except that of tithe being national property it is competent for Parliament to remit a portion of the tithe, as proposed in the third clause. I should have thought all the many dealings with tithe by Parliament—I think the right hon. Gentleman mentioned there had been 14 such dealings—I should have thought these were all based on the admitted fact that tithe is national property, and I could hardly have supposed any other contention could be urged. The dealings, too, have been, it appears, generally or universally in the interest of tithe owners. Well, such one-sided legislation which even goes to the extent of extinguishing a portion of the tithe could certainly only be founded on the principle that tithe is admitted to be national property. Talk of remission of the tithe! Surely that is a very strong step to take on the part of those who have been using such hard words to Welshmen on the subject. We have been told we are sacrilegious robbers, that we are attacking the Ark of God in this matter: all the bitterness of the odium theologicum has been directed against us. I make bold to say there are no better friends to the property in tithe in the House of Commons than the Welsh members who now object to this Bill. They are genuine friends to property in tithe; and if it is supposed that this is an attempt to foist in indirectly a disestablishment debate on the House, I can assure the Government that the view of Welshmen is that we should proceed to disestablishment not by way of disendowment, but to disendowment by way of disestablishment. Whatever be the fate of the Motion, we shall not be deterred from taking the course we pursued when a Bill of this nature—I admit a much more objectionable Bill—was before the House last Session. We shall move a preamble to the Bill. We believe that the essential foundation of a Bill of this kind is that it is national property, and that this property is at the disposal of Parliament. Having established that principle, we shall not rest contented until we have realised our hopes and developed the constitutional position of Wales and her claims on this property. We maintain you must first give us an equitable position in the application of tithe before you attempt to tighten the grip and to police the property, before you deeply wound the feelings of a religious people with a measure of this coercive kind. Welshmen believe this a most mischievous measure, and we do not believe it will in any degree remove any of the difficulties with which the collection of tithe is now accompanied. We are satisfied it will aggravate the religious position, and increase the social schism in the Principality. You are making the Welsh clergy more than ever the exclusive chaplains of the squires, driving them into a mischievous class association with the English-speaking and the larger landowners, as opposed to the people, and this cannot help forward the interests of religious or social progress. We think you are running a risk in another direction. There are, happily in Wales a very large number of freehold occupiers, yeomen, the strength and backbone of the population, a part of the population which all friends to the Principality desire to encourage and protect. Their interests will suffer most under this Bill. But besides taking a part that will go far to increase our religious and social difficulties, we feel that you are extending those difficulties to the agrarian condition of Wales, and Wales is primarily an agricultural country. Statesmen should observe this beginning of danger, this new source of trouble between landlord and tenant. With these views I press my Amendment, and hope a Division will be taken.

To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "no measure dealing with Tithe Rent-Charge will be satisfactory to the people of Wales which does not recognise the fact that Tithes are National property, to be devoted to National purposes, and that the Tithe rent-charge in Wales ought to be applied in accordance with the constitutionally expressed wishes of the people of the Principality,"—(Mr. Stuart Rendel.)

—instead thereof.

*(6.27.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): In seconding the Amendment I will first say that I think the Government would have acted more wisely and fairly if they had allowed more time to intervene before the Second Reading stage. It was not in accordance with the usual practice that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade said not a word on introducing the Bill, and the Bill only reached us last Friday, so that there has been no opportunity of consulting our constituents or inviting an expression of popular opinion. Of course if the Bill were the old Bill reintroduced I could understand this proceeding, but the Bill from beginning to end is a new Bill. Under the circumstances I can understand that my hon. Friends who represent English agricultural constituencies regard the Bill as a crude and unsatisfactory measure. But I approach the Bill simply as a Welsh Member and from a Welsh standpoint, for it was submitted by the right hon. Gentleman that the origin of the Bill was due to the scenes in Wales. It is, in fact, a Bill to set the Welsh Church on its legs by setting Welsh landlords and tenants by the ears. Now, I do not think that the Bill will be more effectual for putting the Church of England in Wales on its legs, because it makes the landlords collectors of tithes for the clergy. I am not, however, going into a Disestablishment Debate, which more properly belongs to the Motion my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea intends to bring forward; but, as Member for the county which has been specially attacked—Denbighshire—I must enter my protest against the calumnies uttered against it. The right hon. Gentleman says the Bill has been rendered necessary by certain deplorable acts of violence in Wales, and it is said that this is the only justification for the Bill? Now, I agree with the hon. Member behind me that all these stories have been either grossly exaggerated or are entirely without foundation. The Welsh people are justly proud of the immunity of their country from crime, and I will call the attention of the House to what was recently said by Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams with regard to the small amount of crime in Wales. He remarked upon the fact that at three assizes in Welsh Counties there was only one prisoner for trial—a circumstance to which I should think it would be very hard to find a parallel in England. Moreover, the annals of crime in Wales show that the amount of crime there in proportion to the population is one-half what it is in England, and that the greater part of that crime is really imported from other countries, and yet in spite of all this we find these gross attacks made on the character of the people. We find them charged with the basest and meanest conduct, and there is no epithet too strong for the English Press to apply to them. I will give an instance to show how baseless are their charges. The Bishop of St. Asaph three months ago brought a most offensive charge against certain leading members of the important body of Welsh Calvinistic Methodists. He was reported to have said that at some tithe distraints a mock celebration of Holy Communion was actually carried out by a deacon of that body. The Bishop afterwards corrected this, and said that it had been done in the presence, and apparently with the sanction, of a deacon of that Church, but, though challenged by Major Godfrey, Chief Constable of Montgomeryshire, and myself, and many others, to give names and dates, he has never done so. If charges of this kind are to be made they ought to be proved; if not true, it is disgraceful that they should be made. With regard to the Amendment on the Paper, which I have the honour to second, it exactly defines the position of the Welsh people with regard to tithe. It begins by saying that tithes are natural property. I should have thought that that is almost a truism. Now, I am going to quote what to my mind is one of the highest, if not the highest, authority in the House on this subject. The words I am about to read were spoken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in the Debate on the Irish Church Bill. On March 23rd, 1869, he said—

"It was for the nation that the property was given. It is true it was given to corporations. Yes; but why? Not that they might enjoy it as private property, but that they might hold it on condition of duty. They were only convenient symbols—convenient media for its conveyance from generation to generation. The real meaning, scope, and object was that through them it should be applied for all time to the benefit of the entire population of the kingdom, and this was a natural and intelligent arrangement when the entire nation was of one faith. In proportion as Dissent and difference of opinion creep into the country, the foundation of the religious Establishment so endowed comes to be by degrees more or less weakened and impaired, partly in proportion as the number of Dissenters is strong, partly in proportion as they are disposed, or not disposed, to acquiesce in the continuance of the Establishment."

Now, I ask, how are you going to ascertain whether the Nonconformists in the Principality are, or are not, disposed to acquiesce in the existence of the Establishment? I say there is only one test—namely, that adopted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian three or four months ago, in speaking on the question of Scotch Disestablishment. He said—

"My point is this—not only that the opinion of the Constitutional Representatives of Scotland is in favour of Disestablishment, but that it is increasingly in favour of it—that there is a regular and steady movement in Scotland, the evidence of which cannot be mistaken, all tending in the same direction."

What was that evidence? Why, in 1886 there were 24 Scotch Representatives in favour of the Disestablishment of the Church in Scotland and 16 against; in 1888 there were 40 for it and 20 against it, and in 1889 the numbers were 38 to 18, or, roughly speaking, two to one. What is the case in regard to Disestablishment in Wales? People say the cause of Welsh Disestablishment is not progressing, and I should like to apply the test of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian to the question whether this is true or not. I am old enough to remember when Mr. Watkin Williams brought forward his Motion for Disestablishment 20 years ago. Only five Welsh Members were then found to support the Motion, whilst 13 voted against it, and 11 did not put in an appearance. In 1886 the numbers were 24 to 4, and what is the case now? Why, we have 27 Welsh Members out of 30—9 out of 10—pledged to support the Motion of my hon. Friend near me. Apply another test, which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian applied to the case of Scotland. Speaking of the bye-elections, the right hon. Gentleman pointed out that since the General Election there had been 14 bye-elections in Scotland, and that, of the Members elected, 11 had been for Disestablishment and 3 against. In Wales we have had six bye-elections, and in every case the Member returned has been favourable to Disestablishment. Can there be any doubt, then, as to what is the "constitutionally-expressed opinion" of the people of Wales? To go back for a moment to the position of the Welsh people, I would say it is not surprising to find them doing just what the Quakers did in the case of the church rates some 30 years ago, and saying, when asked for tithe, "You must come and take it if you can." I maintain that they are not only morally but legally justified in taking up that position; of course, I am not speaking of cases of violence, which everybody deprecates. Mr. Justice Wills, in a charge to a grand jury at Beaumaris on the 22nd February, 1888, said—

"If the people said they were unwilling to pay for what they did not like, and that they simply submitted to distraints to show their protest against the law, they would be perfectly justified in doing so. As long as they did that nothing could be said against them. This was the course which had been systematically carried out by law teachers."

I think that course a very natural one for the Welsh farmers to pursue, so long as they find that Parliament turns a deaf ear to their appeals. I see the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Raikes) taking notes. I admit, of course, that all violence is illegal, but I leave the right hon. Gentleman to answer this extract from the charge of Mr. Justice Wills, which I have just laid before the House. In the county of Montgomery, thanks in a great measure to the tact and judgment of the Chief Constable (Major Godfrey), there has been no violence. Unfortunately that has not been the case in the county I represent, but I cannot help thinking that whatever disturbances have occurred have been largely due to the way in which the tithe has been collected. I have said again and again, and have been much-abused for it, that the sending down of a regiment of hussars nominally to protect the tithe collectors was a great mistake. But I will not say more on the subject, as I believe the matter is being considered by the County Council of Denbighshire, and is, so to speak, sub judice. As to whether the Church in Wales should be disestablished or not, I may say that I have here the opinion of another great leader. This is what the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington), the then leader of the Liberal Party, said—

"When Scotch opinion, even Scotch Liberal opinion, is fully formed on the subject, then the Liberal Party as a whole will be prepared to deal with the question on its merits, and without reference to any other question."

The opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, supported as it is by the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale, expresses the views of the whole of the Liberal side of the House on this question. As I say, I regret that violence has occurred in Denbighshire, but will this Bill remedy the evil? I believe that, so far from remedying it, it will only increase the irritation. From the second clause of the Bill it will be seen that before any step can be taken by the tithe owner for the purpose of recovering his tithe he will have to go to the County Court. There will, in my opinion, be demonstrations when the tithe owner brings his case before the Court in order to obtain his tithe; for if there is one thing more than another which the Welsh farmer has a horror of it is the County Court, and if there is one thing more than another that is likely to embitter the relations between a Welsh parishioner and his vicar, it will be the thought that the vicar can drag the parishioner before the County Court to compel the payment of tithe. It is said that it will not be the parson who will have recourse to the County Court. That may be so technically, but in the end the result will be the same. When the tithe owner has got his judgment or order there are two processes provided by the Bill. If the owner is also the occupier, an officer of the Court, who, I suppose, will be the bailiff, is to have the powers for the recovery of the sum that are conferred by the Tithe Acts on the owner of the tithe rent-charge for the recovery of arrears of the rent-charge. Thus he will be placed in exactly the same position which he occupies at present, except that the order will be carried out by an officer of the Court. What is gained by having a double judicial process, except that there will be two opportunities for the display of hostility to the parson?—for there is, first of all, the process of obtaining judgment, and then there is the placing of the tithepayer in the position he at present occupies in the matter of recovery. Coming down to the House just now I was asked by a friend, "You are not going to oppose this Bill?" I replied that I intended to oppose it, whereupon he said "Why do that? It will serve to create even stronger ill-feeling against the clergy, and in that way will precipitate disestablishment." In the case where the owner is not the tithepayer you will have a receiver and that will add enormously to the cost of recovery. It is said that this measure transfers the liability from the occupier, who is generally a Nonconformist, to the owner, who is generally a Churchman, and that it will be found more easy to get the tithe from the owner than the occupier. That leaves out of sight the fact that an enormously increasing number of people in Wales are both owners and occupiers. There is an immense number of small occupying owners in Wales, and these are the men of whom you have to think in regard to this Bill. But I do not find any very great disposition on the part of Churchmen, who are owners, to contribute to the maintenance of their own clergy. It is shown in a pamphlet, which I hold in my hand, that in 1879 in the dioceses of Bangor, St. Asaph and Llandaff, the sum received in tithes amounted to over £101,000, whilst the voluntary offerings amounted to only £4,738—so that for every £1 an incumbent received from the tithe he obtained something like 10d. from his own congregation. No doubt large sums were contributed by these congregations for other purposes, but the fact that voluntary offerings should have sunk so low at a time when the clergy were in the direst need, and when the Bishop of St. Asaph was making an appeal to the English to support them, shows that Welsh laymen do not set a very high value upon the maintenance of their clergy. A great Conservative Congress was held at Rhyl last year, and an address was delivered by the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord G. Hamilton). The meeting was preceded by a conference, at which one gentleman said that—

"In Wales Conservatives and Liberals were united, not in an objection to the payment of tithes, but in an objection to paying them to the present recipients."

I may say that this is really the whole of the Bill. After about four years' incubation this is the Bill that is brought forth by the Conservative Party. We on this side are willing to wait. We know that Welsh Disestablishment has now been adopted as a plank in the platform of the great Liberal Party. But what are we to say of a Government which, after five attempts to deal with the question, produces a measure of which the very best that can be said is that it combines the maximum of irritation with the minimum of efficiency?

*(656.) COLONEL CORNWALLIS WEST (Denbigh, W.): I do not intend to follow my right hon. Friend through the rather discursive speech he has just addressed to the House. I am rather inclined to make no reference whatever to the question of the Disestablishment of the Welsh Church, not because I do not realise the fact that a large proportion of the Welsh people are in favour of Disestablishment, but because I cannot see how it is possible to import into a Bill of this character any such large question as that of Disestablishment. This Bill is required, to a considerable extent, to put an end to a condition of things which has brought disgrace on the Principality. Where my right hon. Friends were during the months of August and September this year I do not know. All I can say is that I was residing in Wales, and that within a very few miles of my house serious disturbances took place. I was not actually present, but saw the magistrates on their return from one of the distraint sales, and had an opportunity of hearing from their own lips exactly what took place. They were honourable gentlemen, and men who were not likely to exaggerate, and they led me to believe that which I now most distinctly state, namely, that unless the military had accompanied them to the distraint sale there would have been not only a serious riot but bloodshed. It is no use minimising facts. The fact is that the Welsh people have been stirred up by a society called the Anti-tithe League until they consider it obligatory to assemble in large numbers in order to assist the farmers in their protest against the payment of tithes. If they had simply protested and acted in a peaceable way as the Quakers did I should have nothing to say to it. They have their own conscientious, religious views, and I think they would have been justified from their own point of view. But when the Anti-tithe League insisted on large crowds assembling to the distress of every right-minded man in the neighbourhood, it is really ridiculous to tell us it was wrong to summon the military or to take such steps as were necessary for the aid of the civil power. I know what great difficulty there is in convincing many of my hon. Friends that the Welsh people—law-abiding as they are—could have been in such a state of excitement as to warrant the calling out of troops. I can only say that I believe the Chief Constable, upon whom we have heard animadversions this evening, is a man of discretion and judgment, and that what he did in advising the magistrates to summon the military was no more than his duty, and what he was bound to do. When that officer is compared with another Chief Constable in a different part of the Principality it must be remembered that the Chief Constable in Denbighshire is in a very different position. Mr. Gee is at the present moment actually sitting on an inquiry instituted at the instigation of the Joint Police Committee under a protest from the minority; but, at any rate, there is an inquiry going on which is of a most unsatisfactory character. The Chairman, the Treasurer, the President, and several members of the Anti-tithe League are now actually conducting an inquiry into the necessity of calling out the military some four or five months ago, and they will, probably, report that there was no occasion for the course then adopted. From all I have seen in the Press and heard about the matter, I think it will be clearly shown that there was occasion for the step thus taken, and that the justices were not in the wrong in having called out the military. Indeed, I think they did the best thing they could have done when, acting under the advice of the Chief Constable, they summoned a troop of hussars, whose presence enabled them to ensure the collection of tithes in a peaceable way. I am a landowner myself, and I have friends in the same position who have told me what I believe to be the case, namely, that the Welsh tenant-farmers will be only too thankful when this question has been set at rest by directing payment of the tithes by the landlords instead of as at present by the occupiers. I, therefore, look upon this Bill as a means of preventing in the future the sort of friction which has taken place in the past, consequent to a certain extent on the conscientious convictions, and to a certain extent also on the great ignorance, of the tenant-farmers as to the payment of tithes. I do sincerely think there are many who believed that by protesting in the way they did against the payment of tithes, that payment would altogether cease. When they discovered that it was the desire of everybody to make the payment still more secure, and that they would have to pay under any circumstances, things quieted down, so that at the present moment, in the greater part of the Principality, the tithe is being collected with comparative ease. Although this is undoubtedly the fact, it is, at the same time, perfectly true that within the last four months there have been very serious disturbances in the Principality arising out of this question. With regard to the Bill before the House, I must confess that personally I am disappointed that it has not been found possible to persevere with the Redemption Clauses of the old Bill, because I believe they would have effected one of the most valuable changes that could be brought about, inasmuch as there are, at the present moment in Wales, a large number of freeholders whom this Bill will not touch. It would, I think, be a most desirable thing, in order to put a stop to the trouble we have lately been in, that a measure of tithe redemption should be introduced. I may as well add that, not only has there been great indisposition as to the payment of tithes to the ecclesiastical owners, but also a very strong indisposition to pay tithe at all, either to schools, charities, or to any other institution. And it is the opinion of almost everybody connected with the schools and charities in Wales that, if the tithe agitation had gone on for any great length of time, the probability is that the property in tithes in Wales would have entirely lapsed and been lost to the people. We look forward, at least some of us look forward—for I do not say that individually I should care to see the whole of the tithes diverted from the uses to which they are now put—but at any rate there is a strong feeling in the Principality in favour of using the tithes for some really national purpose. Whenever that time does come, we shall have the property intact, whereas, if this kind of agitation does go on a little longer, my firm conviction is, notwithstanding what has been said by other hon. Members, that this property in tithes would be seriously jeopardized, if not lost altogether, so far as the Principality is concerned.

*(7.21.) MR. ABEL THOMAS (Carmarthen, E.): I cannot endorse the views of the hon. Member who has just sat down, and should be sorry to think that the views he has enunciated were in any way a reflection of the views held by my constituents or the people of that part of Wales from which I come. I am glad to be able to inform the hon. Member that the Anti-tithe League, as far as South Wales is concerned, has practically not had very much life in the matter of the collection of tithes. It has never interfered with the collection of tithes in any way, and I challenge any hon. Member to show a single instance in which there has been any commotion arising out of the collection of tithes where the Anti-Tithe League have interfered. The only reason why there has been any commotion at all in regard to the collection of tithe is that among the Welsh people there is, and always has been, a wide-spread feeling of dissatisfaction at being compelled to pay tithe for the support of a Church the doctrines of which they do not approve. It has been said by the hon. Member who has just spoken that the collection of tithe in Wales has now become easy, and if he be right, as I sincerely hope he is, and if the Government accept his view of the case, then I say the whole groundwork on which this Bill is based is completely cut away. It seems to me that the main reason for bringing forward this Bill during the present Session is the discontent that exists in the Principality, and nothing else. It has been introduced because of the riotous proceedings that have taken place in Wales where the tithe has been compulsorily collected, and I trust that the hon. Member who has just addressed us will concur with nearly the whole of the Members for the Principality in voting against the Government on this measure. I am not going to follow the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. S. Rendel) in the reasons he has assigned for believing the tithe to be national property. It seems to me that after what he and the right hon. Member for East Denbighshire (Mr. G. O. Morgan) has said, our opinions on this side of the House have been fully ventilated. We have also had the opinion of the Member for West Denbighshire (Mr. C. West) in our favour, because he believes that the tithe is the property of the nation. Assuming that that is the case, I really cannot see how the Government can possibly do anything except bring in such a Bill as is suggested by the Amendment of my hon. Friend (Mr. Rendel), recognising the fact that the tithes belong to the nation. If the tithes be national property, it should most certainly be used for national purposes, and it may be that it is, to some extent, being used for national purposes in England. That, however, does not concern my argument to-night. It is very certain that the tithe is not being used at the present moment for national purposes in Wales. The Church of England is not the National Church in Wales at any rate, and I think I am far below the mark when I say that notwithstanding all the taunts which have been made with regard to the relative numbers of Nonconformists and Churchmen in the Principality, there can be no doubt whatever that there are at least three Nonconformists to every Churchman. I do not think anyone will be prepared to challenge this statement, namely, that three out of every four persons in Wales are Nonconformists, and not Churchmen. [Cries of "No!" and "More!"] I am satisfied with the three to one, and I will go a step further. The way in which even so large a number of Churchmen is got at is by taking the towns into consideration. The strength of the Church in Wales is not in the country districts, but in the towns. Wherever you go into the Welsh speaking districts of the Principality, you will find the strength of the Church Party lies in the towns, and that in the rural districts the Church is nowhere in point of numbers. The reason I mention this is because tithe is not paid in the towns, whereas it is exacted in the country. This measure is one which will affect not the people living in the towns, but those residing in the country, and I submit that in the rural districts of Wales there are close upon six tithe-payers attending Chapel to one attending Church. If the tithe be intended for national purposes, it should be devoted to the good of the six rather than for the benefit of the one, say for purposes of education, and objects of that kind, certainly not for the teaching of doctrines which to the Nonconformists appear to be entirely wrong. The only other point on which I wish to say a word in regard to this part of the controversy is this: we in Wales have shown our discontent with the present state of things. In scores of parishes in Wales the tithes are collected in places where no service is held in the parish church, or where the parish church is in ruins and there is not a single inhabitant attending the Church Service. In hundreds of instances, out of 200 or 300 inhabitants of the parish, there are only six or seven who attend the so-called National Church, so that you have property belonging to the nation being devoted to the benefit of a very small portion of the people against the direct wishes of the vast majority of the population. We are told that there should be no riots in the collection of tithes and no discontent on the part of the Welsh people, and I quite agree that whenever there is a case of assaulting a bailiff and other officers sent to collect the tithe it is a sad thing that such proceedings should take place. We know that these things do happen occasionally; but let me put this question: Suppose that instead of being paid to the National Church the tithe were paid to the Baptist denomination, and the farmers paying the tithe were all Churchmen, what would Churchmen generally say under such circumstances? I venture to think that there would be even more discontent, and that that discontent would be exhibited in a more striking way than it is at the present moment. It is of no use tinkering with this measure. You are only hiding your heads in the sand. You are now only putting a buffer between the clergyman and the tithepayer. The tenant knows perfectly well that in consequence of the Commutation Act his sheaf of corn will still go, although it will be paid to the landlord instead of the tenant. Do you imagine that, because the tithe is no longer paid to the clergyman but to the landlord, that you are going to satisfy a rational or thinking people? It seems to me absurd. You cannot satisfy them in that way. The only way to satisfy them is to nationalise the tithe, and apply it for the benefit of the people at large. I am sure we have behind us the vast majority of our constituents supporting us in voting for this Amendment, and I trust that in time both sides of the House will be found insisting in devoting the tithe to the purposes to which it should have been applied many years ago.

*(7.17.) MR. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): Sir, had it not been for the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman and hon. Members opposite, I should not have intervened in this Debate. Their remarks, I think, were not germane to this Bill, seeing that they introduced wider issues relating to the Disestablishment of the Church in Wales. When we have a direct Bill or Motion on that subject before us we shall not be slow to deal with it in a fitting fashion. But this present measure is of an eminently simple and business-like character, intended to deal with certain local difficulties, which, owing to the conduct of agitators and the vernacular Press, have been caused in Wales. We strongly object to the Disestablishment of the Church by piecemeal. We are prepared, I repeat, to deal with Disestablishment when that question is properly formulated before the House, but we decline now to go beyond the limits of the Bill before us. I think we have cause to complain of the tactics of agitators in Wales, who have selected as the object of their attacks persons who are the least able to resist them. I maintain that no more cowardly agitation has ever been set on foot than the agitation directed against the poor clergy of North Wales. I am in possession of considerable information from that part of the country. It shows that in a huge number of cases, owing to the inspiration of the vernacular Press and the unscrupulousness of agitators, many of the poorest clergymen, with their families, have been deprived of the common necessities of life, and not only that, but they have been assailed with the foulest abuse. The services of their Church have been mocked, and unmentionable things have been done with regard to matters held most sacred by Churchmen. Because these poor clergymen have resorted to the only means they possess to recover that which is due to them, they have even been assailed with physical weapons, and I am sorry to say that the assailants have been inspired by men who should be leaders of the people in right things, but who unfortunately too often lead them into evil courses. As an instance of the oppression of the poor clergy, let me quote a few figures regarding the half-dozen parishes in the archdeaconry of Cardigan. These figures show a bad state of things, but I believe the position has become worse since the time to which they refer. In the parish of Whitechurch the present value of the tithe is £109, and the amount of arrears is £171; Troedyraur, £239 13s. 2½d., arrears £501; Penbryn, £269 6s. 6½d., arrears £238; Kilrhedyn, £295 5s. 7½d., arrears £258; Llanfyrnach, £192 16s. 5½d., arrears £321; Bridell, £140 10s. 4½d., arrears £249. This, then, is the justification of Her Majesty's Government for the present Bill. By its proposals the poor clergyman will not require to set that cumbrous machinery of distraint in motion which has enabled the anti-Church agitator to raise popular feeling against the clergy. By the Bill resort may be had to the simple and prosaic machinery of the County Court; and I venture to predict that within 12 months from the passing of this Bill little will be found for the County Court to do in regard to it, and that the tithe will be paid regularly, fully, and freely. I do not understand why hon. Gentlemen opposite should object to that being the case. What is their main argument at the present time? That tithe is not an exclusive property, belonging not to a religious body for religious purposes, but to the nation for national purposes. Of course, that is a proposition which we on this side are prepared to deny and to traverse in every particular and detail. From their own point of view, however, hon. Members opposite are interested in maintaining this property in its integrity, and in seeing that it is not wasted. In maintaining the corpus of the property unimpaired we are with them, and this Bill will effect that object. I trust that it will be passed into law. I can assure Her Majesty's Government that among the clergy, and the poorer clergy in particular, this Bill is being hailed as a measure of justice, of policy, and of relief; and if any other argument were needed to show that Her Majesty's Government are on the right course, it would be found in the violent opposition of the right hon. Gentleman and hon. Members opposite.

(7.27.) MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): Mr. Deputy Speaker, it is rather extraordinary that the only Member on the other side who should criticise our action is one who represents a constituency in the North-East of England, who knows nothing of Wales except what information he derives at secondhand from interested and partisan sources. No attempt has been made by the Minister of the Crown in introducing either the present or previous Bills to give any authentic details respecting its necessity. There has been a general reference to the deplorable disturbances in Wales, and the widespread resistance to the tithe in Wales. No official attempt has ever been made to show the exact limit and extent of these occurrences, and if any such attempt had been made by authentic official Returns they would have shown that the House has been utterly bamboozled with respect to them. There should be some relation between the remedy and the extent of the evil to be rectified.

VOL. CCCXLIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

How does the matter stand? It is admitted by the right hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill that the measure is largely due to what has occurred in Wales. But this Bill extends to the whole of England, and totally alters the method by which tithe is to be recovered, and dislocates the relations between landlord and tenant throughout all England and Wales, and all this is done because of certain disturbances in Wales. To what extent did those disturbances prevail? There is absolutely no data before the House to show that, and the right hon. Gentleman was compelled to rely on general statements. There is nothing to show that the difficulty was in any way widespread. I am a Member for a County Division, and to the best of my knowledge in the County of Carnarvon difficulty arose in only two or three parishes, and the same may be said of the County of Anglesey. If there were more cases, certainly they were not so violent as to impress themselves on my memory. I am aware that in the Counties of Denbigh, Montgomery, and Flint resistance to the tithe has been more extensive; but, still, even if Returns as to those counties were obtained, I venture to think it would be found that the area of disturbance was astonishingly small, and English landlords would be disgusted on finding that they had been led to support a Bill of this kind through difficulties so limited in character and extent. When Ministers propose an important Bill of this kind they ought to be able to prove something more than that there has been disturbance in a particular locality; they ought, at any rate, to show that unless the law was altered the disturbance was likely to become permanent. Yet they have not attempted to show that. Those who have studied the question know that the disturbance has arisen from a combination of two circumstances, the first of which is that the entire tithe in Wales is used not as national property should be, but for the benefit of only a small proportion of the population. The second circumstance is the agricultural depression. Neither of these causes would alone have been sufficient to cause the disturbance. The appropriation of tithe to sectarian purposes prevailed long before this difficulty arose, and, therefore, that cannot by itself be said to be life? Let me take a concrete example and put it before the right hon. Gentleman. Supposing that adjacent to the right hon. Gentleman's own property is the property of, say, Mr. Jones, who owns the tithes of the parish, he or his father having purchased them, does the right hon. Gentleman mean to advise the House that the tithes thus purchased are public property that may be confiscated without compensation, or with only compensation to the present owners, as if they were only tenants for life? The right hon. Gentleman instanced the case of the Irish Church, and said that was the principle upon which the disendowment of that Church went. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean that the lay improprators are, by an Act of the Legislature, to be suddenly turned into tenants for life? It seems to me that to state the proposition in that bare form is to show its absurdity, or rather its injustice.

*MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: The case of the lay improprators was specially provided for by the Irish Act, and what I wanted to show was that our demand could be met in the same way.

*SIR R. LETHBRIDGE: I will take the right hon. Gentleman's argument from another point of view. He seems to avoid the point as to the lay improprators; but I am ready to meet him as to those cases where the tithe is attached to the ecclesiastical service of the parish. Does the right hon. Gentleman ask that the tithe should be confiscated without compensation? Probably he will say, "No; I would treat the present owner as if he were a life tenant, and give him compensation for his life-interest, but in the future I will take away the tithe from its present allocation." Then I would ask the right hon. Gentleman would he deal in the same manner with the Trust Funds of the various Nonconformist bodies throughout this Kingdom? He knows as well as I do that there are a large number of cases throughout the Kingdom—such as those of Wesleyan chapels and Baptist chapels—where the fee-simple is held in trust for certain uses—uses which as a Churchman I honour as much as I do those that are for the benefit of the Established Church of England. I would stand up in defence of any such trust as that, and against the Legislature attempting to tamper with it. I think it is only fair, then, for a Churchman to ask the right hon. Gentleman why he applies to a Trust Fund connected with the ecclesiastical service of the Church of England arguments which he would not apply to the Trust Funds of Nonconformist places of worship? I turn now to another argument adduced this evening as to why we should have no hesitation in tampering with tithes. I refer to the suggestion that because landlords throughout England have more or less been compelled by the stress of circumstances to make terms with their tenants and to lower their rents, tithe owners ought to do the same. Of course, it will be obvious that the automatic operation of tithe averages does to some extent deal with tithe in this manner, but I would also point out to hon. Members who take up that position that the present Bill deals with exceptional cases, where the tithe exceeds a certain proportion of the value of the land. I should like to note, in passing, that perhaps the strongest argument addressed to the House this afternoon with regard to the general question of the tithe being national property is the argument of the right hon. Gentleman opposite when he said—

"The Government are now acknowledging this principle, because in certain circumstances they propose to abolish the tithe where it amounts to two-thirds of the value of the land."

It seems to me, however, that the answer to that argument is obvious. Great and exceptional cases of difficulty and distress ought to be met by the Government in an exceptional manner, but that ought not to be made an argument for establishing any such monstrous proposition as that to which the House is asked to assent this afternoon. My hon. Friend the Member for Maldon (Mr. C. W. Gray) is anxious to make the limit at which the tithe shall cease to be levied a half instead of a two-thirds limit. The matter is one which clearly admits of argument. There is no magic virtue whatever about the two-thirds. I would point out to my hon. Friend, however, without insisting that his view is a wrong one, that tithepayers, like the rest of the community, should bear in mind that it is a dangerous thing to tamper with what are distinct rights of property in this matter. It seems to me that exactly the same arguments will hereafter be used with regard to the property of the landowners themselves, and the property of other capitalists, and with regard to property generally. I hope my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon will take this point into his careful consideration, and I think he and his friends will be well advised if they do not press their views too strongly in this House. We have been referred to the charge of a distinguished Judge, and have been told that the action of the Quakers in resisting various demands made upon them which they regarded as unjustifiable is a sort of precedent for the deplorable scenes that have been enacted in Wales in resisting distraint for tithe. The justice of the application of that analogy entirely depends on the question whether the resistance to the tithe was a violent one or the contrary; whether it was carried out in opposition to the law, or whether those who made it submitted at once and fully to the operation of the law, only entering a peaceful protest. I am sorry to say that the accounts in the papers and what we hear from our friends in Wales seem to me to show that this has been anything but the case, and that resistance has been often stirred up by unprincipled agitators, who have induced ignorant farmers to believe that they could obtain a remission of unjust taxation if they only agitated against it. Before I conclude I should like to say I regret with some of those who have spoken to-night that it has been found necessary for the Government to drop those clauses of the old Bill which referred to redemption. I should like to see the whole question of tithes dealt with, and I think that tithe owners as well as tithepayers recognise that it would be impossible ultimately to obtain a final settlement of this question without devising some equitable mode for redemption. But I am well satisfied that the Government have done what they have done in order to deal with the most flagrant aspects of this burning question. I believe that the transference of the liability for the tithe from the occupier to the owner and the change made in the procedure for recovery will to a large extent do away with the deplorable state of things we have all so much regretted to see in Wales, that it will enable the tithepayer honestly to pay his tithe in the most convenient manner, and the tithe owner fairly and justly to receive it. Therefore, Sir, I shall have much pleasure in supporting most strenuously the Second Reading of this Bill. (8.13.)

*(8.45.) MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): At the risk of somewhat wearying the House we are obliged as Welsh Representatives to state our case with much fulness, because the view of the Welsh people differs so entirely from the view of the English people, that justice will not be done to the Welsh people unless the House is fully informed as to the point of view from which constituents regard this question. We represent here a nation of Nonconformists, and these naturally look at the whole of this tithe question in the dry light of history. In their eyes it is not covered by a nimbus of ecclesiastical romance; it is not obscured, as it is in the eyes of many English persons, by myths which have gathered round the history of the subject. It is well-known to the Welsh people that no sacredness whatever attaches to the tithe question. They are familiar with the origin and with the history of tithes, and they know that there is no sacrilege in secularising them. The Welsh people are well acquainted with the fact that the whole tithe system originated in the darkest ages of the Christian Church. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General, and I commend to him a passage from Dr. Stubbs, an acknowledged authority on ecclesiastical history and especially upon tithe property. Dr. Stubbs, Bishop of Oxford, in his Constitutional History of England, says—

“The recognition of the legal obligation of tithe dates from the eighth century, both on the Continent and in England. In A.D. 779 Charles the Great ordained that everyone should pay tithe, and that the proceeds should be disposed of by the Bishop; and in A.D. 787 it was made imperative by the legatine councils held in England, which being attended and confirmed by the kings and ealdarmen, had the authority of witenagemotes, from that time it was the subject of not unfrequent legislation. The famous donation of Ethelwolf had nothing to do with tithe; but almost all the laws issued after the death of Alfred contain some mention of it.”

This is a fact of enormous importance as bearing on the whole tithe question. Here it is acknowledged by a great Church historian who has dealt with the tithe question that there was no legal obligation attaching to tithe until the 8th century. It had no existence in the early centuries of the Christian Church at the time when Christianity was purest. When did the legal obligation attaching to tithes begin? At the most corrupt period of the Christian Church, when ecclesiastical authorities were most rapacious and tyrannical, when they extorted from weak Kings the most injurious concessions under threat of pains and penalties in the future world. This was the time when the legal obligation to tithe sprang into existence. There is no mention of the subject among the earliest Christian writers, or in the sacred documents which form the foundation of our Christian faith. From beginning to end of the New Testament there is no reference to the obligation of paying tithe. The writings of the New Testament laid the support of the Church on the voluntary alms of the faithful. The tithe system is entirely a Jewish institution, which came to an end at the advent of Christ, equally with the rite of circumcision and the Feast of the Passover. It would be just as reasonable to enforce the observance of these last as to enforce the obligation of tithe. These facts are well understood by the Nonconformists of Wales, and we cannot wonder that, with a knowledge of these facts, no sacredness attaches in their eyes to ecclesiastical tithes, and they despise all the charges brought against them of sacrilege and of the spoliation of sacred property. The people of Wales are also acquainted with the history of the appropriation of tithes. They are well aware of the corrupt channels through which the whole tithe system has passed. They know that there is no institution which has been more thoroughly abused during the last 800 years than the tithe system. It is an example of almost every kind of rapacity and venality. Originally exacted most unjustly, the tithes have been alienated most unjustly. They have rarely gone to their proper recipients—the hard-working parochial clergy. The greater part of the property went for ages to the monks, and at the dissolution of the monasteries, by Henry VIII. and Elizabeth, much of the property was transferred to Court favourites. Hence the unnatural institution of lay impropriators, the heritage to us of the spoliation of the tithe property at the time of the Reformation. Their whole history is a history of rapacity and callous disregard of moral obligations. These are undoubted facts, the accuracy of which no honest Church historian disputes. These facts are perfectly well-known among the Welsh people, and they are also fairly well-known among the Nonconformists of England, though in this country they have not excited so much interest. With a knowledge of these facts, can you wonder that the people of Wales look upon the whole tithe system as rotten, and as the misappropriation of national property? I am quite willing to admit that matters in Wales are not so thoroughly bad as they were before the Tithe Commutation Act. Before the passing of that Act, almost every abuse flourished darkly. From a well-written and clear statement of the revenues of the Church of England in Wales, by the Rev. H. W. Clark, I find that at the time of the passing of the Tithe Commutation Act only some 50 per cent. of the tithe went to the parochial incumbents—that is to say, those who did any work for it. But now 63 per cent. of the tithe goes to parochial incumbents, while 37 per cent. goes to those whom we may call alien proprietors who take this property from the country, making no return for it by any service. These are the grounds on which, in my opinion, it is impossible to settle this question finally without taking into account at the same time the appropriation of tithe, and making this appropriation a part of the settlement. It is well understood by all intelligent persons that the abolition of tithe is out of the question, because they know that the abolition of tithe simply means adding the amount to the rent of the landlord. There may have been some ignorance on this point in the earlier phases of the agitation, but the subject has been so thoroughly threshed out before the public that but a very small residuum of ignorance on this point now remains. The idea of the abolition of tithe has faded away, and in lieu of it there is the strongest conviction that it is our duty to maintain intact the tithe of the country as a most valuable national property. I believe that in saying this I am expressing the opinion universally held by my constituents and the majority of the people of Wales. Moreover, we are here to speak on behalf of the deep religious convictions of the Welsh people. It is no mere question of pocket. The question of tithe is one which touches the peace, the social happiness, the welfare, and the religion of the country. The Church of England wears a very different aspect in Wales from that in which it appears in England. In Wales it is a constant irritant, and a source of disturbance to the peace of the country. To Welsh Nonconformists it has always been an anti-national, an aggressive, an alien Church. Living a threatened life it is forced by the necessities of its existence to seek strength and support from every side. It is a proselytising and meddlesome Church, interfering at every turn with the freedom of Nonconformists; it touches them in the schools, in their farms, wherever the richer classes come into contact with the working and middle classes. The Church of England appeals to the population of Wales very differently to the way in which it appeals to the population of England. In Wales it wears a different guise; it comes to the people in an alien robe, and it is a source of annoyance, conflict, and friction. Holding these views, I and my friends think we are right in putting before the House the absolute necessity of changing the destination of tithe. We believe that true statesmanship would deal with the root and source of the evil—with this cause of vexation and annoyance which has prevailed so long. We are here to-night to urge these views. We will do so in season and out of season. We shall have no peace in the Principality until the doctrine of religious equality is accepted. We believe that the Church of England severed from the State in Wales will have an active and useful career there. Certainly, such severance will remove the incessant irritation and collision which exist at present. I appeal to those who desire to give vitality to the Church of Wales to remove that which is a source of weakness and danger to that Church; and if that great act of justice is done, I believe every Welsh Member will bear me out in saying that Wales will become the most contented portion of Her Majesty's dominions.

(9.4.) MR. ATKINSON (Boston): The speech of the hon. Member who has just sat down seems to me to have two parts—one referring to the tithe question and the other—the latter part—having reference to the Debate on Disestablishment, which has yet to come on. The hon. Member objects to the manner in which the Government are dealing with the tithe question. The hon. Member considers that he represents the Nonconformists, and no doubt Nonconformity is strong in Wales; but it is stronger in England, so far as numbers are concerned, and there is a strong feeling in England in favour of the settlement proposed by the Bill. If the grievance is so great as hon. Members represent it to be, why did not the Party opposite deal with it when they were in power? They treated the question in the same manner as they did the question of the Ballot, for, though they had many opportunities of dealing with that question, they held it over from year to year. They made a great deal of it before getting into power, but, having secured that, they put it by only to bring it out again on the hustings. They were sorry when it was settled. In like manner they left the tithe question severely alone when they were in Office; and as soon as a strong Government attempts to deal with it, they declare that it is merely patching. But suppose it is patching, how much better is that than doing nothing at all? As a matter of fact, tithes are property, and must be looked upon and dealt with as such. Doubtless the manner in which hon. Gentlemen opposite have dealt with property in the past has given them very hazy notions with regard to it. As they have dealt with the property of the Irish Church and the property of the Irish landlords, they would now have the House deal with the property of the Church in Wales. And apparently they do not reflect upon the condition of things that this course of proceeding may bring about—that before long property in bales of cotton, and property in ships, and all kinds of property may be interfered with. The fact is, that no better proposal than the present one has been brought before the House for settling the question. It provides for a case of difficulty; but if hon. Gentlemen opposite can produce something better, they will always find the Members on this (the Ministerial) side so fair-minded that they will do their best to make the Bill better and more agreeable to all parties concerned. But if it comes to interfering with the principle of the ownership of property—if it comes to a question of stealing the property of the tithe owners and others—it is clear that a Conservative Government and the Conservative Party never can identify themselves with the proposal. If gentlemen buy property subject to tithe we must take that into account. The tithes which may come from that property will not count in a charitable point of view, and, therefore, they are absolutely due as a debt, and ought not to be repudiated. I can assure my hon. Friend opposite (Mr. S. Smith) that if it were his property that was threatened we should be just as strong in that principle as we are now. No doubt hon. Gentlemen opposite find it easy to bring people to their way of thinking, for they declare that the abolition of tithe will put money into the pockets of the farmers, and there are, unfortunately, many people who welcome the prospect of becoming enriched at the expense of their neighbour. I will not believe but that there are many Calvinistic Methodists in Wales who repudiate such principles. I am a Nonconformist myself, and I unhesitatingly declare that the Government have honestly done their best to deal with this question regardless of whether it is likely to be ultimately to their advantage or not. One of the popular speakers representing a Welsh constituency to-night said he should be glad to see the Bill pass, as the credit of it would be given to the Liberal Party. But the passing of the Bill will not redound to the credit of the Liberal Party, as they are not a party to its passing. The Bill comes from this side of the House, and the credit of it will belong to the Ministry, who propose it, and their supporters who help them to carry it.

(9.10.) MR. ALFRED THOMAS (Glamorgan, E.): I rise to support the Amendment of my hon. Friend. I am sorry I cannot speak of the Bill in the eulogistic terms adopted by the hon. Member who has just sat down. I look in vain for one essential of a Bill of this kind, and that essential is conveyed in the Amendment alone. It is plain to those who look for anything like peace in the Principality that such a provision as that included in the Amendment is needed. On looking closely at the Bill I can come to no other conclusion than that it is drawn in the interest of the clergy alone. I sympathise with the clergy, and much regret to hear that there is any suffering amongst them, but if there has been it is much to the disgrace of the members of the wealthy Church of which they are ministers. This measure would be appropriately called the Clergy Relief Bill. Instead of putting an end to difficulties it is going to add to them. I do not say that there have not been some harsh and cruel deeds—although there have not been many of them—performed by landlords in Wales, and especially in Cardiganshire, where some of the tenants were turned out because they voted against their landlords. In most cases, however, the most cordial relations exist between landlords and tenants. But how will it be if this Bill becomes law and the landlords become collectors of this impost? The bitter feeling which existed between the Jews and the publicans of old will be nothing to that which will be created between the farmers and the landlords. The Bill is simply a humiliating confession on the part of the Government that they are incapable of dealing with the question, and I can only look on the measure as a putting off of the evil day. The Government cannot say they do not know the opinion of Wales on this question. They well know that 28 out of the 34 Members who represent the Principality, including Monmouthshire, were returned here on the distinct understanding that they were pledged to Disestablishment. In view of the protests uttered by my colleagues, I can look upon this measure as nothing less than an insult to Wales. Do the inhabitants of Wales deserve such treatment? Are there any people in Her Majesty's dominions who are more loyal and law-abiding? I am afraid that if the Bill passes, its effect will be to fan into flame that great fire of discontent which has been smouldering so long in the Principality.

* (9.15.) MR. J. LLOYD MORGAN (Carmarthen, W.): The Welsh Members do not object to the Government dealing with the tithe question, but to the way in which they deal with it. After previous failures of the Government they have at last succeeded in introducing a Bill that at any rate commands the support of Members on their own side of the House. I have very grave doubts, however, as to whether they will be successful in getting their followers in Wales to accept the Bill with approval. In my opinion the measure will not give that relief to the clergy which is anticipated. The great difficulty in the collection of the tithe to-day will still remain. The small freeholders who farm their own land are the men who make the strongest protest against a system in which they do not believe, and they will be in precisely the same position in the future as they are to-day, and the Government may depend upon it that the same difficulties will arise in the future as have arisen in the past, because these men will make as strong and persistent a protest as they have ever done. This Bill may, to some small extent, remove the friction which now exists, but if it does, it will create another kind of friction, which, as time goes on, will create a much worse state of things than has yet arisen. The landlord will have to pay tithes to the clergyman, and it will be found that the relations between the landlord and the clergyman will become much strained. I trust it may never be the case, but we may have to meet a period of agricultural depression in the future. The clergy will not grant the landlords any reduction. They declined to grant any substantial reduction to the tenant-farmers during the period of depression through which we have just passed; à fortiori, they are not likely to grant any reduction to the rich landlord and the squire. Tenants will go to their landlords and will say, "We must have some reduction in our rents, or we cannot meet our liabilities." The landlords will grant a reduction, but the clergy will refuse to make a similar reduction to the landlords. The Government will consequently discover some day that, instead of this Bill having strengthened their position in Wales, it has created far greater discontent than we have ever had in the past, and between classes who are now on perfectly friendly and amicable terms. The Conservative landlords in North Wales met together at a conference in Rhyl about 12 months ago. They appear to have discussed the Government Tithe Bill very fully, and a long report of the proceedings appeared in the Times newspaper. The landlords present seemed to consider that the very idea of introducing a Tithe Bill to throw the liability on themselves was absurd. They came to the conclusion that there were other and far more important matters which ought to take up the time and attention of Parliament, some of which they proceeded to discuss. The following resolution was proposed:—

"That, in view of the considerable number of unfit and discreditable clergy occupying positions in the Church of England in Wales, it is desirable that a cheap and summary method of getting rid of them by a mixed tribunal of clergy and laity be established by Parliament."

That was the opinion of some of the leaders of the Tory Party in North Wales. The Motion appeared to be too drastic, and a resolution was passed in favour of a Church Discipline Bill. Sir R. Bulkeley stated that not very far from his own house there stood a church in which no service had been held for more than 12 months, and that the tithe of the parish had been exacted all the same. He asked what answer he could give when the people of the parish came to him and said:—"We are ready and willing to pay the tithe if we have our services properly rendered, but when there is no service we do not see why we should pay the tithe." Sir R. Bulkeley said, if tithe-legislation was to be initiated with a view of relieving the clergy and putting an end to disturbances, it was also high time that reform was started in the Church itself. I think I have now shown that the Government have signally failed to satisfy the landlord class in Wales, and that by that failure they will create the friction to which I referred a few moments ago. The party it is sought to benefit under this Bill is the clergy. Let us see whether the measure will confer on them the immense benefit it is supposed to do. By adopting County Court proceedings you bring the clergyman into much closer conflict with the tithepayer than before. The clergyman becomes a plaintiff in the action. The scene of the conflict will, doubtless, be removed. The issue will be exactly the same as in the case of the County Court. The Government have introduced a bill which will be brought before the House, and in addition, because the people have introduced a bill, the County Court proceedings will be abolished. I am bringing the case, I regard the clergy as one, and I trust that this position will assist the Government in scarcely into law.

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, made) I think it is somewhat beside the point for hon. Members on the other side of the House to bring forward the question of stealing the property of the tithe owners and others—it is clear that a Conservative Government and the Conservative Party never can identify themselves with the proposal. If gentlemen buy property subject to tithe we must take that into account. The tithes which may come from that property will not count in a charitable point of view, and, therefore, they are absolutely due as a debt, and ought not to be repudiated. I can assure my hon. By adopting County Court proceedings you bring the clergyman into much closer conflict with the tithepayer than before. The clergyman becomes a plaintiff in the action. The scene of the conflict will, doubtless, be removed, but the issue will be exactly the same, and the conflict will be brought much more prominently before the public than ever, because the people are sure to turn up at the County Court in pretty large numbers. I am convinced that, when the clergy come to understand the exact position they are placed in, they will scarcely be grateful to the Government for this measure. Allusion has been made to the charge of Mr. Justice Wills to adjury in North Wales some time ago. The only conclusion one could draw from his remarks was that there were two ways of paying tithe and both were equally legal. Before the Commutation Act was passed it was the duty of the clergyman to collect the tithe himself. There are two ways. One is for the farmer to take the tithe to the incumbent. Welsh farmers are for the most part men who never attend the Established Church, and who do not believe it to be necessary in their parishes, because it is opposed to the voluntary system which is the spiritual mainstay of the Welsh people. They are strongly opposed to the existence of the Established Church, and yet they are expected to go cap in hand to a clergyman whose presence is not required and ask him humbly and mildly to accept a sum of money for services he has never rendered. That is one way of proceeding, and that is a legal way. There is, however, another way which I think is quite as legal, and it is for the farmer to take up this position and to say—"If I am compelled to pay a debt which I recognise no moral obligation to pay, you must come and take your tithe. You have your remedy, and here it is for you." That is the position the Welsh Nonconformist farmers take up, and I venture to submit it is a perfectly honest and straightforward position. Having said so much with regard to this Bill, I would repeat that the fault we find with the Government is not that they deal with this question, but to the mode in which they have dealt with it. If they wish to deal with it in a satisfactory manner, let them do so in the way proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. Stuart Rendel). I do not want to go into the question of Disestablishment, but I am convinced that no settlement of the tithe question will satisfy the Welsh people which is not based on the lines proposed by this Amendment, namely, a measure acting on the recognition of the fact that tithe is national property, and should be devoted to national uses. What is almost universally recognised to-day on this side of the House, and largely on the opposite side, is the fact that tithe is national property, and as such belongs to the people. It is clear that this must be so. The nation has never parted with its fee-simple in that property; it has never vested this property in the Church and it is now widely acknowledged that tithe is the property of the nation. If this be so, the only logical conclusion we can come to is that it ought to be dealt with, not for the purpose of maintaining a class whose presence is not required, but for the purpose of benefitting the nation at large. If this Bill does not benefit the clergy or tithepayer, and irritates the landlord, it will at least accomplish one thing; it will prove more clearly than ever that the Established Church in Wales is a complete and signal failure, because it shows that in order to get the Welsh people to support it you must bring in the element of compulsion, and in an even more offensive manner than in the past. It is not seriously to be supposed that in bringing in a Bill of this kind the Government are going to settle the great question which has agitated the Welsh people for half a century, although the question is one which we hope to carry to a conclusive issue before long. It is not by dealing with great questions like this on narrow grounds that they can be satisfactorily or permanently settled. If this is to be the method, the result will only be that one agitation will follow another. You may shift the scene, but the issue at stake will be the same because the principle remains the same; and I say that this Bill has done much towards proving and conclusively establishing our case, namely, that the Church in Wales, though having many advantages in its favour, has entirely failed to gain the affection of the Welsh people. If the Church had gained the sympathies of Wales, and was progressing and increasing in strength and influence, does anyone suppose it would be necessary to bring in a Bill of this kind for the purpose of compelling the payment of tithe? As I have said, some aspects of the Bill are objectionable to us on this side of the House; but when it becomes law and begins to create renewed friction we shall have to say, and that before very long, that after all a Conservative Government has done much for the cause of religious equality in Wales.

(9.35.) MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): We have been told by the last and by one or two previous speakers that the tithe is generally recognised as national property, and the hon. Member who has just sat down has asserted that this Bill is being passed solely in the interests of the clergy. Now, I would point out that, out of a total amount, roughly speaking, of £4,000,000, which is the yearly value of the tithe, £766,000 belongs to lay impropiators, while £96,000 belongs to schools and colleges, only the remaining portion belonging to the clergy; that is to say, the clergy have the greater part of the tithe, but not the whole. If hon. Gentlemen are right in saying that the tithe is national property, they ought to be glad that this Bill has been introduced, because its effect will be to render the collection of the tithe much easier than at present. The consequence will be that the security for the property will be thereby improved, and, therefore, those who regard the tithe as national property ought to welcome this Bill. But there can be no doubt that tithe has been for a lengthy period recognised as national property, because it has been sold over and over again, and we know that those who have bought the tithe own it in exactly the same legal manner as others own property of another description. Therefore, I cannot see how you can interfere with this kind of property without at the same time interfering with the rights of other property. The hon. Member who last spoke asserted that in times of agricultural depression the tithe ought to be reduced in a corresponding degree, but I would remind the House that the tithe has already been considerably reduced. The hon. Member shakes his head. Let me remind him that, instead of being £100 as it was on the commutation value of 1836, the present value is only £78, and there is not the slightest doubt that next year it will be still further reduced to £75. Therefore, out of the whole annual payment to be made next year, there will be a reduction of no less than one-quarter, the result being that the total sum payable will be £3,000,000 instead of £4,000,000 ten years ago; therefore, it will be seen that there has been a considerable reduction on account of agricultural depression. I would also remind the House that the Bill contains a provision for the reduction of the excess of the tithe when it exceeds two-thirds of the value under Schedule B. Doubtless that provision will not very often be put in force, as there are very few places in England where the tithe does or will exceed two-thirds under Schedule B. And in any case where that occurs, the tithe will have to be more than double the rent. I am g'lad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade that a Commission is to be appointed to inquire into the redemption of the tithe, because I think that that is the only means by which the tithe question can be brought to a final termination. I think that those gentlemen who are so fond of talking of the tithe being national property ought to be glad to welcome a proposal that will tend to put that property on a better footing than it occupies at present. The value of the property will necessarily be much enhanced by the fact that the interest on the redemption money will be so much more easily collected than is the tithe at the present moment. So far from the occupiers not wishing this Bill to pass, I can only say that, speaking for the great body of English farmers, I am sure they will receive the provisions of the Bill with acclamation. What the farmers are crying out for is that the owners should be rendered liable for the tithe, and that the occupier should have nothing to do with it. It is said, however, that, if the owners have the tithe to pay, they will charge the occupiers more rent; but the farmers are not so simple-minded that they are unable to make their own bargains. When they propose to rent lands which are tithe-free, they will not care very much what the owners say about the tithe; they will only give what they conceive to be a fair rent. There can be no doubt that the principal clause of the Bill is that which throws the burden of the tithe upon the owners of the land. This is what we have all been wishing for, and have asked for over and over again. The Government are now ready to grant it, and in addition to that they have introduced a clause giving remission in certain hard cases. This being the case, I regard the Bill as a good one, and I trust that this House will assist the Government in passing it into law.

*(9.43.) MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): I think it is somewhat beside the question for hon. Members on the other side of the House to bring forward the case of the lay impropiators, because the Government themselves have not brought that case forward in this measure. For my part, I am not aware that any difficulty has been experienced in regard to the tithe payable to lay impropiators. This measure has been brought forward with one object, and with one object alone. It is what has been well termed a Clergy Relief Bill, for it is a Bill to facilitate the payment of the clergy for what they do not do. The Government merely open their eyes to the fact of the resistance which has taken place in regard to the collection of tithe in Wales. The Government, seeing this resistance, say—"We must compel these people to pay their tithe." They fail to look deeper down for the cause of this resistance. That cause is so deeply rooted that a small Bill of this kind will necessarily fail to get rid of it. We have been told that we wish to interfere with the rights of property. We do not wish to interfere with the rights of property at all. It has been admitted by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade that the tithe is national property. [Sir M. BEACH denied.] Every responsible statesman has admitted the fact. ["Oh!"] The admission has been made by the Leader of the House himself. He said last Session that the tithes are national property, except that they were to be applied to a particular purpose, that is the maintenance of the Church in Wales. I was going to say that the Government themselves are tampering with property. They are, too, interfering with the right of contract, which has been a sort of god with the Tory Party for many years past. They are interfering with the property of the lay impropiator. Supposing a lay impropiator holds tithe upon a farm where the tithe exceeds two-thirds of the annual value, what does the Government propose to do? They propose to take away part of the property of the lay impropiator, to wipe off part of the tithe, and put it into the hands of the landlords. That will follow if the 3rd clause is carried into effect. It will be possible that 33 per cent. of the property of one individual will be transferred to the pockets of another. One hon. Member said that we on this side claimed that credit would redound to us from the Bill. I do not see what credit attaches to it. What we said was that it would redound to our advantage ultimately. Its effect will be to change the resistance to the payment of tithe from the clergyman to the landowner, who will experience the ill feeling now directed against the former. The Bill will place landlords and tenants at loggerheads. The hon. Member for East Bradford said the Bill contained mechanical and simple machinery. On the other hand, I find that the Home Secretary said something very different last year, namely, that in recovering the tithe rent-charge titheable goods only ought to be seized, but if the landlord were proceeded against directly, then the proceeding could only be by the "cumbrous process of appointing a receiver." This is now called "a simple mechanical process." I should like to point out one very injurious effect which this Bill may have if it pass. Considerable ill-feeling is shown towards the Church of England because it is maintained out of the public funds. It is proposed that the County Court shall now come to the assistance of the Church. Is it not possible that there will next be an aversion to Courts of Justice? If the County Courts are made use of in the way suggested, may such a contingency not be contemplated? I do not know who has asked for this Bill. It is not the lay impropiators, not the tenants, and not, so far as I am aware, the landlords. The Government are asking us to pass a little measure for the benefit of the clergy, and they wish to put a little of the tithe into the pocket of the landlord under Clause 3. Who has really been agitating for this Bill? We have not. The feeling against tithe in Wales has grown up spontaneously; it was natural that it should do so. The agitation for this Bill is on the part of the Bishops and clergy. We know very well that there are Bishops of the Principality who do not spend all their time there, and who seem better cut out for lobbying than for preaching. I am sure that in the minds of some it is considered that the man best fitted for the high office of Bishop in these days is the fighting man—one who can bring pressure to bear on the Government to pass a Bill of this kind. By this Bill the Government will create greater feeling against the Church than has existed already, and in that way they will facilitate the work of Disestablishment. Even if you get rid of the tithe agitation by this Bill, and you will not, you will have a land agitation springing up in its stead. A considerable portion of the tithe paid by the Principality goes to support institutions in England. We hear talk of "poor little Wales," but surely poor little Wales might be allowed to retain her own property. From the county of Anglesey £1,534 goes to England; Brecon, £2,235; Cardigan, £1,000; Carmarthen, £2,860; Carnarvon, £1,505; Denbigh, £3,103; Flint, £2,845; Glamorgan, £3,386; Merioneth, £1,760; Montgomery, £4,474; Pembroke, £861; Radnor, £1,874; Monmouth, £1,455—making the grand total of £28,900 derived from the Principality for institutions in England. It may be said that this money goes to educational institutions, in the benefits of which Welshmen may participate. But let us see to what this money is devoted. Of this £28,900, there goes to the Dean and Chapter of Oxford, £2,513; to the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester, £2,947; Dean and Chapter of Winchester, £2,404; Dean and Canons of Windsor, £1,824; Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, £1,456; Dean and Chapter of Worcester, £1,330; Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, £1,215; All Souls' College, Oxford, £875; Dean and Chapter of Bristol, £811; Bishop of Chester, £768; Bishop of Lincoln, £400; Christ's College, Cambridge, £370; London Grocers' Company's Schools, £327; Eton College, £200; University College, Oxford, £37; and so on: and for suspended prebendaries and sinecure rectories, £6,816. This money really, therefore, is applied to Church institutions in England and to the support of wealthy cathedrals. I would like to be enlightened on one point. One hon. Member on this side of the House has referred to the question of personal liability. We rejoice that the Bill is as harmless as it is; most of the fangs have been taken out of it. But can imprisonment follow if the payment of tithe is resisted? [Sir RICHARD WEBSTER was understood to indicate that it could not.] I am told by the Attorney General that it will not. We will take care that the necessary provision is made in Committee on that point. But what I wish to know is this, whether if there is any resistance by the tithepayer to the process of the County Court, he will be liable to imprisonment for contempt of Court; whether, while he is not directly liable to imprisonment, he may be indirectly liable. I want to be satisfied, if possible, that nobody will be liable to imprisonment under the Bill. If the Government do pass the Bill, I am sure they will be sorry for it in future years.

*(9.55.) ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I did not intend to intervene in this Debate, but as it has been stated on several occasions—two or three times this evening—that the Welsh Conservative Members do not dare to support this measure openly, I rise to say that, speaking for one-third at least of the Conservative Members of Wales, I am perfectly prepared to support the measure now under discussion, and the fear expressed by hon. Gentlemen opposite lest the Conservative Party should injure themselves by their legislation is very soothing; but we are hardly able to believe in this anxiety, for we feel pretty well convinced that no matter what measure is brought forward by the Government gentlemen on the other side will vote against it. So far as I am personally concerned, I have been obliged to relinquish the religious aspect of the question. I was at one time dragged into a correspondence with a representative of Disestablishment and anti-tithe, who finished it by saying that he knew Conservatives did not regard the law of our Lord, by doing to others as we would be done by, forgetting that charity is also a Christian virtue. One hon. Gentleman opposite spoke of the landlords of Wales as being opposed to this Bill. I can unhesitatingly say of the landlords of South Wales, or that part of it with which I am acquainted, that they are most strongly in favour of it, and that several have urged me to bring any influence I have to bear upon the Government to pass this measure. Hon. Members say that process by means of the County Council will not stop agitation. I do not believe that. It will stop it for this reason, that the tithepayer knows that under that process he will ultimately not only have to pay the original tithe, but the law costs also. Therefore, unless I am greatly mistaken in the character of those whom I have the honour to represent, and whose astuteness I highly esteem, they will not go into Court with the certainty of having to pay about double what they would originally have to pay. I remember a speech by the Member for the Rhondda Valley Division at Cardigan, in which he said that he would not only abolish tithes, but, at the same time, he would pass a Bill prohibiting the landlords from increasing the rent. What epithet would describe such a suggestion? What is the state of affairs in Wales? A case recently occurred in the adjoining constituency to my own, in which two men between 60 and 70 years of age were sent to collect tithe, and they were set upon by a mob and so severely injured that the Magistrates imposed a penalty of £25 upon their assailants. It is because we believe that by giving the control of these matters to the County Court Judge we shall best prevent such disgraceful acts that we strongly approve this measure. I support this Bill as a matter of law and order as far as the Principality is concerned, and because, in my belief, it will put an end to the most discreditable scenes which have taken place in the collection of tithe. It has been remarked to-night that the clergy in Wales have not given up a large proportion of their tithes, but their total income is, as a rule, so very small that it is impossible for them to do so. I know the case of a clergyman with a wife and six children to support whose whole income for 1889 was only £73! How could he possibly remit any portion of his tithe. I believe I represent the feeling of all landlords, at least in South Wales, when I say that this Bill will stop an agitation which has been maintained not so much for religious as for political purposes.

*(10.5.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I am a Metropolitan Member, but as I was responsible in the last Parliament for an Act which dealt with a portion of this difficult question, I am sure the House will not consider I am presuming in venturing to express an opinion on this Bill. Now in Kent and Sussex we were face to face with a difficulty quite as serious as that which has presented itself in Wales, and we set ourselves to see whether the trouble could not be got rid of by some system of redemption. Such a system was embodied in the Act passed by the last Parliament, with the result that substantial relief was given to the tithe-payer, fair compensation was provided for the tithe-receiver, and the whole difficulty was settled. At the present time there is no trouble in Kent and Sussex in the hop-growing districts with reference to what was known as the extraordinary tithe on hops, fruit, and market garden produce. I hold that the Government would have dealt with this tithe question much more satisfactorily had they proposed some system of redemption. But they have confined themselves to dealing with the recovery of tithe rent-charge. I admit that their Bill is a great improvement on the measure of last Session, and that it will deal effectually with the question of the collection of tithe, but to suppose that a mere provision to facilitate the recovery of tithe will dispose of the great tithe difficulty in Wales is absurd. Hon. Members who have spoken on this question have referred to the intense feeling that exists in Wales on this question—a feeling directed not so much against the payment of tithe rent-charge as against the application of it. I may read to the House two or three sentences from a speech by the acting Chairman of Quarter Sessions for the County of Cardigan. This gentleman said he felt, as regarded the peace of the country, it was absolutely idle to talk of a measure shifting the onus for the payment of tithe from the tenant to the landlord; it was trifling with the question. If it were to be dealt with at all it must be on the lines of a redemption scheme. There was a strong feeling in Wales on religious grounds against the payment of tithes, and it would not be got rid of by any arrangement making it payable through the landlord. So much as to Wales. Will the Bill be useful in England? The tithe question in England is a much larger one than it is in Wales, for in one English county alone we pay more tithe than is paid by the whole of Wales. In the Principality the total tithe amounts to £274,000 a year; whereas, in the County of Norfolk, it is £277,000; in the County of Berks it is £88,000; in Cornwall, £101,000; in Devonshire, £181,000; in Dorset, £89,000; in Essex, £250,000; in Kent, £257,000; in Somerset, £155,000; in Hampshire, £172,000; in Suffolk, £205,000; in Sussex, £159,000; and in Wiltshire, £142,000. I am quite satisfied that you will not deal with this question either in England or in Wales finally and satisfactorily, unless you pass a statesmanlike measure for the appropriation and application of tithe, and you must do it first by a system of redemption, which will honestly fix the value of the tithe on the landlord's property, and give substantial relief to the tithepayer, and then, after providing for all vested interests, you must devote the tithe surplus to public uses. I am very glad to hear that the Government propose to appoint a Commission to deal with the question of redemption, and I hope that the Commission will be able to suggest some satisfactory redemption scheme. I intend to vote for the Amendment, in order to enforce the view I entertain as to the appropriation of tithe. I notice that there is among hon. Gentlemen opposite a disposition to dispute the proposition that tithe is public property. But that it is so has been asserted continuously by Parliament ever since 1836, and the strongest assertion of the principle is to be found in the very fact that Bills have been passed which could have no possible justification, unless tithes were public property. Tithe, undoubtedly, is a public property, having a local character, and I believe when dealing with tithes regard will have to be paid to local claims. There are portions of this Bill which are open to criticism. In the first place, the proposal to make the landlord liable to pay the tithe and to give him the right to recover it from the tenant, when the tenant has contracted to pay it, is one which must be viewed with considerable care. I gather that under the Bill the landlord is to have all the rights which the tithe owner at present possesses. In Clause 1 it is provided that the sum shall be recoverable from the occupier by distress; but, later on in the Bill, it will be found that all the enactments of the Tithe Acts shall be available for the recovery of tithe rent-charge under this Act. If the landowner is to have all the rights for the recovery of tithe which at present the tithe receiver has, will he have any remedy beyond that of distress? An hon. and learned Member says, No. What, then, will happen when there is an insufficient distress on the land to meet the tithe? Is the landowner to have the rights which are at present conferred upon the tithe owner? If so, I do not very well see how the tithe-payer will be in a very much better position through the tithe owner having first to go against the landowner in the County Court. I have here a bill of costs which an unfortunate tithe payer was recently subjected to. A distress was attempted for a sum of £11; there was insufficient produce on the land, and the tithe-owner consequently put in force the provision of 6 and 7 William IV., and took possession of the land. Ultimately the costs charged against the payer of tithe through the default for £11 amounted to £46 10s. 2d. If the right to resort to process of that kind is to be transferred from the tithe owner to the landlord I do not see how the position of the tithe payer will be improved where he is a tenant and has to continue to pay in consequence of a current contract. I look upon tithe as a property which ought not to be frittered away. At the same time I am quite sure that the public would not desire to deal harshly or unfairly in cases where the land is unable to bear the full tithe; public feeling is certainly in favour of some considerate treatment of persons in the possession of land overburdened with tithe. The Bill does give relief in extreme cases of this character, and that is all that can reasonably be required. While I shall vote for the Amendment to assert my opinion that tithe is public property, I shall vote for the Second Reading of the Bill as a practical measure to preserve that property.

*(10.23.) SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I am glad the Chancellor of the Exchequer is in the House, for I wish to point out to him that this Bill bristles with breach of contract. When the Irish Land Bill had to be altered, the right hon. Gentleman adhered to the principle that contracts once entered into ought never to be broken. However, the very first clause of this Tithe Bill enacts that certain things shall be done "notwithstanding any contract to the contrary." I suppose that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is responsible as a Member of the Government for the drafting of the Bill; but I venture to suggest that landlords in England have trouble enough in coming to arrangements with their tenants without having the contracts broken without rhyme or reason, or by the desire of either party by an Act of Parliament brought in to serve the purpose of bolstering up the Church of England. I speak as a payer and an owner of tithe, and I say I do not want this Bill passed at all. I do not know anything more mischievous than the drafting of this Bill. Goodness knows, we, landlords in England, have tried to keep on good terms with our tenants, but here all our contracts are to be ruthlessly torn up. A more disagreeable method of collecting the rent I do not know, and this is the reward of the English landed proprietor who has endeavoured to manage his property with some degree of respect for the wants and necessities of his tenants, and with some sympathy for them in these bad times. The Bill is simply intended to back up the Church of England. The Government some day will bring in a Tithe Redemption Bill, and this measure is simply intended to increase the value of tithe in view of that redemption. The hon. Member for the Maldon Division of Essex might have told the House that the tithe now varies in value from 18 to 21 years' purchase, but that if this Bill is passed it will at once be made 25 per cent. more valuable, and of course the redemption will be on the basis of the higher value. The tithepayers will derive no advantage from the Bill. Why not at once repeal the Act of '36, and let the parson collect one-tenth of the produce. You would soon then arrive at the real value of tithes. Under Section 4 of Clause 1, the occupier is to pay the rates for the parson in advance and to collect them afterwards. A more preposterous proposal I never heard of! I want the House to consider where would the tithes be if the owner or occupier of the land (like the tithe receiver) had done nothing to improve it for the last 54 years. In such a case what would have been the present value of the tithe? I know of many cases in which, if nothing had been spent upon the land, the land would not produce the tenth part of the tithe, let alone any rent. Then, again, the landowner was to proceed by process of distress to recover the tithe—which he had advanced to the parson—from his tenant. A more distasteful process for a landlord to pursue I do not know. This Bill is simply intended as a Parliamentary bribe to the clergymen of the Church of England.

Sir J. Stowburne

Those clergymen have always supported the Conservative Party, and knowing that that Party will not be much longer in office they say to the Government, "Give us our reward while you are in office." Some day or other a Bill for the redemption of tithe will be introduced, and then this measure will be flourished in our faces and will be taken as a basis of redemption. A more iniquitous and unconstitutional Bill was never introduced in the House of Commons.

(10.32.) MR. DAVID RANDALL (Glamorgan, Gower): I desire to offer a few observations upon this Bill. In the first place, I have to confess my surprise as a Welshman that we have been deserted in this discussion by the leaders of the Liberal Party. I had hoped, after the various promises that have been made at Sheffield and elsewhere, that at any rate when we came to discuss this matter, which is so important to the Welsh people, we should at least have received the assistance of some prominent member on the Opposition Front Bench. Well, from a Welsh Nonconformist point of view no doubt the present Bill is less objectionable in its character than the Bill of last Session, for it seems to me to leave the occupier, as far as any legal remedy against him is concerned, very much in the same position as he is in to-day, save that, if he resists the payment of tithe, he will in future have to fight the landlord instead of the tithe owner. This is a position of things which I would commend to the consideration of landlords in this House, for I think it is a state of affairs calculated to open up the agrarian question in the Principality. Yet at the same time the Bill will, no doubt, injuriously affect the small freeholders in Wales. In Wales and Monmouthshire there are some 5,300 small freeholders. In Cardiganshire, Carmarthenshire, and Pembrokeshire, where the tithe agitation, which is now in abeyance in anticipation of the results of this Bill, is likely to be as lively as ever, there are upwards of 2,000 small freeholders. These men, I take it, will offer the same sturdy resistance to the payment of tithe in future that they have offered in the past. For example, the yeomen of Montgomeryshire, so long as they know that a large portion of the tithe in Montgomeryshire is devoted to the enrichment of Christ Church

Oxford, will resist payment under a County Court process as much as under distress as at present. This Bill threatens to confiscate the holdings of these men, and to hand them over to the tender mercies of the officials of the County Court. Personally, I have great sympathy for the poor clergy in the Principality, but at the same time I ask the House to have more sympathy for the small freeholders in Wales. The only real relief for the poor clergy of Wales from the oftentimes intolerable conditions in which they find themselves is the Disestablishment of the Church. I know many of the poor Clergy, if they were allowed to speak out for themselves, would welcome Disestablishment quite as heartily as any Nonconformist. No doubt the Government think that by this new method of recovery they will remove the friction that at present exists in Wales, but the working classes in the towns where the County Courts are held will be greatly surprised to see a minister seeking his remedy in a Court of Law. The President of the Board of Trade said he was quite prepared to receive any suggestions or Amendments from this side of the House, provided they are made in a fair spirit. I offer one or two Amendments in that spirit, and I hope they will be accepted. I notice in the Bill an entire absence of any provision for appeal or for trial by jury. Appeal as a right in County Court cases simply extends to actions where the subject matter exceeds £20 in value, and trial by jury is only allowed in cases where the subject matter exceeds £5 in value. The large number of cases arising under this Bill will be under the limits of £20 and £5. I acknowledge that when either party is dissatisfied with the direction of the Judge, either as to a question of law, or the admission or rejection of evidence, the President of the Board of Trade should confer special power of appeal, not as by leave of the Judge but as a matter of right. I do not intend to occupy the time of the House any further, because I feel sure the Government intend to carry the Bill probably to-night, and under these circumstances whatever objections are made on the Opposition side of the House will fall on deaf ears; but I wish to offer my protest at any rate against what is one-sided legislation.

(10.40.) MR. W. ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda): I cannot let this opportunity pass without entering my protest as a Welshman against the Bill now before the House, though I agree with what has been said by several hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House, that this Bill is, to a great extent, an improvement upon all its predecessors. The Bill appears to me to be like a cat-o'-nine-tails without its fangs, or a serpent without its sting. Those who have opposed, for four years at least, the passing of previous Tithe Bills, are to be congratulated upon the success of their opposition, which is shown by the introduction of the mild Bill which is now before the House. Mild as it is, however, it is as much a Welsh Bill as the previous Bills have been. It is as much a Bill of pains and penalties to Wales as any of its predecessors. Now, our case as Welshmen is in a nutshell. We do not object to the payment of tithes as such, we believe with you, Sir, the tithe is a reservation of a part of property in land for national purposes and national uses, and were it devoted to any such purposes the Principality, the Welsh people, would be as good payers of tithe as are to be found in any part of the United Kingdom. But, as it is, the strong and overwhelming sentiment and reason which has led to the resistance of the payment of tithe in Wales is the sense of injustice in respect to the way in which tithe is applied. I assure the House with the honesty of a Welshman, with the honesty and sincerity due to the House, that the present Bill, nor any other Bill, will not remove the difficulty, nor abate one iota of the repugnance to payment of the tithe, until the money so paid is applied to Welsh national purposes. On the other hand, what is the object of this Bill? Is it not to support the Church in Wales and other parts of the Kingdom, so that the Church, in its turn, will support the Government? Probably that is the real view and intention of many hon. Members, but they would not care to state it in this House, or out of it. The noble Lord the Member for Darwen, however (Lord Cranbourne), in his letter to the Times, on July 8th, had the honesty to state the real object of passing the Tithes Bill in the House. He plainly stated that in the interests of the Tory Party the Government ought to carry the Bill. I question very much if the Bill will make the collection of the tithe in Wales more easy. I also believe that the small freeholders in Wales will persist in their objection to the payment of tithe in future as much as ever they have in the past. I thought that in this Debate we were going to be spared the doleful cadence respecting the poor clergy in Wales; but the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Byron Reed) would have it out. I venture to assert, however, that in the parishes in Wales the hon. Member named not more than one-seventh or one-eighth of the people are church-going people. That being so, what have the people as a body to do with the poor clergy? Are the clergy not the clergy of the rich and wealthy people? Since they are, is it not the duty of the wealthy people to support them? Ought the wealthy people to ask the poor people, who have to support their own ministers, to support the clergy of the Church of England? There is no such claim on the poor people of Wales. It is time the cry against the Welsh people for not supporting the clergy should be done away with, for if there is any shame at all it attaches to the wealthy people who receive the clergy's ministrations, but are not prepared to pay for them.

(10.49.) THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): I have been struck, as any listener would be struck, by the extreme inapplicability of the Amendment to the occasion on which it has been brought forward. It appears to me that it would be quite competent to any hon. Member to support the Amendment and also the Motion for the Second Reading of the Bill. There is nothing in the Amendment which traverses the Second Reading of the Bill, and there if nothing whatever in the Bill which is in any way concerned with anything in the Amendment. Therefore we have had the evening which might have been devoted to a useful discussion of a very practical measure devoted to a sort of preliminary canter on the question of Welsh Disestablishment. I venture in the first instance to make my protest against the waste of time. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Yes, hon. Members will have an opportunity of entering into the question of Disestablishment, whenever it is brought forward in a real and practical shape. Every speech made to-night, since that of the hon. Member for Suffolk, has really had no practical bearing on the Second Reading. I wish hon. Members, if they deny the truth of that statement, to answer me a very simple question. The Amendment states that tithes are national property, to be devoted to national purposes, and that the tithe rent-charge in Wales ought to be applied in accordance with the constitutionally-expressed wishes of the people of the Principality. Assuming that to be the case, is that the smallest reason or argument why the House should not pass a measure for making the recovery of tithe more efficient? If hon. Members opposite are really in earnest in the propositions they have embodied in the Amendment, they ought to be the foremost supporters of the Bill if they wish to preserve this so-called national property. I venture, however, on behalf of the Government, to traverse the proposition absolutely that the tithe is national property. What are the arguments put forward this evening in support of that proposition? The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Mr. S. Rendel), who is, at least, as much an alien in Wales as the Church, put forward as his argument in favour of regarding the tithe as national property, that if it was not national property Parliament would not be legislating about it. But does not the hon. Member see that that argument goes rather too far?

*MR. RENDEL: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. I referred undoubtedly to the fact that the Government are legislating for tithe in a manner which shows, according to my interpretation of their action, that they base their legislation upon the principle of its being national property, and I referred in particular to the third clause as justifying that statement.

MR. RAIKES: That may have been the meaning the hon. Gentleman intended to convey, but I took down his words, and what he did say when dealing with the question of tithe being national property, was, "On what other ground could Parliament be justified in dealing with the tithe?"

*MR. RENDEL: In dealing with tithe in the particular manner in which the Bill deals with it.

MR. RAIKES: Just so. Well then I wish to point out that if the fact of Parliament dealing with tithe constitutes it national property, then the whole of the property of all the railway shareholders in this kingdom is national property. We may take another instance. This House has dealt in a very drastic manner with the property of Irish landlords, but it has not yet gone so far as to say that landed property in Ireland is national property. I think we must really have a better argument than the fact that Parliament is proposing to legislate upon the question to justify the extreme assumption that tithe is national property.

*MR. RENDEL: I beg pardon for again interrupting the right hon. Gentleman, but I must respectfully submit that I have not put forward so absurd a proposition as that merely legislating on the subject of tithe makes it national property. I have pointed to this legislation alone. I quite agree that it would have been an admirable preamble to the Bill to say that tithe is national property, but I have never stated the proposition which the right hon. Gentleman attributes to me.

MR. RAIKES: I pass to the argument used by the right hon. Gentleman the member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan). He says he has always believed tithe to be national property since the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) in 1869 referred to the property of the Church of Ireland as having been always the property of the nation, and spoke of the clergy of the Church as being only the medium through which the property was administered. This may be all very well for those who found their faith on the ipsi dixit of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, but it does not appear to me to be sufficient. We have to go further back to get at the point. The hon. Member for Flint (Mr. S. Smith) has told us that this became national property because it was so ordered by Charlemagne, but I am not aware that the laws of Charlemagne were ever current in this realm. I demur to this being considered national property. On the contrary, every one who examines the history of tithe foundation will find it was specially and entirely given for religious use. It was given to the parish in each case. It has never been national property; it has always been parochial property. It has never been given to the State, and it never formed any part of the property of the State. I must apologise for stating these self-evident truths; but so much sophistry has been employed during the Debate that it is necessary to clear the air by downright assertion, which I challenge anybody to controvert. Well, hon. Gentlemen opposite have tried to minimise the disturbances which have taken place in Wales, but they have not been able to altogether make away with them. They have told the House that Mr. Justice Wills made a certain declaration as to distraint for tithes; that there is nothing unlawful in subjecting oneself to distraint for tithe. Of course not; the unlawfulness begins with resistance to the process of law for the recovery of tithe. A man may refuse to pay any debt, and there is nothing illegal in that, but he acts unlawfully when he resists the legal process by which it is sought to recover the debt. It is because unfortunately, in the Principality of Wales chiefly, there has been a disposition to resist the recovery of just debts by legal process, and this resistance has been carried so far that it has been found necessary to consider how the law may be amended, and amended in such a way as to preserve property of the greatest possible value to the Church, to which it now belongs, and which would be of the greatest value to the nation if the nation is ever prepared to confiscate it; which will at the same time not give undue advantage to tithe-payers, while reserving the rights of tithe owners, yet tending to make the payment of tithe somewhat more easy, to relieve those who pay it, at least in some degree, by the mode in which it is paid. That is the position of the Government by this Bill, and this is the principle underlying every measure on the subject introduced during the present Parliament. I, for one, do not regret that we have been obliged from time to time to postpone consideration of this question, and I think our opponents are fairly entitled to the credit of having by their criticism enabled the Government to bring in the Bill in a form which is admitted to be less objectionable to them. The Debate has been conducted almost wholly by Welsh Members, and particularly by younger Members of the House. It is always interesting to have a Debate conducted almost entirely by new Members, but I may in a friendly manner warn those hon. Members that if they continue to sit here, as I hope they may, 25 years hence they may find some of their speeches delivered in their hot youth rising up in judgment against them when the speakers, of to-night are of more matured views, and have had longer experience of political life. Some of the speeches made this evening rather smack of the platform than of utterances we are accustomed to associate with debate in the House of Commons. I do not wish to criticise in an unfriendly manner speeches of gentlemen who have come in hot haste from their constituencies. I am glad they should come here and ventilate opinions where they may be met with argument and subjected to criticism from an independent Press, which is not bound always to justify to the letter everything said at a Welsh meeting, provided it is spoken in the vernacular. A point has been made as to the absence of violence during the last few months in the unfortunate differences which have arisen in Wales, and I am glad to admit that there has been a less exhibition of violence in Wales during the last few months. I was particularly struck by the observation of a Welsh Member, who said that there were no people in the world who would so readily maintain the integrity of the tithe as the Welsh, provided it was destined to some Welsh object of which they approved. It seems to me that might be said of any person who wishes to make free with his neighbour's property. He can always pretend to respect the integrity of that property when he gets possession of it. If a man takes a sovereign from my pocket it is poor evidence of his honesty to tell me that he is prepared to preserve the integrity of the sovereign, and will only devote it to purposes of which he thoroughly approves. But admitting there has been rather less demonstrative violence displayed in Wales during the last few months against the collection of tithe, a very important reason for this seems to have been overlooked by hon. Gentlemen opposite. Have they considered that the violence which has occurred on former occasions has greatly deterred the clergy from endeavouring to enforce their just rights? Have they not the frankness to admit that it has been made really impossible for the clergy to face the expense of recovering what is justly theirs? I will venture, in connection with this, as hon. Gentlemen have endeavoured to minimise the sufferings inflicted on the clergy, to give some figures quoted by the President of the Board of Trade when moving the Second Reading of the Bill last Session. Speaking on March 27, my right hon. Friend said—

"It is impossible to obtain full statistics because they can be obtained only from individual tithe owners, who would be reluctant to state their losses lest they might be made a ground for additional losses in future. But I have the facts with regard to 75 parishes in the diocese of St. Asaph, and I will state them to the House. In those parishes during the two years 1888 and 1889 a sum of £38,918 of ecclesiastical tithe was due. Of that sum £10,230 remains unpaid, and £3,000 has been expended in compelling payment of the rest. Now, I can show that that non-payment has not been due to a general inability to pay, but that the tithe has been purposely withheld in large proportions in individual cases. Of these 75 parishes in 42 between 10 and 20 per cent. is unpaid; in 19 parishes between 20 and 30 per cent.; in 7 parishes between 30 and 40 per cent.; in 4 parishes between 40 and 50 per cent.; and in 3 parishes between 50 and 60 per cent."

That is evidence of the tender solicitude for the poor rural clergy so touchingly attested by many hon. Gentlemen in the course of the Debate. It has been observed by hon. Members opposite that the poor clergy of Wales ought not to starve because they belong to such a rich community. The hon. Members opposite think it right to take away from those poor clergy that which is legally their due in order to make them the recipients of charity. That is what hon. Members opposite call charity and that is what they call honesty. I think it is well this should receive full consideration. We have heard hon. Members declare that the objection is to the payment to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and to Christchurch, Oxford, but there is no disposition to refuse payment to the poor rural clergy. Why, then, has all this terrible suffering fallen on the rural clergy? Christchurch can take care of itself; the Ecclesiastical Commissioners can take care of themselves. It is upon the weak and defenceless humble clergy of Wales that the blows of these defenders of the integrity of tithe fall with merciless severity. I, for one, should be extremely ashamed to come forward as the apologist of such proceedings as have taken place in Wales during the last few years. The hon. Member for Flint says that only a few ignorant people have ever thought that they could get out of payment of tithe altogether, but I am inclined to think there are rather more of that opinion than he would have us suppose. What is the meaning of the title of "The Anti-Tithe League" if it does not mean that the Association is formed for the purpose of getting rid of the tithe altogether, instead of for merely altering its destination? How can those who, like the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Denbigh (Mr. Osborne Morgan), know perfectly well everything that takes place in connection with the "Anti-Tithe League" stand up and profess that they and their friends are actuated by the desire only to divert the tithe to some other purpose, when they know what Mr. Gee has been teaching and preaching in the County of Denbigh for years? I hope now the air has been cleared that the Bill will be considered on its merits, and I almost cherish the hope that the hon. Member (Mr. Stuart Rendel) may, after what has been said, see that it is quite possible for him to retain his own opinion and yet not refuse a Second Reading to the Bill. He will have an opportunity of bringing his question forward on the Preamble. I hope that this Bill will be considered on its merits, and that, notwithstanding the sham fight with which the Government is threatened, when the measure gets into Committee this very useful and practical piece of legislation, which has received the approval of the great majority of this House, will speedily become law.

*(11.15). SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): The Postmaster General has brought against my right hon. Friend and his colleagues in the representation of Wales what is a very serious charge in an assembly of practical men—that this Amendment is not applicable to the Bill. The Amendment is a Welsh Amendment; the Bill has its origin in Welsh causes. The Bill is a remedial measure for Wales, and we shall see how this remedial measure is regarded by Representatives from Wales, and I must own that I doubt whether the speech of the Postmaster General—a speech which I am bound to say was marked by those deep feelings with regard to Church questions we know the right hon. Gentleman has held through life—I doubt very much whether that speech will commend the Bill to the people of Wales. Now, this Bill is brought in to apply to the whole country over which in England and Wales the Church exists. It affects the whole country, but the causes are from Wales, and from Wales alone. If England were only concerned, this Bill would be utterly uncalled for, and this point I earnestly desire to press upon hon. Members. If England alone were concerned, there would be no reason whatever for the Bill. No argument has been given to show that in England there is any reason for altering the process of getting in the tithe because in England there is no moral or religious difficulty whatever in the payment of tithes. I do not refer to exceptional cases, such as those in which members of the Society of Friends and others are concerned, but in England the difficulty consists, wherever there is a difficulty, in there being little or nothing from which to pay tithe—the inability of the farmer of the land to meet the payment of tithe. Now, that difficulty is very much greater than the Government have been willing to confess. I am sorry the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Gray) did not devote a greater part of his speech to giving us instances of the very practical suffering that exists in some parts of the Eastern Counties. Under the original Corn Laws when exceptional advantages were given to corn growers, great breadths of country were laid down under corn, which in these Free Trade days have gradually passed out of corn cultivation until what remains can no longer be cultivated with profit; but nevertheless the land bears the weight of tithe, because it bore corn in the old days, when the price of corn was high. I have it on the authority of a newspaper which both sides recognise that there are six farms together in one county—Wilts, I think, where the tithe together amounts to fully half the rent. The difficulty in England is inability to pay the tithe; and this Bill does nothing worth mentioning to aid the farmer, the landlord, and the small yeoman occupier. What does Clause 3 do? When the tithe rent-charge amounts to two-thirds of the annual value of the land under Schedule B the tithe shall be reduced. What is Schedule B? It is the gross rent of the land. Now, I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman opposite are there many estates in England so happily situated that all the expenses of management, including building and fencing, do not amount to 33 per cent. of the gross rental? The experience of my friends in different parts of the country is that before the fall in rents the expenses of management were 25 per cent., and now they are 33 per cent. Therefore the expenses practically represent the 33 per cent. or third which is to be deducted under the third clause from the gross value; so that the concession made by the Government is that the tithe rent-charge shall not be reduced until the whole of the net rent is taken up in paying it. So far as England is concerned, there is no need for the Bill, and it gives no relief to the tithepayer and no advantage to the tithe owner; but in Wales there is the religious difficulty; there the farmers are unwilling to pay for the support of the religion of a rich minority by these tithes, which constitute the entire religious endowment of the country. It is said no arguments have been adduced to show that the tithes are national property. They are undeniably public property, and therefore they ought to be devoted to public purposes in which all are interested, and not to public purposes for the benefit of only a section of the public. In free and representative countries, when difficulties arise, the custom is to consult the people or their Representatives. Now, my hon. Friend has brought forward his proposal for dealing with the difficulty to devote this money in Wales to the general purposes of Wales. The Government, on the other hand, press forward their solution in the shape of this Bill. We are now going to a Division, and it will be interesting to look at the Division List to see how many of the Representatives of Wales and of Monmouthshire are satisfied with the solution of this question proposed by the Government, and how many prefer the solution suggested by the Amendment.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

Sir George Trevelyan

MR. DILLWYN (Swansea, Town): When will the Committee stage of the Bill be taken?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I hope it will be possible to take it to-morrow after the Irish Land Bill.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Tuesday, 2nd December, 1890.*QUEEN'S SPEECH—HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE LORD STEWARD OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Earl of MOUNT-EDGECUMBE) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address as follows:—

"Your loyal and dutiful address has given great satisfaction. I feel well assured that you will give your earnest consideration to the measures that will be submitted to you, and that no efforts will be wanting on your part to promote by wise legislation the welfare of my people."

The Address and Answer ordered to be printed and published.

ROLL OF THE LORDS.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House that the Clerk of the Parliaments had prepared and laid it on the Table; the same was ordered to be printed. (No. 9.)

INTERMEDIATE SCHOOLS, &c., SITES
BILL.—[H.L.] (No. 3.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: The Bill to which I am going to ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading is practically a reprint of the Public Worship and Burial Sites Act, so that there is little room for criticism either for or against its wording. There are no less than five places in Anglesey which are claiming now to have intermediate schools; and throughout the rest of Wales the desire for their establishment is so great as to amount almost to a craze. A noble Lord who belonged to a former Government once said that the best support they got was unwilling support, and I am bound to say that the support which I give is rather unwilling, for though I bring the matter forward, it is not so much in accordance with my own feelings upon it as that I think the demand requires it. I, therefore, hope as the Intermediate Schools Act has been passed that your Lordships will facilitate its operation. If your Lordships should pass this Bill, I think it would be desirable not to have to bring the matter forward again in reference to technical schools, and that you should allow those schools to be included as well as intermediate schools. And it is not only that technical schools should be considered, but I may remind your Lordships that the Borough of Salford is asking for the establishment of continuation schools, and threatening to bring in a Bill next year upon the subject. Probably those schools would be something like the intermediate schools in Wales. In order to include technical schools and some others, I have put in these words—

"Sites for intermediate schools or other schools, sanctioned by Act of Parliament, receiving aid from the rates or from the Consolidated Fund."

Those words, I think, will cover the technical schools or any others which the Legislature may sanction in future, and will not go beyond them. There is another point in this Bill which I should mention: I have included in it sites for market buildings. I do not mean thereby to affect market rights in any way; but there are many towns in England where there are no market rights, and which have no market buildings, and where covered market buildings are required. I do not think I need say anything more at present in explanation of the Bill. I hope your Lordships will read it a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2s."
—(The Lord Stanley of Alderley.)

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I think this is a new matter. From what I gathered from the description of my noble Friend of the Bill itself I see nothing in it to which I object at first sight, but I think it ought to be submitted before being passed into law to the machinery provided by the Committee presided over by the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Herschell). The measure deals in some respects with a new principle; and I was a little alarmed as to the provisions for acquiring sites for market buildings. I do not know exactly how far that might go, or what confusion it might not introduce. At all events, I think it is a Bill which your Lordships may fairly read a second time now, but I think it should be submitted to the Standing Committee.

On Question, agreed to.

Bill read 2^a (according to Order).

HARES PRESERVATION BILL.

[H.L.] (No. 4.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: My Lords, this Bill is identical with the measure which your Lordships passed last year for the purpose of providing a close time for hares in England, Scotland, and Wales, with the exception of one verbal alteration which was made in another place substituting the word "section" for "clause." I ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading to the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I think your Lordships may safely, and I trust the "other place," as the noble Lord has called it, may also pass this Bill; as we have already considered it, there will be no necessity, I believe, to refer this measure to a Standing Committee.

Bill read 2^a (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

ARCHDEACONRY OF CORNWALL BILL.

[H.L.] (No. 8.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF MOUNT-EDGUMBE: As this Bill has been several times passed through all its stages in this House, I will simply now move that it be read a second time.

Bill read 2^a (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

THE PRICE OF BREAD IN ITALY.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in rising to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he would obtain from some of Her Majesty's Consuls in Italy Returns of the price of bread during the year preceding the increase of Import Duty on wheat in Italy, and during the present year, said: My Lords, Her Majesty's Consul at Leghorn reported some time ago that the duty on wheat in Italy had been raised from 30 fr. to 50 fr. a ton; that is equivalent to about 9s. a quarter, which is rather higher than the augmented duty in France. The same Consul also expressed most dismal forebodings as to the increase in the price of bread which he thought would ensue in Italy. Whether that is so or not can easily be proved if the noble Marquess will be so good as to obtain information from some of Her Majesty's Consuls in some of the principal towns in Italy as to the price of bread previously to the augmentation of duty, and later prices, as may be most convenient. I would ask my noble Friend to request the Consuls in particular at Turin, Genoa, Naples, and Leghorn to send him Reports. Those, I think, will be sufficient. If I can do so without appearing to belong to the Irredenta Party I would also ask for some Returns, if they can be obtained, from Trieste, as that is a great centre of the grain trade.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: We shall be very glad to furnish the noble Lord with all the information it is in our power to obtain. Instructions will be sent to some of the Consuls, as he suggests, on the subject; but I think, perhaps, the most convenient way for the noble Lord to obtain the information he desires is to move for a Return in the terms he thinks best, asking particulars from the Consuls whose names he has mentioned.

THE SCALE OF PUNISHMENTS.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD NORTON, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government if they would introduce early this Session the Bill which they had had prepared two years ago to restore to the scale of punishments on the Statute Book the three years' term of penal servitude which was unfortunately omitted by the Act of 1879, so as to make a regularly ascending series of sentences to various kinds of imprisonment capable of adjustment to the gravity of offences, and to fill up the gap which often leaves Magistrates and Judges to choose between a punishment too light or too severe for the case before them, said: My Lords, I have put this question to my noble and learned Friend sitting on the Woolsack in two Sessions, and I have been assured on both occasions that a Bill has been prepared. I know that a Bill has been prepared for this purpose, and I hope it will at last be forthcoming. Although it is a very short Bill, yet its importance I venture to say is in inverse ratio to its length. It cannot be opposed, for it has no possible ground of opposition in it from any part of this House, and though I know we have been called together for the purpose of considering special measures, this Bill could in no way impede their progress. The restoration of the middle term of our code of secondary punishments is called for by Magistrates, Judges, and especially by the Prison Commissioners connected with the Home Department. The gradations of imprisonment, and of its severer form called penal servitude, ought to be regulated in an ascending scale in proportion to the gravity of offences. The gap which now exists is simply owing to a mistake made in 1878, when a sudden panic arising from an increase of crime led the Committee who inquired into the subject to recommend the legislation which was passed in 1879, omitting this smaller term of penal servitude. The consequence is, that there is now a gap in the series of secondary punishments, which to a very great extent stultifies the administration of justice. If an offender deserves a severer punishment than two years' imprisonment, the Judges can sentence him to nothing short of five years' penal servitude; and in cases where offenders do not deserve so heavy a punishment they cannot be sentenced to anything more severe than two years' imprisonment. I know that, happily, crime is decreasing, owing to the advance of education and to reformatories, and still more to the Discharged Prisoners Aid Society. It seems to me a very great pity that there should be any impediment offered in the way of such improvement by a flaw in the administration of justice. I cannot understand why this Bill, which has been so long prepared, and to which nobody anticipates the slightest opposition, should be any longer delayed. The effect of this imperfect code of punishments is obvious in the number of re-commitments of offenders who have received inadequate sentences, and in the frequent remissions of too long sentences. I hope your Lordships will be assured by my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack that this Bill will at last be introduced this Session.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I would support the appeal which has been made by my noble Friend opposite. It is connected with a matter to which I drew attention in the course of last Session, and is a point, I think, of very considerable importance, and upon which it is desirable that there should be no further delay. I think it has been clearly shown by the Prison Commissioners that the change has caused mischief. This gap in our list of punishments arose from a misapprehension, and they point out the mischievous consequences to which it has given rise. I cannot think there will be anything but a good result from its being rectified.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I have received a communication from the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who has informed me not only that the Bill has been prepared, but that he is anxious it should be brought before your Lordships. There is, I think, a misapprehension in the mind of the noble Lord that the Bill refers only to the matter to which he has called attention. There are other matters also included in it. The Secretary of State is very desirous, as soon as the state of business will allow, to lay the Bill before the House.

LORD HERSCHELL: I might ask my noble and learned Friend to consider whether, if the Bill includes matters which are likely to be of a controversial character, it might not be advisable to separate them from this other question, which might be allowed to stand and be dealt with by itself, leaving the other matters to be dealt with in a separate Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I did not intend to intimate that the other matters in the Bill will be matters of controversy. I hope they will not. I meant that, owing to the change which will be thus made in the Criminal Law, it will be necessary to introduce other matters, and it would be inconvenient to have two separate Bills on the subject. I only desired to point out to the noble Lord that he must not assume that this is the only provision in the Bill.

DURATION OF SPEECHES IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS BILL [H.L.].

A Bill to ascertain and limit the duration of Speeches in the House of Lords—Was presented by the Lord Denman; read 1st; to be printed; and to be read 2^d on Monday next. (No. 14.)

House adjourned at five minutes before Five o'clock, to Thursday next, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 2nd December, 1890.

MR. SPEAKER'S CONTINUED ABSENCE.

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House that Mr. Speaker was again unavoidably prevented from taking the Chair of the House this day.

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

QUESTIONS.

INDIAN POLICE FORCE—MR. WILLIAM M'GRATH DRYSDALE.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the case of Mr. William M'Grath Drysdale, who has served for 20 years in the Indian Police Force; whether he has been dismissed from the Service because he declined to comply with the following orders:—

"1st. To abstain from preaching to natives in the Nissar or any other district while you hold the position you do in the Punjab Police; 2nd, To abstain from addressing any of your subordinates on religious matters, in their lines or anywhere else, when your official status and their relation to you as subordinates cannot be put aside;"

whether the Government of India make it penal for any of their servants to preach Christianity to the natives during their private time; whether the Government of India also make it penal for Mahomedans or Hindoos in their service to preach their respective religions during their private time; whether Mr. Drysdale is also deprived of his pension; and whether the pension of Civil Servants in India is earned by deduction from their pay, and is their own property?

MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcubright): I beg also to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if his attention has been called to the case of William M'Grath Drysdale—namely, that, after 20 years of faithful service, he has been discharged without compensation or pension, because, after office hours, he was found preaching the Gospel; and if he will state what course Her Majesty's Government propose to adopt under the circumstances?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): Perhaps I may be allowed to answer the two questions at the same time. The removal of Mr. Drysdale from the Punjab Police Force seems to have been the result of a long correspondence between that officer and the Punjab Government as to the consistency of his acts and intentions with the Queen's Proclamation of 1888, enjoining those in authority under Her Majesty to abstain from all interference with the religious belief or worship of any of Her Indian subjects. The Secretary of State is at present in possession of an epitome only of that correspondence, and that not extending to the date of Mr. Drysdale's removal from office. The Government of India has been asked to report all the facts of the case. As regards the last paragraph of the question of the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith), no part of the pension of an Indian police officer is earned by deduction from his pay.

*MR. S. SMITH: I should like to point out that I have received no answer to several of the paragraphs of my question. May I ask for an answer to these paragraphs—

"Whether the Government of India make it penal for any of their servants to preach Christianity to the natives during their private time?"

And

"Whether the Government of India also make it penal for Mahomedans or Hindoos in their service to preach their respective religions during their private time?"

SIR J. GORST: I thought from the answer I have given that the hon. Member would understand that I have not yet received full information. I am expecting further details, and I should not like to commit myself to any statement in their absence.

*MR. S. SMITH: Will the right hon. Gentleman be kind enough to inform the House of the information when it comes from India?

SIR J. GORST: Yes, Sir; certainly. The moment the information comes from India I shall be happy to inform the House of it.

CHILD MARRIAGES IN INDIA.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Government of India have under consideration measures to diminish the evils of child marriages?

SIR J. GORST: The best mode of dealing by legislation with this difficult subject has been for some time engaging the anxious consideration of the Government.

AGRICULTURAL EDUCATION.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether the Board of Agriculture have yet formulated the complete scheme for the development of agricultural education, according to the intimation which he gave to the hon. Member for the Rugby Division in February last; whether it is intended to increase the grant of £5,000 for such education; and when the Government propose to carry out the recommendation of the Royal Commission on Agricultural and Dairy Schools that a central normal school of agriculture should be established in the neighbourhood of Rugby?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The subject of agricultural education is dealt with by a number of different authorities, and I have found it impossible, under the circumstances, to formulate at present any scheme, which could be described with accuracy as complete, for the development of agricultural education, which must, in any case, be gradual. I am prepared, however, on the proper occasion, to make proposals which will entail some addition to the existing grant, and to which I hope to obtain the consent of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I do not, I may add, contemplate the establishment of a central normal school of agriculture maintained and equipped by the State, at all events at present.

MR. HERBERT GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): What will be the amount of the addition?

*MR. CHAPLIN: I said some addition.

DUTCH CATTLE.

MR. CHARLES DARLING (Deptford): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether the Dutch Government have notified that the cattle of the Netherlands are now free from foot-and-mouth disease; and whether, in these circumstances, he can give any indication as to the date at which the present Order, prohibiting the importation of Dutch cattle, can be revoked, and their import allowed?

*MR. CHAPLIN: Yes, Sir. We received a notification from the Government of the Netherlands that the Vaals District was free from foot-and-mouth disease on the 11th of November; but the disease is prevalent in Belgium, near the frontier, and I am advised that a sufficient time has not yet elapsed since the receipt of this notification to justify me in at once removing the prohibition on the importation of animals from the Netherlands; but there will be no desire, I can assure the hon. Member, on the part of the Board to continue the present restrictions beyond the time at which they can be relaxed with safety.

KING JA JA.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will inform the House as to the circumstances under which King Ja Ja of Opobo, who was deported to St. Helena in 1888, has lately been restored to his own country?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): Ja Ja was not deported to St. Helena, but to St. Vincent. He has not been restored to his own country. Arrangements are being made for his transfer to another West Indian Island, as a change of climate is advised by his doctor; but it is not considered that it would be prudent at present to allow him to return to Opobo.

*SIR W. FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): May I ask what grounds there are for retaining this foreign King Ja Ja outside his own dominions?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, order!

ADMINISTRATION OF THE OIL RIVERS DISTRICT.

MR. PICTON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will acquaint the House as to the nature of the proposed changes in the administration of the Oil Rivers District, which the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs informed the Aborigines Protection Society to be in contemplation last July, and which it is reported are now to be carried out by Major W. C. Macdonald on his appointment as Consul at Old Calabar?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The details are not yet settled. The principle will be a continuance of Consular administration, with a sufficient staff to perform the necessary duties.

CASE OF CATHERINE HARDWICK.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has had his attention drawn to the case of Catherine Hardwick at Sleaford, fined £10 or two months' imprisonment for child desertion; and whether, under the circumstances, he can recommend a remission of the fine?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): My attention has been drawn to this case by the question of the hon. Member. I have communicated with the Magistrates, and can assure the hon. Member that I will give my best consideration to the matter, and let him know the conclusion I arrive at.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: As the woman is in custody, and it may take a considerable time before a decision is arrived at, is it not desirable to release her until the settlement is come to?

MR. MATTHEWS: There will be no delay. I hope to be able to arrive at a conclusion to-morrow.

TRAMPS ON OAKUM CAGES.

MR. ALFRED THOMAS (Glamorgan, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to a paragraph in the Star on the 26th instant:—

"Tramps on Oakum Cages.—At Bishops Stortford to-day three tramps named Harris, Sullivan, and Crowley were charged with refusing to pick oakum at the workhouse. The prisoners, in defence, said the oakum cages were in a field on bare ground. They were exposed to the weather, and a human being would die if placed there for 24 hours. It was snowing, and they refused to go into the cages, but offered to break stones. They could not sit down, except on the bare earth, and they asked the Magistrates to condemn the cages. It was stated, on the other hand, that the cages had been passed by the Government Inspector. The Magistrate said he could not interfere, and sentenced each man to seven days' imprisonment;"

and whether other provisions should be made in view of the present inclement season?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): My attention has been called to the paragraph referred to; but it does not, as I am informed, accurately represent the facts. The vagrants were placed in wooden sheds, roofed and enclosed on three sides and partly on the remaining side. These sheds were not placed in a field, but alongside and adjacent to the workhouse. The vagrants were not required to sit upon the ground, as stools were provided, and the floor is not of the common earth, but of chalk concrete. The sheds, however, appear to have admitted of an unnecessary exposure to wind and weather. They were not passed by the Inspector of the Local Government Board. On the contrary, he informed the porter and labour master (who were with him owing to the master being unwell), on the occasion of a visit on the 12th of last month, that the sheds should be altered so that they might be less exposed, and requested that the old stonebreaking sheds might be used until they were altered. I am informed that the matter is to be brought before the Guardians at their next meeting, and in the meantime the use of the sheds has been discontinued.

PUBLIC ROADS—BARBED WIRES.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has been informed of a second death in Cheshire this year caused by blood-poisoning following upon a wound from barbed wire, which second death was inquired into by the Coroner for West Cheshire in September; and whether he will now undertake legislation, with a view to prevent the use of barbed wire by the sides of public roads and foot-paths?

*MR. RITCHIE: I have not received any information as to a second death in Cheshire this year caused by blood-poisoning following upon a wound from barbed wire; but if the hon. Member desires it, I shall be glad to obtain the depositions at the inquest in the case.

MR. BRUNNER: I shall be obliged if the right hon. Gentleman will do so.

THE FACTORY AND WORKSHOP ACT.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is his intention to introduce a Bill to amend the Factory and Workshop Act of 1878?

MR. MATTHEWS: It is my intention to introduce a Bill as soon as the state of Parliamentary business will allow.

PROHIBITION OF A NORTHAMPTON MEETING.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has during the Recess corresponded with the Northampton Magistrates with reference to the prohibition of a meeting intended to have been held in the Market Square; whether he will state the effect of that correspondence; and whether he will lay it upon the Table of this House?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have had a correspondence with the Northampton Magistrates on the law relating to public meetings, and I have no objection to lay it on the Table.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I will move for it.

CEYLON—EXPENDITURE.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any, and what, decision has been arrived at by Her Majesty's Government as to the contribution to be paid by Ceylon towards the Military expenditure incurred in the Island, especially with reference to the expenditure incurred for Imperial purposes on Trincomalee, one of the head-quarter stations of the British Navy in Indian waters?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The matter is under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether representations have been received from any of the Colonial Governments objecting to those clauses in our Commercial Treaties with some Foreign Powers that impose restrictions on the fiscal relations between the Colonies and the United Kingdom; and whether any, and what, steps will be taken by Her Majesty's Government to meet the wishes of the Colonies in this respect?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Such a representation has been received from the High Commissioner for Canada and the Agents General of the Colonies under responsible Government, who will have an opportunity of explaining the views of their Governments to the Committee appointed by the Board of Trade to consider certain questions arising out of the approaching expiration of various European Commercial Treaties.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: Arising out of that answer, may I ask further whether the correspondence will be laid upon the Table of the House?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I am afraid that I cannot promise that.

MERCHANDISE MARKS COMMITTEE.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he has determined in what way he can give effect to the recommendation of the Select Committee on Merchandise Marks of last Session, as to the prosecution by the Board of Trade of offenders against the Act of 1887?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICES BEACH, Bristol, W.): I have determined to give effect to the recommendation of the Committee referred to by the hon. Member as to the prosecution of offenders against the Merchandise Marks Act of 1887; but the best way of doing so is still under consideration. I hope, however, shortly to be able to announce the decision arrived at in the matter.

THE BATTLE OF INKERMANN.

MR. BAIRD (Glasgow, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is the case that on the 5th November last, the anniversary of the battle of Inkermann, a number of old Guardsmen who had served in the Crimea were invited to attend guard-mounting parade at Wellington Barracks, but on arriving there found the gates closed and admittance refused to them; and, if so, whether he can give any explanation of the occurrence?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The old Guardsmen were not invited by any recognised authority, and as an intimation was given to the Major General Commanding the Home District that the occasion was to be made use of for a public demonstration in favour of an increase to their pensions, and as he very properly regarded such a demonstration in the barracks as contrary to discipline, he ordered the gates to be closed.

WELLINGTON BARRACKS.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether Colonel Gascoigne's Report upon the condition of the married soldiers' quarters at Wellington Barracks was brought to his notice before the recent fire?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No, Sir. Colonel Gascoigne's Report was not brought to my notice. During my visit to Wellington Barracks in July last I examined these buildings, amongst others, and it resulted in my deciding that these married soldiers' quarters should be pulled down as soon as other quarters could be found for the families. I have made inquiry into the reasons why this Report was not brought to my notice, and I find that, so far from its being a special Report of an urgent character, it was a Report suggesting dealing with these quarters as a service to be brought forward only when the Estimates for the year 1891-2 were being considered, and it would, in the ordinary course, have been brought to my notice in January next.

SUAKIN AND THE SOUDAN.

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is true, as announced in the Times of 26th November, that the trade between Suakin and the interior of the Eastern Soudan is practically closed; what are the circumstances under which, last August, the gates of Suakin were closed to trade with the interior, thus depriving the Hadendows of the supplies of grain needed by them in consequence of the failure of their crops last season; whether there is truth in the statements that have been publicly made as to the intention of the Egyptian authorities to renew operations against Osman Digna and the Mahdists in the Soudan; and whether measures will be adopted with a view to putting an end to the disturbances which have existed in the Eastern Soudan during past years?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Trade between Suakin and the interior has been suspended since last August in consequence of the precautions which it was necessary to take against cholera; but orders have been given that as soon as these precautions were no longer necessary, all persons should be allowed to come to Suakin and buy grain. Exception is made only where there is good reason to believe that the supplies are intended for the support of the Dervish force. The renewal of military operations in the Soudan referred to by my hon. Friend is not contemplated by the Egyptian Government.

PROFESSOR KOCH'S CURE FOR CONSUMPTION.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkington): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government will take steps to obtain from the Government of Germany, at the earliest possible date, a supply of Professor Koch's fluid for the treatment of tubercular diseases, and distribute the same to recognised public institutions in the United Kingdom?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: By directions from Her Majesty's Government, the Ambassador has applied for some of Professor Koch's fluid for use in this country. He has reported that the quantity available is as yet small, and that the subject is not under the control of the German Government.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: Will the right hon. Gentleman take into consideration the last paragraph of the question?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No doubt the Agricultural Department, with whom the matter lies, will do their best to distribute the fluid when it is procured.

*SIR WALTER FOSTER: Why is the Agricultural Department the authority?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I understand that the Agricultural Department has applied for a supply of the fluid.

LAND PURCHASE IN IRELAND.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what amount of the £10,000,000 voted for Land Purchase in Ireland now remains unappropriated?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I have not yet received a specific Report on this question. The latest figures before me represent the position on October 31, 1890. The balance of the £10,000,000 available at that date for further applications was £1,659,022.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The amount applied for was £9,355,919. If from that you deduct the £1,014,941 refused you get £8,340,978, which leaves for further appropriation £1,659,022.

THE TIME OF THE HOUSE.

MR. BRADLAUGH: May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury if his attention has been drawn to the fact that the House has sat from 3 to half-past 3 with nothing to do, and whether that course is considerate either to the officers of the House or the Members? There can be no Private Business before the House during the present portion of the Session, and we might meet a little later or commence business a little earlier.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I am obliged to the hon. Member for calling my attention to the matter. I am aware that we are acting in this matter according to old usage. I will, however, consult with the officers of the House, and take an early opportunity of mentioning the result.

NEW WRIT.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

PURCHASE OF LAND AND CONGESTED DISTRICTS (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 111.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

* (3.53.) MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) moved, as an Amendment—

"That, inasmuch as the Government have advised the landlords in Ireland to combine, strengthened their already exceptional power of eviction, and freely placed at their disposal the forces of the Crown to evict for the non-payment of unjust rents large numbers of those to whose toil the rental value of their holdings is chiefly due, and have also passed and ruthlessly administered a law of exceptional nature to prevent combination on the part of the tenants, and whereas, as a result of this policy, equality of conditions as between buyer and seller has been greatly impaired, and the landlord's interest is maintained at an artificial value, and it is not proposed by the Bill to invest any Irish authority with control over the transaction, this House declines to pledge the credit of the country to the scheme proposed by the Bill as being alike unsafe to the Imperial Exchequer and unjust to the Irish occupier."

I hope the meaning in the Resolution I rise to move is clear. It is to declare that by the policy of Her Majesty's Government a certain species of property is maintained at a more or less fictitious value, and that therefore it would be unjust to ask the Imperial Exchequer to advance money upon that property. I do not regard this matter upon the present occasion from the point of view from which undoubtedly it may be regarded. I do not move the Amendment or claiming to be either a statesman as a philosopher, but I desire to present it to the House from a strictly practical and business point of view. By this Bill we are proposing to use British credit. Now, I do not understand that there is any use in credit unless it involves a certain amount of risk, and therefore I hold that we are bound, representing the taxpayers as we do, to examine carefully the security on which we are using the credit of the country. I wish to take exception to certain assumptions one hears on every hand. We are told that it is a good thing in itself to put an end to what is called dual ownership of land in Ireland, and that there is great need for a great measure of land purchase. I take an emphatic objection to those assumptions. I am not prepared to say that under no circumstances would I bring British credit to the aid of some of the unfortunate tenants in Ireland, but, as to any large system of land purchase in Ireland, the more and more I reflect upon the matter I am satisfied that it is absolutely unnecessary. What is called the dual ownership of land was not originated by the Act of 1881. It existed long before that. There are districts in Ireland where the relations between landlord and tenant are excellent and have been just; and I am by no means prepared to say that we should, on a large scale, destroy that state of things where it has been established. The question of putting an end to what is called dual ownership depends entirely on the circumstances of each case, and does not require any far-reaching measure of this kind. I say, in my Amendment, that the Government have advised the landlords of Ireland to combine. I do not think that will be disputed when we recollect that the Duke of Abercorn went last year as the Official Representative of the Landlords' Convention to the Marquess of Salisbury, and that the latter used some very significant language. He said—

"I may say, in the first place, that I am very glad to see the results of the Convention of Landlords in this deputation, that I congratulate the landlords on the united action that they have taken, and, however inconvenient it may in the future prove—I hope it will not—to me as a Member of the Government, on wider and more general grounds I am glad of the spirit and unanimity which they have shown."

The Amendment goes on to say that the Government has strengthened the already exceptional powers of eviction of the landlords. Those who are familiar with the debates on the Irish Land Question in either House know perfectly well that since the Union that has always been one of the standing grievances of the Irish people. It was insisted upon over and over again by Daniel O'Connell, and the Bessborough Commission of 1881 said—

"In many instances principally in connection with the Law of Ejectment, powers have been conferred upon the landlords in Ireland that have no existence in England."

It is a remarkable thing that where the landlord has done almost nothing to create value in the holding he has the strongest power to evict those who have created the value. But this was not sufficient for Her Majesty's Government. By Section 7 of the Land Act of 1887 they strengthened the power of the Irish landlords in this respect. They enabled them by a letter in a registered envelope to absolutely determine the right of a tenant to a holding. Now, what use has been made of this power? From the 1st of January, 1888, to the 31st December, 1889, there were no less than 18,816 of these notices given in Ireland. By these notices the tenants were deprived of their property in the holding. I wish I could convey to the House an adequate idea of the depth of perplexity and despair these registered letters have produced among Irish tenants, depriving them as they did of all legal title to the holdings on which they and their forefathers were born. It will not be disputed that the forces of the Crown have been freely placed at the disposal of the landlords in carrying out evictions. We all know that the present President of the Board of Trade (Sir M. Hicks Beach), when Chief Secretary for Ireland, found himself obliged to apply to the landlords a certain amount of pressure without the law in order to stay evictions. Yet these evictions have been one of the titles of the present Chief Secretary to having carried out a resolute policy in Ireland. The number of evictions to the 31st March, 1887, were 4,941; to the 30th of June, 8,952; to the 30th September, 4,143, and to the 31st of December, 509; making a total within the year of 18,545. Equally beyond contradiction is the assertion of the Resolution that evictions have largely been for the non-payment of unjust rents; and I do think we ought to have been in possession of figures clearly showing how many evictions were for non-payment of non-judicial rents. Then we have passed a law of an exceptional nature, which the Judges have declared creates new crimes in a manner altogether unprecedented. I invite the House to say that the Act has been ruthlessly administered, and, if any one doubts the applicability of the term, I respectfully ask him to consider the tribunals which have administered the law. I have no hesitation in saying that it is an insult to the gentlemen who are in Her Majesty's Commission of the Peace in Great Britain to call the myrmidons of the right hon. Gentleman opposite Magistrates. The nature of tribunals, the selection of particular individuals, the manner in which evidence is obtained, the mode in which the charge is framed, the character of the witnesses, the way in which they give their evidence, and last, but not least, the prison treatment of those convicted, amply justify the word "ruthless" in my Amendment. Up to the 31st of March last, 2,239 persons were convicted under the Act, not for crimes in the ordinary sense of the word, but for having either directly or indirectly endeavoured to preserve their property in land—these 2,239 persons have been convicted in what Lord Salisbury has happily called a land war—a struggle between the occupiers and the owners for the preservation of the rights of property. I think that when the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) ceases to vex his soul about land purchase and begins to do that for which he is so admirably fitted, write the history of these times, he will find no better word than "ruthless" to describe the manner in which the Act has been administered. I say in the Resolution that the object of this law so exceptional and so administered, has been to prevent combination on the part of the tenants. On the 22nd of April, 1887, Lord Salisbury said—

"We have offered to the other House of Parliament a measure certainly not marked by hesitation in order to put a stop to criminal combinations."

There was no hesitation, but the word "criminal" begs the question, for in many cases the crime was only created by the sign manual of the Lord Lieutenant. That is the gravamen of my complaint—namely, that it has been the steady and unswerving policy of Her Majesty's Government to put the Act into operation against one side, and one side only. What can be the only outcome of such a state of things? I ask the House to affirm that the equality of conditions as between buyer and seller has been greatly impaired, and the landlord's interest is maintained at an artificial value. If any one imagines that the present state of the land laws provides a remedy, I would ask his attention to a case which was tried in Dublin quite recently in connection with the matter—"Lawlor v. Godley." The plaintiff, on the 21st of November last, having a case before the Land Commission, writes to say—

"In succession to my father I hold this farm, and up to the present have been paying a rent of £357, whilst the valuation was £245. During the tenancy, permanent improvements to the value of £2,700 were made, a large share of the expenses being since 1877. All this was admitted by the landlord."

Various valuers, gentlemen of the highest standing as agriculturists in the County of Dublin, fixed the fair rent at £196, £171 10s., £122 10s., £183 15s., and £139 5s. Mr. Lawlor goes on to say—

"To-day the Sub-Commissioners fixed my rent at £275, the Chairman stating that he was reluctantly obliged by his interpretation of the law to levy rent upon my own improvements. In other words, the capital that I have expended—and the expenditure was admitted to be essential for the proper working of the farm—becomes the property of the landlord, and in addition I am to pay him a large sum annually on account of it. It is as if I, having made him a present of nearly £3,000, were obliged to pay him year after year for keeping it. You will observe that the law, as expounded by the Dublin Sub-Commissioners, is not satisfied with confiscating my money; it orders me to pay what would be something like an exorbitant interest, if I had borrowed it, or if the improvements had been made by the landlord. This may be law, but I do not think that the justice of it is apparent."

Mr. J. E. Ellis

*MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): Will the hon. Member give the name of the Sub-Commissioner or of the Chairman of the Sub-Commission?

*MR. J. E. ELLIS: I can only give the name of the case—"Lawlor v. Godley"—which, perhaps, will be sufficient. This precisely illustrates the root of the whole matter. It is a dispute as to whom certain property belongs. I say now then that as far as a Government could do it, by your policy you have impaired, and in many cases destroyed, that state of things by which a man, having freely entered into a contract, is not only legally but honourably and morally bound to observe its conditions. I admit that only a small number of holdings have been put up for sale for non-payment of purchase instalment. £5,000,000 or £6,000,000 have been advanced under the Ashbourne Acts, and 2s. in the £1 of this has up to now been paid without much difficulty. But I do not think a banker would feel his bills were being well paid if on Christmas Day he found 30 per cent. of those which fell due yesterday still unpaid. I assert that we are only at the beginning of the matter. I invite the attention of the House to the Returns 81 for 1888-9 and 115 of 1890. If hon. Members will turn to the first Return they will see that it contains the only accurate account of the financial dealings under the Ashbourne Acts. A careful examination of the Return will amply repay hon. Members. I see that to December, 1888, there were 8,861 holdings, with a value of £195,495 and a rental of £214,971, which were sold for the sum of £3,792,532. To the 31st of March, 1890, 3,336 holdings, valued at £78,863, with a rental of £85,448, were sold for £1,418,193. I direct particular attention to the proportion which the valuation and the rental bear to each other—that is to say, that each holding is charged £10 rent for £9 valuation; and, as it has been admitted by the Attorney General for Ireland, that the tenant's property in the holding sometimes exceeds that of the landlord, we may take it that he is really paying £20 a year for that which the valuer declares to be only worth £9. And now I come to an illustration of the state of things in Ireland drawn from evidence given before this House. There was a Select Committee appointed in 1889, and reappointed this year, to inquire into the condition of the Irish estates of the London Companies. At page 49 of the Report an official of the Land Commission, Mr. Murrrough O'Brien, gives most instructive evidence. He says—

"I conclude from my examination of these cases that the contracts entered into were obtained by intimidation and undue influence, and that they were entered into under duress."

Mr. Commissioner Lynch afterwards, in a Judgment which will be found in the Report, expressed a very strong opinion as to the fraudulent transactions in question. These are illustrations of what is going on in Ireland at the present moment. I have in my possession a large amount of evidence, but I will not trouble the House with it to-day, because I freely admit that it is evidence that ought to be strictly investigated. Evidence has reached me that there are numerous cases in Ireland in which the tenants find that they have already given a great deal more for the land than it is worth, and that they are struggling against financial burdens from which they ask to be released. The landlords, aided by the Government to a large extent, are doing everything they can to exact from the tenants that which is unjust. You have the inability on their part to get relief from the Land Courts, and you have, under such circumstances, a position of things in which the offer of a large sum of British credit is a dangerous thing. I might perhaps hardly obtain credit from the Government or Members opposite when I say that I do not move in this matter primarily from a party point of view. I believe these proposals will settle nothing. I believe they will unsettle everything. I believe they are fraught with danger to future social order and peace in Ireland. We might take a warning from what happened in the case of the Encumbered Estates Act, which was the outcome of a wave of philanthropic emotion which passed over this country in consequence of the fearful horrors of the Irish famine. If ever a Bill was brought before the House out of pure philanthropy, the Encumbered Estates Bill was. The first judgeship under that Act was offered to a distinguished man of the denomination to which I belong—the Quakers. And the whole of the Quaker body set itself heart and soul to make the Act a success. Never was there in the history of Irish legislation a more disastrous failure than the Incumbent Estates Act. It conferred no relief on Ireland. On the contrary, it did a great deal of harm, because it enabled persons in this country and in Ireland to buy, through the ignorance of Parliament, property which belonged not to the persons who sold it, but to those who had created it. I believe from the bottom of my heart, after all the attention I have given to this matter, that we shall be perpetrating a similar blunder if we accede to a great scheme at the present moment for what is mis-called land purchase in Ireland. It is in the unshrinking conviction that this Bill will lead us along a road which will end in disappointment and trouble that I have to move the Resolution which stands in my name.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Will the hon. Gentleman bring up his amended Amendment? The original Question was, "That this Bill be now read a second time," since which it has been been moved in order to insert—

"That, inasmuch as the Government have advised the landlords in Ireland to combine, strengthened their already exceptional power of eviction, and freely placed at their disposal the forces of the Crown to evict for the non-payment of unjust rents large numbers of those to whose toil the rental value of their holdings is chiefly due, and have also passed and ruthlessly administered a law of exceptional nature to prevent combination on the part of the tenants, and whereas, as a result of this policy equality of conditions as between buyer and seller has been greatly impaired, and the landlord's interest is maintained at an artificial value, this House declines to pledge the credit of the country to the scheme proposed by the Bill as being alike unsafe to the Imperial Exchequer and unjust to the Irish occupier."

The Question is that these words proposed to be left out stand part of the motion.

(4.35.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): Sir, the hon. Member has proposed his Amendment in a speech, I think, of great ability. He has opened up portions of this difficult and complicated question in a manner that will tend to assist the deliberations of the House. For myself I do not intend to go over any wide field; I shall endeavour to imitate the Minister who introduced the Bill in limiting my observations to what I think needful in the circumstances of the case so far as I am myself concerned. I shall not revert to historical matters connected with the condition of this question at former periods, nor shall I think it necessary to express an opinion one way or the other as to the necessity, real or supposed, of a large measure of land purchase in Ireland. It is enough for me to look at the case as we have it before us. On the responsibility of the Executive Government an extensive and important measure is proposed, and the line which I am disposed to follow is this—that, viewing that action on the part of the Government of the country, I shall not enter into any abstract question, but limit myself to this proposal. I should not think it right to offer opposition to a Bill so proposed excepting upon the ground that the objections were of a nature requiring and warranting that opposition upon the merits of the case. I do not in these circumstances interpose any preliminary objection to the proposals of the Bill. Other gentlemen, I have no doubt, may do so; but I must bear in mind that this proceeding is, after all, to a great extent in the nature of a continuation of the proceedings of last Session. We then had a discussion upon this Bill, and I think a very useful and by no means unduly protracted discussion. Considerable progress was made at that time in ascertaining and exhibiting its character, and all I have to ask myself is whether the objections that were then taken to the measure by myself and others who thought with me still hold good, or whether, the right hon. Gentleman having made changes in his measure, it can be said those changes are of such importance that they call upon us to deviate from the course we then took. The changes introduced by the right hon. Gentleman are not numerous, and only with one exception are all important. The most important change, as I understand the matter, which the right hon. Gentleman intends to make is the removal of the 20 years' limit; and besides that, if it be generally desired by the House of Commons, the Government will give a control on the part of Irish Counties over a portion of the securities that are to be pledged, that control to be exercised in the form of a plebiscite of the ratepayers. I said over a portion of the security, and I am bound to say that if I were going to enter into a detailed argument I should strongly contend that there was no ground whatever for drawing a distinction between two classes; but I will not trouble the House upon this subject now. There is something tantalising in the character of this proposition, which is not in the Bill, but which is held out to us as a kind of inducement and reward to pass the Bill. If we only show a large amount of inclination and desire in favour of this Bill, that disposition will be met in this way. But it is only right we should, at any rate, know what is the change which the right hon. Gentleman is ready to introduce into the Bill. I have not the least doubt he will make it perfectly clear in the course of the Debate, but the proposal is obviously capable of assuming forms essentially different. From its being a control to be exercised in the nature of a plebiscite, it is quite obvious it is not a control such as was usefully suggested by my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham, which control was intended to apply seriatim to the different transactions, and to establish an effective form of interference where it seemed to be required, for the purpose of stopping a transaction in the carrying out of which local responsibilities seem to be involved. It is manifest that it cannot be a proposal of that kind. Well, then, what kind of a proposal is it? The words of the right hon. Gentleman are capable of being understood in either of two ways. It may be that the ratepayers will have the opportunity of stating simpliciter whether certain contingent funds shall be made liable for the obligations of the British Government, or whether they shall not, and that their negative upon the liability of these funds will have no effect whatever on the course of the transaction. In that case it would have no other effect than that of weakening the securities, such as they are, that are provided. Still, stating the case as I gather it from the partial statement already made, it may be also that this proceeding, withdrawing a considerable portion of the securities, may have the effect of thereby stopping land purchase in the county when the vote was taken.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Yes; that is so.

that that is his meaning, and that is undoubtedly an important provision. Before considering how far such a provision may be workable, I should like to see it in definite form, so as to be able to pass a judgment upon it. For the present it is quite enough for me to say it is not in the Bill, and, not being in the Bill, I am totally unaware what may be the state of opinion in the House with regard to the probability of obtaining its introduction into the Bill. There is another point which I took last year which I am not in a position to enter upon to-night. I then stated, and I think the opinion was a sound one, that in my judgment the House would commit a great mistake if it passed a large measure of land purchase for Ireland in opposition to the decided convictions and persevering opposition of the Irish Members. Undoubtedly last year their convictions were hostile to the kind of measure then introduced; and in the peculiar circumstances of the present moment we have no information from them, and I shall not dwell upon that point. The other change proposed to be introduced, which may be fairly considered of an important character, is the removal of the 20 years' limit; and the right hon. Gentleman ingeniously observed that that removal was recommended by my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle. Yes, sir, but it was recommended by my right hon. Friend in conjunction with a strong contention on our part that there ought to be introduced into the Bill an effective control by an Irish authority—not merely a negative such as the right hon. Gentleman by a plébiscite proposes to supply on the general question whether the Act should operate within the county or not—but that there ought to be an effective control over the particulars of these transactions. It may be that if a control such as was recommended by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham were introduced, then the removal of the 20 years' limit would be a valuable change in the Bill. I will not enter upon that question; but I attach weight to the judgment of those who formed that opinion. But if no effective control is introduced over particular transactions, it is quite plain that the removal of the 20 years' limit is a change in the nature of distinct deterioration. My hon. Friend has said, and said wisely, that he was not governed by party considerations in framing the Amendment he has proposed. I made no secret of it that it would be, in my opinion, a great advantage, a narrowing of the ground, a clearing of the issues, a lightening of the task that may be in prospect, if upon any tolerable terms this land question could for a time, at all events, be put out of the way. That, of course, would not justify us in adopting measures which appear to us in principle objectionable. I will, however, say that, having had the opportunity of stating all these objections on former occasions, I do not intend to dwell upon them at any period of the discussion of this Bill. Though from its necessary complications it may require some considerable portion of the time of the House, at no period ought the provisions of such a Bill to be discussed except with strict regard to its provisions, and never in the slightest degree for any ulterior purpose drawn from a political motive. I adhere to the opinion that I gave utterance to in the last Session of Parliament in respect of the pledging of the credit of the British Government. I do think—I may be wrong, but it is my opinion—that this Parliament was returned upon an honourable understanding, to say the least, with the constituencies of the country that it would not pledge the credit of the British Treasury. I will not enter into the merits of that question in the abstract. It is undoubtedly a very large pecuniary boon to the country, although, like many of our pecuniary boons to Ireland, it may be given in such a form that, instead of being an advantage or a real favour or benefit, it might, on the contrary, appear to be in the nature rather of an injury, and heap up and accumulate claims of Ireland against us. I think, indeed, that Ireland has just claims against us, and if I am to give the use of British credit as the means of meeting those claims, it must be in such a way as to make it largely beneficial to Ireland at large, and not in any way to confine it to a limited portion of the population. In the present Parliament I must say I am at a loss to know how it is that Gentlemen opposite conceive themselves to be at liberty to make a proposal of this kind. I know that there were those who went strongly against the question of British credit being pledged in 1886—and my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham was one of them—but who now say they are disposed in the present case, because of the different conditions and securities which are attached to this new proposal, to support the Bill. I make no doubt of the good faith of those Gentlemen, but how can they say that the personal security of the Irish occupier under the power of eviction which is to be conducted on the part of the British Treasury is a better security than the positive absolute possession in the hands of the British Executive, with the entire public revenues of England and the whole force of the Crown at its back? I am aware that a certain number of tenants have undergone a process analogous to eviction—that is to say, their interests in their holdings have been sold for the satisfaction of British claims. There are between 20 and 30 of such cases. That may be so, but this may be a question of tens or even hundreds of thousands. I for one am not prepared to rely on the security of evictions conducted at the suit of this country. As soon as the dimensions of the subject have reached a stage such as to give it somewhat of the international character which it assumes when a plan of this kind has been operated upon, it seems to me that it would be a most impolitic course to adopt to open a new source of possible conflict and collision at the point of greatest delicacy and irritability, the most morbid point in the whole state and condition of Ireland—namely, the relations of landlord and tenant. To do so would place the Treasury absolutely for the first time in that new relation, except in those cases under the Bright Clauses of the Land Act which deal with select individuals, and on a very limited scale, where I admit there is a possibility of a similar relation. The question of the want of an Irish authority, in my opinion, goes nearly to the root of the whole matter. As far as I am concerned, were the views of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham really embodied in the Bill, and an effective control over the terms of those sales given to an Irish authority, it would alter, I frankly admit, my attitude with respect to it. I should still have the difficulty I have stated as to the pledging of British credit, but, assuming the judgment of the House to be largely in favour of such a scheme, and assuming, on which I give no opinion, that Ireland did not object, and looking at it from the point of view of a member of this House, I should feel that the intervention of such an authority was a change of inestimable value. It would take away a very large portion of my objections to the Bill. We have had since last Session important evidence on this subject in the declarations of the purchasing tenants who have come forward to state the circumstances under which they have made their arrangements. The allegation of the tenants is that in these transactions they are not able to meet the landlords on terms of equality because of the unhappy omission from the Land Act of 1887 of the consideration of arrears of rent. That omission appears to me to have gone far to vitiate the entire basis on which landlord and tenant should deal with regard to those purchases. That authority would supply a national guarantee almost invaluable, but independently of that authority I know not how to answer the allegations of those purchasing tenants who say, "It is true we purchased certain land and entered into a certain agreement, but we did it because the only alternatives were purchase or eviction." I think it is impossible to deny that those objections both justify and require a vote hostile to the second reading of this Bill. I must refer to another point which I think of the greatest importance, although at the same time I do not take entirely the same view of it as of those I have already mentioned, because it is possible a material Amendment may be introduced if the Bill is fairly handled by the House in Committee. I refer to the manner in which the enormous fund which it is proposed to create by the employment of British credit is to be disposed of as between those who may be considered the just claimants on that fund. When we proposed the Bill of 1886 we felt that it was most important to avoid the arbitrary selection of one set of tenants who might be more limited or extended, but who in any case must for a great number of years continue to be a select and favoured class: we thought it most important to avoid the risk of making their position so exceptionally favoured that it would be a source of social danger to the country. I have been alluding just now to the want of security against oppression upon purchasing tenants. That is undoubtedly one objection, although we have had pointed out to us a mode in which that objection may be met; but the objection I make now proceeds on another supposition. No doubt, while there might be many cases in which the landlord took an unfair advantage of his position towards tenants in arrear to extort terms undoubtedly high, I have no doubt there are many cases in which terms would be fair, and where there were those fair terms an advantage would be given to the purchasing tenant, including the eventual acquiring of the fee simple of the land—an advantage of not less than 30 per cent. on the rent. Let the Government consider the consequences of this exceptional treatment on isolated cases. Take the case of two estates having only this difference between them—that one of them has a landlord who is willing to sell, and the other a landlord who refuses to sell. The landlord willing to sell applies, gives reasonable terms, and the transfer is concluded, and his tenants immediately are better off as compared with the tenants on the neighbouring estate to the extent of one-third of the sum that they paid before. How are you to expect that peace could prevail in such circumstances as these? How can you hope to maintain freedom if you create such inequality? I admit that inequality of this kind is to some extent involved in all these wholesale purchase Bills. There was none in the original Bright clause, but there is some of it in every Bill that has regard, and I am afraid it is impossible not to have some regard, to the work of what I have called the Socialistic Committee of the House of Lords appointed before the passing of the Land Act. But when we introduced the Bill of 1886 we tried to reduce this evil to a minimum. We tried to bring about that a full moiety should go not to the purchasing tenant individually, or as a class, but to Ireland as a whole. The right hon. Gentleman has given a certain recognition to that principle, but a recognition so narrow, feeble, and ineffectual that in my opinion it utterly deranges the balance of just claim as between the purchasing tenants considered as a class and the Irish community at large, and if I do not say that this consideration is conclusive against the Second Reading of the Bill, it is because I hope that we may carry some effective Amendment upon the subject in Committee, so strong are the considerations that bear upon it, so honest, just, and well-supported by good authorities—and not only by Home Rule authorities, but by other well-informed persons thoroughly conversant with the Irish land question—so great is the weight of the argument pointing out the enormous social danger to Ireland that would accrue from the lavish concession of so vast a boon to the purchasers as a class, accompanied with such a serious neglect of the interests of the community in which they live. I promised I would not long detain the House. I think I have said all that is necessary. My hon. Friend behind me has set out most of these considerations in his Amendment. I must own that I think it is very difficult to answer his arguments. If the House overrides them we shall do our best to assist in no factious spirit in improving, as far as we can, the details of the Bill. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham, in his speech last year, looked with a practical eye into the working of this measure, and although I am afraid I differ from him on the question of the employment of British credit, yet undoubtedly his proposals, if the Government may be induced to take a favourable view of them, would conciliate a very large portion of the people who object to the measure as it stands. Upon the grounds which I have endeavoured to explain without going into details at undue length, I shall give my cordial support to the Amendment of my hon. Friend, which goes to the root of the matter and is adverse to the Second Reading of the Bill.

(5.6.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I should like, with the permission of the House, to say a few words at this stage. I follow my right hon. Friend not because I am anxious to follow the arguments which he has placed before the House, but because he has referred to me, and because I am anxious before the Chief Secretary replies that he should be in possession of my views in reference to a statement made on a previous occasion. My right hon. Friend has referred to two important changes in the nature of concessions which the Chief Secretary has made, or has offered to make, in the structure of this Bill. But my right hon. Friend has omitted all reference to another change, to which I attach great importance—namely, the concession which the Chief Secretary is prepared to make to the views expressed by the hon. Member for Cork as to some limitation of the area of the Bill. I understand that the Chief Secretary proposes to exclude—in addition to the other exclusions mentioned in the Bill—all pasture land and all land not actually in the occupation of a tenant. The hon. Member for Cork suggested in his speech that the limitation should be one of £50 valuation. It is interesting to examine how far the offer of the Chief Secretary meets the demand of the hon. Member for Cork. I recollect a speech delivered by the hon. Member some time ago, in which he said that in his view the limitation ought to be a limitation of £30 valuation, and that if the action of the Bill were limited in that way the total sum required would be under £80,000,000. As the hon. Member for Cork has now increased his limit to £50, it is not unfair to assume that in his opinion the sum required would be over £100,000,000. Now, I would like to know what would be the total amount required under the proposal of the Chief Secretary? If, as I believe from the best information I have, the limitation which he has proposed will reduce the total sum required under £100,000,000, it is perfectly evident that the concession meets the demand of the hon. Member for Cork, and will be one satisfactory generally to the House. Everybody feels that dealing as we are at the present moment with what after all is a limit of security measured by something like £33,000,000, it is desirable to make it go as far as possible, and to deal with the most urgent part of the problem. The second change made by the Chief Secretary is the proposed omission of the 20 years' valuation maximum in the purchase of property. I understand that that concession is not accepted as satisfactory by my right hon. Friend or the right hon. Member for Newcastle, and I strongly advise the Government to withdraw the proposed concession. I can understand that there may be argument on the other side with reference to this matter. It may be said, "If you fix a maximum of this kind it will always tend to be a minimum as well as a maximum." If, then, you think that 20 years' purchase is too much—as, in view of the working of the Ashbourne Acts, I am inclined to do—it is undesirable to impose a limitation in the Bill which would lead to that maximum being generally adopted. If, on the contrary, you think that 20 years' purchase is a reasonable price, and might with advantage be exacted, you may vote for the exclusion of any limitation at all; the question is so full of doubt that I repeat my recommendation that this concession, as it appears unlikely to conciliate anyone, should be withdrawn. Then we come to the most important of the concessions announced by the Chief Secretary in order to meet the objections made by various Members of the House. The objections which we took to the Bill as it stood were really of two kinds. One I would call a sentimental objection, and the other a really practical objection. The sentimental objection was this: We said it was a harsh and almost indefensible thing to pledge property which, to all intents and purposes, was the property of the Local Authorities without consulting those Local Authorities in any way. Of course, we meant that it was the property of the constituency that the Local Authority represents. I must say that the offer of the Chief Secretary meets absolutely that sentimental objection. If the suggestion that he has made were adopted, it would be impossible to say any longer that the constituencies whose property is concerned would not be consulted as to its application. I am inclined to agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian, that when we come to discuss this question in Committee it will be difficult logically to establish any distinction between the two parts of the Guarantee Fund. I admit that the mere fact that hitherto what was called the cash portion of the Contingent Fund has not been in possession of the Local Authoity, has nothing whatever to do with it. It undoubtedly belonged to the Local Authority, and was intended to be used for local purposes for the advantage of the constituency, and therefore was in the same category as the contingent portion, which was actually under the control of the Local Authority. I now come to what I call the practical objection to the Bill in its original form, to remove which I am afraid the offer of the Chief Secretary is not equally potent. It was twofold. In the first place, we thought that it was rather a dangerous thing to give these enormous advantages to a single, and, after all, a limited class in Ireland, at the expense of what belongs to the whole population. The whole of the ratepayers are interested in the security we seek to pledge, and the whole of the ratepayers, therefore, ought to derive some advantage from it if you wish them to look with a favourable eye upon the scheme. It may, of course, be said that they would all have the advantage that would arise from the tranquillity of the country. But as practical men we must all admit that they would see their interest much more clearly if it took the shape of something that would touch their own pockets directly. Therefore, I am anxious that a considerable proportion of the 30 per cent. which, under the Bill, will be made a gift to the purchasing tenants, should go in aid of the ratepayers generally. That is one reason why we want to see the intervention of the Local Authority, which should be pecuniarily interested in the success of the scheme. There is another reason: I think that the risk of this operation would be materially lessened if we had a Local Authority as a "buffer" between the State and the tenant. I have never concealed my objection to allowing the State to become the landlord in Ireland. I think that would be a dangerous position. I do not mean that it would involve a danger of loss of money to the taxpayer. Of course, the foundation of this Bill is the use of British credit. But though we admit that British credit is used, we do not admit that British credit is risked. That is a totally different thing. We hold that British credit would be used in the same way as the credit of the Bank of England is used in the case of bank-notes issued as against bullion, and that there is absolute security for every penny of British money which is used. We do not believe that there is any danger to the pocket of the British taxpayer. Let me on this point refer to the observations of my right hon. Friend. He says what many of his followers have less courteously said, that hon. Members who support this Bill are doing so in breach of faith; that they, or the majority of them, are pledged to their constituents not to use British credit for any such purpose as this. Let each speak for himself. I myself am absolutely free from any such charge. In my speeches and addresses to my constituents, from first to last I have stated my willingness to use British credit and to risk British credit, though I have always stated that I would not use or risk it for a country to be placed in the position of a foreign country. But it has been part of my own policy that it is right and politic to use British credit for the purpose of making the occupying tenant the owner of the soil not in Ireland alone, but throughout the United Kingdom. My conscience, therefore, is clear; I am prepared to use British credit, although I am very glad I am not called upon to risk it. But though there is no danger, in my opinion, to the purse of the British taxpayer, there is danger of great friction, of irritation, and of loss of what is the chief object of this measure—the tranquillity of Ireland. If you place the Imperial Exchequer in direct relation with the tenant, you almost tempt the tenant to resent the payment of his instalments, and tempt him to say that the price at which he was induced to buy was too high. A tenant would find plenty of persons like the Mover of this Amendment to support him in such a contention. Therefore, unless you can get the public opinion of Ireland—and it does not now exist—in favour of the payment of the full instalments, there will be a constant danger of irritation and trouble. By this plan which I venture to submit you would do a great deal to create such a just public opinion. You would have the Local Authority in the position of landlord, and knowing that if it collected the instalments in full it would thereby be securing a certain pecuniary advantage for the ratepayers at large; whereas, if it did not, an additional rate would have to be levied to make good the deficiency. By this plan you would have the ratepayers interested in the full payment of their instalments by those who had purchased under the Act. Would not the Bill be strengthened and improved by such a plan? My right hon. Friend referred to what I said on this matter on a previous occasion. I should not like to be held to every word I said at that time, because it is quite possible a better way may be found. I want to establish the principle. I admit that in the course of further consideration of the subject I have come to the conclusion that there would be some advantages in leaving to the Local Authority, or the constituents if you please, the one great question whether the Act should be put in force or not, but I do not think that it would be advisable for the Local Authority to consider each transaction. There is a good deal to be said in favour of a referendum on the larger question whether the Act should be put into operation, but the details, I think, should be left to be arranged by the authorities representing the State—the Land Commission and the Exchequer. I think that in the state of Ireland, if every transaction was to be separately canvassed by the Local Authority, there would be a possibility of all sorts of personal questions arising, which would interfere with the fair consideration of the different transactions. But after the terms of purchase had been arranged, it might be well to hand over to the Local Authority the duty of collecting the instalments and to place the Local Authority in the position of landlord until all the instalments had been paid. I gather from what the right hon. Gentleman has said that he is governed largely by the general consideration of his unwillingness in the present Parliament to use British credit without a further appeal to the constituencies. That is a consideration which does not govern me. I am free from any feeling of that kind, and, consequently, I shall have no hesitation in supporting the Second Reading of this Bill. When we come to Committee, and when this matter is raised, as it certainly will be, I hold myself at perfect liberty to vote for any Amendments which will carry out the ideas I have expressed. I know with what care the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has considered all propositions that have been made to him for the amendment of the Bill from all parts of the House, and I do beg him to re-consider his position in regard to this matter of the Local Authority, having regard to the fact that by so doing he would probably receive powerful support from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian.

(5.30.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I had not intended to intervene so early in the Debate, but the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) and of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) necessitate some immediate notice from this Bench, and no Member on this Bench is so well acquainted with the details of this Bill as myself. I hope, under these circumstances, the hon. Member for Nottinghamshire (Mr. John Ellis) will forgive me if I do not spend much time in replying to his speech in support of his Amendment. I was not surprised either at his speech or at his Amendment. The lengthy Amendment he has placed on the Paper appears to me to be a very happy and concise summary of all the usual errors and logical confusions which do so much to render useless the speeches which are from time to time delivered on the land question both inside this House and out of it by Members of the Party of which the hon. Member is an ornament. I pass now, Sir, from these general statements to the particular criticisms passed on the Bill by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian and the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken, and I may begin by replying to the challenge, or rather the question, put to me by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham. He dealt with the alterations—the important alterations, as he rightly termed them—I have made in the Bill by which the area of purchase is limited by restrictions that did not exist in previous Bills. The right hon. Gentleman asked me, if these limitations as introduced were carried into effect, what would be the capital sum, as far as I can estimate it, which would be required to complete land purchase in Ireland. The question is one which I have endeavoured to the best of my power to investigate, but the data are imperfect, and to a considerable extent conjectural. Do what you will with existing statistics, take what trouble you may to collect new statistics, it is quite impossible, in my opinion, to arrive at a conclusion upon this subject which will not have in it a very large hypothetical element. The best calculation that I can make is that in any case the total amount to complete land purchase would be somewhere about £95,000,000 sterling. Therefore, although the 30 odd millions which this Bill proposes to allocate to land purchase certainly is far from carrying it out completely, it will be observed that, if we deduct from the £95,000,000 those cases in which landlords and tenants do not desire to sell or purchase, with the re-payments of the £30,000,000, we may really expect under this Bill to see a great impression made upon the problem we have to solve. The next point touched on by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, which was also adverted to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, dealt with the limit of 20 years, which appeared in last year's Bill and does not appear in this Bill. I think both these right hon. Gentlemen had not present in their minds quite clearly that neither by the terms of the Bill nor by the language of the speech in which I introduced the Bill was it ever suggested that in the opinion of the Government 20 years was the outside limit of the value of land in Ireland. All that the Bill said and all that I said at that time was that we thought that the Public Exchequer should not be called upon with regard to any holding to advance more than the price which corresponded to 20 years' purchase. It will be observed that that operation does not constitute the fixing the price of land in Ireland. It did not, in our opinion, even constitute a suggestion that 20 years' purchase was the proper price at which land should be sold. I found there was great opposition to the proposal. However, it is, no doubt, the fact that some tenants in the better parts of Ireland occupy holdings for which they are prepared to give more than 20 years' purchase, and which are worth more than 20 years' purchase. It is perfectly true that there is no intrinsic reason why the State should aid the purchase of land by advancing more than what amounts to 20 years' purchase. But, on the other hand, it is represented to me by persons who know the districts to which I have referred that this restriction would practically prevent those tenants from buying, though perhaps they are the most eligible class of tenant proprietors in the whole of Ireland. This is not a question on which I individually entertain a strong opinion, but I think that as the question has been raised on the Second Reading it is only due to the House to point out that, since the Bill of last year was before the country, this practical objection has been brought to my notice, and I think some weight should be allowed to it. I now come to the much larger and more important question which relates to the kind of control, if any, that should be given to localities over purchases. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has indicated that, in his opinion, there should not only be a general kind of control, which I gather would fully satisfy the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, but also a particular and special kind of control over each transaction between each landlord and each tenant. That, I must say, in plain terms, appears to me to be absolutely inadmissible. I cannot conceive such machinery working justly to either party. Practically, you would have tenants combining together and deciding that no tenant should be allowed to buy at more than a certain number of years' purchase. They would "bear," or artificially force down the value of land through the very machinery with which you would supply them. Everybody will feel that that argument alone is sufficient, and that you must not allow the mass of the people who are not buyers, but who look forward to the time when they may become buyers, to settle the price of the article they may buy. I therefore for that reason, if for no other, reject absolutely any proposal which would give to the Local Authority control over individual transactions. Now, Sir, there is a wider question. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham has dealt with the suggestion I threw out to the House on the First Reading of the Bill. The House will recollect that I threw out that suggestion as a compromise, and in the interests of peace. I did not pretend to think that its adoption would be an improvement to the Bill, and I do not pretend to think so now. It has the vice incidental to almost every compromise I have ever heard of. It is not so logically compact that you cannot bring logical argument against it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham says he is unable to distinguish logically between that part of the Guarantee Fund over which the Local Authorities are to have control and that other part over which the Local Authorities are to have no control. I do not think that at the present moment it is my business to supply a logical distinction, but I say that there is a great sentimental distinction. The distinction between mortgaging funds which have been given to localities during the past few years, for such ordinary purposes as roads, and the funds over which they have had immemorial control, so to speak—funds for such purposes as education and the support of pauper lunatics—is enormous. You may say that both are the property of the localities. They are contributions given to the locality by the free gift of the Legislature of Great Britain and Ireland, and may be withdrawn at any moment. The claim of a locality to these contributions is based only on the fact that other localities have the same. I do not at all deny that there is a strong claim, but I do deny that there is a claim of the same strength as that of a man to property that belongs to him. I admit, though I do not go to the length of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham in denying that there is any logical distinction between these two kinds of funds—I admit that there are difficulties in drawing a distinction between them, but that is the case in every compromise. If I could pass this Bill as I wish, I should say,—“Here is a boon given by the country at large to Ireland for the purpose of improving its social position. Do not allow localities to interfere with that boon. Give it freely, and take care that the people get the advantage of it.” That is my point of view, though it is not the point of view of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, or of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and all I suggested in my short statement on the First Reading was that, if the feeling of the House was rather with those right hon. Gentlemen, we might come to a compromise, which, though it may have the vices, has still the merits of all good compromises, and which may bring peace to a question with regard to which there are many vital differences of opinion between us. Then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, in a very interesting part of his speech, went on to discuss the interest the Local Authority has in the proper administration of the Bill. He said—“If you want a Bill to work you must give the Local Authority a large pecuniary interest in seeing that the rents are collected, so that public opinion may be in the future what it has never been in the past, namely, on the side of the payment of rents or annuities.” Now, Sir, I for one at once admit the force of that argument, but I want to show how far the Bill is open to the criticisms of the right hon. Gentleman and how far it may be truly said that the locality has no interest under the existing Bill in seeing that these contracts are kept. In the first place, I would remind the House that the locality does already get what is called the Crown per cent.—the county cess. That is more than any landagent in Ireland gets for the collection of rent, and it is a free gift from the State, and subject to no obligation whatever. So much for the amount of the gift to the locality. In the second place, let me point out that the difference between giving a locality money if the contracts are observed and taking away money if the contracts are not observed is very little more than a difference of language. Under the Bill as it stands a locality loses money if the contracts are not observed; under the Bill as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham would wish it, the locality would get money if the contracts were observed. As far as the mere effect on the public opinion of the locality is concerned, I think that that is a distinction which is not a very great one. It is a money distinction, and in both cases the pocket of the general ratepayer is touched. Therefore the general opinion of the locality will be moved in the direction of insisting upon payment, and I do not see any great distinction between the plan of mulcting the locality if contracts are not kept and that of bribing them if the contracts are kept, as the right hon. Gentleman proposes. Then I would point out—and I think it is worthy of the consideration of the House—that you have not so large a margin to give to the locality as at first sight appears. It is true that the diminution of the annuity is considerable as compared with the rent, but I do not believe that the motive to a tenant to buy can be measured accurately by that diminution alone. The terms under which he holds the land after purchase are severer than those under an ordinary tenancy in Ireland. There are arrears, and the State will not and cannot, I think, give the same laxity of treatment to the annuitants as a landlord in Ireland usually does to the tenants, and many tenants even with this bribe of 20 per cent. and over will, I believe, distinctly prefer to remain under their old landlords to coming under the harder and more rigorous management of the State. Therefore, if you are going still further to diminish what I may call the arithmetical benefit which the tenant obtains from purchase, you will remove the motive for purchase and pro tanto diminish the benefits which I hope and believe Ireland will obtain from this Bill. I think I have dealt with the arguments common to the two important speeches which we have heard, and now I will in a very few words further deal only with the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. He repeated very briefly some of the arguments formerly used against this Bill, but his main argument, after all, was the old one—that the British Treasury would have to evict in order to enforce payment of the annuities. I dissent from that statement of the principles of the Bill absolutely and in toto. The actual process by which a tenant who does not pay his annuity will be dealt with will be undertaken by the Land Commission not in the interests of the British Treasury, but of the local funds. That difference is fundamental. It is not as if the British Treasury would be benefited by one sixpence if the holding is sold, but the ratepayers of the locality would be saved from losing the funds contributed out of the Imperial Exchequer. Then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian dwelt on an argument previously advanced—

I think unfortunately—by the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. John Ellis) with regard to the involuntary purchases which have taken place under the Bill already. But he forgot, I think, that his own Bill was based upon involuntary purchase; the whole essence and substance of his Bill was that the landlord might or might not sell, but practically the tenant was compelled to buy, not at 17 years' purchase, which is the average price under the existing Act, but at 20 years' purchase of the judicial rent, broadly speaking.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): There has been power to mitigate.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman corrects me. It is true that there was power to lessen the term, but the basis of the Bill was compulsory purchase at 20 years, and amounted to a direction to the Land Commission to insist upon sale at that price, unless in individual cases strong reason could be shown against it. Therefore, I am bound to say that when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian criticises our Bill because, if the story of the tenant is to be believed, involuntary purchase has taken place, he forgets that, if it ever did occur at all, what was a regrettable accident in our Bill was an inevitable necessity in his own. I was unable to reconcile that part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman with his own Bill, and also with the next part of his argument, which was that sales under this Bill will so improve the position of the Irish tenant who purchases that the unfortunate tenants who are his next neighbours, and are unable to purchase, will practically feel that they have a grievance against the landlord or the State, and that you will produce a condition of social discord greater than that which you relieve. Well, Sir, but if the position of the tenant-purchaser is so very much better than that of the tenant who pays rent, what becomes of the argument of the hon. Member for Nottingham, which was endorsed by the right hon. Gentleman himself—namely, that the people who have purchased already have a grievance, and ought to be relieved of part of their bargains? I am ready and anxious to give all the information I can about these complaining purchasers, but I deduce this general proposition from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, that if the tenant after purchase pays an annuity less than the rent he paid as tenant, he not only has a grievance, but he is also the subject of envy to the neighbouring tenants. Test the purchasers by this criterion, and you will see what their grievance is. The right hon. Gentleman must not suppose that I think that there is not some solid basis for his criticism on the Bill, not from the point of view of the hon. Member for Nottingham, but more from his own; that is to say, it is possible that tenants who desire to buy, but are unable, will compare their condition with that of those who are more favourably situated. Now, Sir, the House will see that in the Bill I have introduced I have done something to meet this possible difficulty and danger, because I have given power to the Lord Lieutenant to continue the 80 per cent. over a longer period of five years, which was the period fixed in the Bill of last year. I think that the Lord Lieutenant will be able to consider the social position of each county in Ireland, and if he finds the competition or the desire to buy so keen as to be likely to lead to discontent, he can, so to speak, put his finger upon the throttle valve, and so diminish the immediate benefit which the tenants expect to get, and he may thereby mitigate that excessive competition which the right hon. Gentleman appears to fear, and which I admit in certain parts of Ireland is a possible danger. I have taken the best advice I can in the matter, and I do not believe that the advantages which the tenants think that they will obtain by becoming subject to an annuity to the State are so great over their present condition of tenants paying rent to a landlord, and I do not believe that over a great part of Ireland this competition and desire to buy will exist. I think that I have now touched upon all the arguments advanced in the speeches to which we have listened with so much interest. With regard to the speech of the hon. Member for Nottingham, let me say that most of it seemed to me to be an argument in favour of the Bill. He dwelt at great length and with great elaboration on the evils which exist under the present system, and upon all the difficulties which exist between landlord and tenant, and which beset the dealing of landlord with tenant. Those difficulties do exist, and there is no way out of them except by land purchase, and by land purchase alone will you put an end to them, or remove from the path of Irish progress that agrarian discontent which is in itself the fruit and product of a long and melancholy history, but which I do believe if once removed from that path will leave it unimpeded, and may hold out to us who have the prosperity of that country at heart some not distant hope of seeing a great change for the better in the social condition of Ireland.

*[5.58.] MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): I listened with consternation to the language of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham and of the Chief Secretary when they spoke of the large sums of money which would be required for the purpose of working out this scheme. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham put the sum at £100,000,000, the Chief Secretary put it at £95,000,000. I suppose the sum, whatever it is, is in excess of the £30,000,000 which is provided for in this Bill. This is to be added to the National Debt, and we are to give it to that class who in their conduct in the past have been most neglectful of their duties, and have by their selfishness produced more disaffection and more turbulence in Ireland than any other class in the United Kingdom. The money is to be repaid by those who are in strained relations with the British Government, and may possibly combine to resist payment of the instalments, and whose combination can only be broken by steps that would partially depopulate portions of the country, a thing intolerable in this stage of our civilisation, and, indeed, equivalent to a condition of civil war. I cannot believe that hon. Gentlemen opposite are so confident as they affect to be as to the value of the securities. The probability of a political strike if the present régime under the Crimes Act is continued is self-evident. Even if Home Rule is conceded, as I trust it may be, this Bill would offer a most tempting weapon in the event of any difference arising between the two countries, most mortifying to our pride, and certain to produce corresponding resentment on this side of the water. Now, it has been said that the "No Rent" manifesto did not produce a general repudiation of rents. I agree it did not, but it would be a very bad look out for the peaceful relations between this country and Ireland if it were in the power of Nationalist leaders hereafter to put the Government of this country to such an extremity as that to which Irish landlords were forced to recover their rents in 1881 and 1882. In addition to this there are other dangers to be feared. There is danger arising from a fall in prices, from foreign competition, from the pressure of war; and scores of other contingences may arise in the course of 50 years, so to depreciate the value of land that tenants will be unable to pay their instalments. I believe if it were not for Party recollections, Party ties, and Party fears the Bill would have no chance of passing into law. We on this side are under a great disadvantage; we are fighting under the shadow of the Bill of 1886. I know that Bill differed from this in many particulars, and was itself intended to be part of an agrarian and political settlement; it is none the less true that the main principle of that Bill was similar to the main principle of this Bill, that is an indiscriminate purchase of Irish land at the cost of British credit. Now that is precisely the principle which was condemned at the last General Election, and I believe it would be condemned at any further election if the country had the opportunity of declaring its opinion upon it. But although it has been so condemned I do not gather that it has been renounced by leaders on either side of the House. I have listened to speeches, and I have read many speeches on the subject, and although the leaders of the Liberal Party have opposed this Bill on the ground that it is unsafe to the taxpayer, unjust to the tenant, and unfair, if not dishonest, to the constituencies of this country, yet I have not heard anything said which would be inconsistent with the re-introduction of another Bill providing an equal sum for a like object in the event of the Liberal Party being returned to power again. I think the position of right hon. Gentlemen below me, and especially of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, is logically unassailable. It is perfectly true the methods in the Bill, the withholding of local control over the disposition of local funds, are features that justify strenuous resistance even on the part of those who are prepared to support a wiser measure directed to the same purpose; but it is none the less true that our chance of successful resistance to this Bill is impaired, if not demolished, by the fear that even if the Bill were defeated defeat will be only the prelude to the introduction of another Bill on the same subject. Of course hon. Gentlemen opposite, who are indisposed towards the Bill, naturally say if it is certain that under any circumstances a Bill of this kind will be passed they prefer to trust it to their own leaders in whom they have confidence, rather than run the risk of the passing of a Bill introduced by their political opponents. Gentlemen on this side of the House may say to themselves that if such a Bill is to pass unquestionably it will be better to pass it at once rather than lead to the inevitable rupture of the Liberal Party in a future Parliament. So the inclinations of both sides have been enlisted in favour of the measure, not because it is a popular measure, indeed it is notoriously unpopular, but because the Front Benches on both sides having advocated or acquiesced in the principle private Members have accepted it as doom. Now I am not prepared to accept anything of the kind. I do not know what there is in the condition of Ireland that necessitates a Bill of this character. This measure has been advocated and supported in the country on the ground, or largely on the ground, that it is for the relief of persons in an impoverished condition. But the Bill will do nothing of the kind. This Bill will apply to the rich, the comfortable, the well-to-do tenants just as much, and indeed more, than it will apply to those in a humbler, poorer condition. We know from past experience of the Ashbourne Act that the comparatively well-to-do class of tenants have chiefly derived advantage from previous Acts passed with a similar purpose to this. The policy of the Bill is not compassionate; its policy is to confer benefit, by the manipulation of State credit, on landlord or tenant, or both, who shall agree to any purchase and sale of land in Ireland hereafter. In fact, the sale of land is regarded as in itself a transaction of such transcendent merit that the State on every such occasion interposes with the cash, to be haggled over and divided between landlord and tenant according to their several necessities, or skill in haggling. Now, the State credit is the common property of us all, and it diminishes in value in proportion to the obligations placed upon it. I should like to know if money is to be given to those dealing in land in Ireland without respect to their financial position, what answer can be given to similar demands made on behalf of England or Scotland. I might go further, and say, if the State credit is to be invoked in favour of private individuals and private transactions in land in Ireland, why should not State credit be usefully applied for the purpose of extending industries in this country, which might, by borrowing at 3 per cent., be largely developed, and provide more occupation for a portion of the people? This doctrine, this practice of advancing money, granting the use of State credit for the benefit of private individuals, is likely in time to lead to some startling conclusions. If it is to be allowed at all it ought to be applied in favour of the poorest part of the population. Now, this is not the policy of the Bill. Indeed the policy of the Bill is rather the reverse, for I maintain that the benefit will go rather to those who are well-to-do than to the poor, and that in precisely the proportion they are removed from poverty. The benefit granted by State credit is thrown as a matter of contention between landlord and tenant, and naturally the landlord will try to get as large a share as he can. The strong tenant will be able effectually to resist his landlord, and will succeed, no doubt, in getting the lion's share, but these are precisely the kind of men we do not require to assist. We require to assist the weak tenant—the man who is under arrears and in fear of eviction, or who, overwhelmed by his poverty, has already been converted into a caretaker, and is unable to contend successfully with his landlord. This is the man for whom this measure will do little. In other words this bonus granted by the State credit goes in very large part to the landlord, and that which goes to the tenant will be greatest in cases where the need is least, gradually diminishing to a vanishing point in the case of those who need the assistance most. That is a kind of inverted Socialism I have no sort of sympathy with myself. Another effect of the Bill will be to inflame the feeling against the Government—against any Government. The right hon. Gentleman himself referred to that. The right hon. Gentleman has intimated his opinion that there will be no ill-feeling created by evictions which will hereafter be undertaken by the Commissioners, because the people of each county will see that clearly the evictions are in the interest of those who are liable to contribute to the Guarantee Fund. But I cannot at all agree with the right hon. Gentleman in that view. Hitherto the feeling against evictions has been general, and this feeling will be transferred from the landlords to the Government, which takes the place of the landlords, for when, as must inevitably happen, either from poverty or bad seasons, ill-health, bad fortune, or a variety of reasons, individual tenants are unable to pay their rent, it will be the duty of the Government, in the interest of the inhabitants of the locality, to enforce rigidly their power of eviction, and the ill-blood and ill-feeling now entertained towards evicting landlords will be transferred to the heads of the Government. I would endeavour to reconcile myself to the Bill if I could see that it would really effect a settlement of the land difficulty even in those cases where it is applied, but I find it will do nothing of the kind. If we are to advance money from the Public Funds in order to aid transactions between landlords and tenants we ought at least to see that the slate is wiped quite clean; there ought to be no more relations between landlord, so that they may not harass and molest each other for the future. But it is quite possible, indeed most likely, that under this Bill, when the landlord has received the full amount he is to receive from the State he will still remain in the position of creditor, or second mortgagee. The Bill does not ask whether the terms between the landlord and tenant are fair, and the landlord may impose conditions upon the tenant which the interest of the tenant may compel him to accept, and when the tenant has paid all his instalments to the State he will require to pay other instalments due to his landlord, and the consequence may very well be that the landlord will use his power to sell up the tenant, take his stock, make him bankrupt, and effect a sale of his property. What sort of a settlement will that be of the land question? To one more point I desire to draw attention. It appears to me that this Bill, if it is largely applied, will produce some of the evils which were amended by the Bills of 1881 and 1887. The reason why these Bills, fixing fair rents, were passed into law was because, by a series of Reports by Royal Commissions, and by the authority of all economists, it was impossible to arrange in Ireland that contracts between landlord and tenant should be really free. The competition for land was so great that landlords were tempted to let their land to the highest bidder; and tenants, to secure the land, were tempted to offer more rent than they could really afford to pay. Now, I will suppose that, under this Bill, a large number of tenants, whose fair rents have been fixed, are allowed to become purchasers. I will take such a case as the Chief Secretary put, that of a man who pays a fair rent of £100 a year. Under this Bill, that tenant has his rent reduced to £68. It is true sub-letting is forbidden under the Act; but who supposes that sub-letting can be effectually prevented by a clause in any Act of Parliament? This tenant, whose fair rent is reduced from £100 to £68 under this Bill, may be able to let his land again for £110 or £120, and thereby turn himself into a sort of middleman; and you will have to do the same thing over again—pass another Bill fixing fair rents. This was pointed out in the Report of the Bessborough Commission a long time ago, and the danger is so apparent that I am surprised attention has not been called to it by some hon. Gentleman who favours the system. In fact, we shall be obliged again to legislate in a vicious circle. I cannot believe, although I do not question the philanthropic motives and intention of the Government in regard to this Bill, that these are the sole motives for the Bill. We have heard it stated in the country, although it has not been much referred to in the House, that the Act of 1881 was a great injustice to the landlords of Ireland. In his speech in the year 1883, in this House I think, the Chief Secretary practically said the same thing. That was one of the arguments with which, at that time consistently enough, he contended against the introduction of a system of land purchase. It has been regarded throughout the country that this Bill is introduced more in the interest of the landlords, and by way of compensation to them for the loss they sustained through the passing of the Act of 1881, than from any other motive.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member quotes from a speech of mine delivered a long time ago, the terms of which are not in my mind. If he imputes to me a suggestion that land purchase is introduced in order to compensate the landlords for something taken away from them by previous legislators, he is certainly mistaken.

*MR. R. T. REID: I have a recollection of the speech, but I have not read it recently. Practically it amounted to this, that a great wrong had been done to Irish landlords, that it was a very dangerous social experiment, and might be repeated in other parts of the kingdom. Certainly I will accept the right hon. Gentleman's denial at once, but I was under the impression then, and have been since, that he expressed an opinion that some reparation or compensation was due to landowners for their loss by the Act of 1881. There is one other point has been referred to by not a few speakers in former debates—the hope that the Bill will have the effect of tranquillising Ireland. Now, if I thought there was such a prospect, I would not oppose the Bill. What is the position of affairs in Ireland at the present time? You have the congested districts, and I firmly believe that this country will some time be obliged to spend a sum of money to relieve these congested districts. But you must treat them separately from the rest of Ireland; this Bill refers to the whole of Ireland. You have also some estates on which the relations between landlord and tenants—I will not now inquire by whose fault—have come to such a pass that there is no prospect of peace during the present generation. I fully agree that it might be desirable, probably would be, to take these particular estates and confer on some authority compulsory powers to expropriate the landlords, preventing scenes of turbulence and disorder in the future, and to do so on such terms as would deter landlords from forcing such a condition of things in the future. Beyond the congested districts and a few disturbed estates, there is nothing in the condition of Ireland to justify any demand for the indiscriminate purchase of land by the use of State credit. When the right hon. Gentleman introduced the Bill he gave us a long explanation, and he told us of a series of Reports by Commissions, but I do not think they amounted to what he understood them to be, authority for the introduction of any such Bill. There is nothing to warrant the introduction of an indiscriminate Purchase Bill for Ireland, unless, indeed, it is that rents in general are not at present fair. But that argument has not been advanced from the Treasury Bench, nor has the real reasons for the introduction of the Bill been explained. I do not know whether rents generally in Ireland are fair or not. If they are unfair the recommendations of the Cowper Commission should be carried out, and the period of judicial rents be fixed at five years, but if they are fair there is no sufficient reason for the Bill. I have no wish to interpose between any advantages that might be conferred fairly and legitimately by this House upon Irish tenants, but I maintain that the Bill will not confer benefits upon tenants so much as upon landlords, and even as far as it will confer benefits upon tenants, those benefits will be reaped by the wealthier tenants who do not need them, and not by the poor tenants. I know perfectly well that in the disorganised state of public affairs it may be difficult to prevent the Bill becoming law, but I feel so confident that it will not be a settlement of the land question, that in itself it contains the seeds of discord, that we are certain to hear again and again of this same Irish land question, and to have to pay more money for similar purposes, that I feel it my duty to oppose the Bill.

* (6.28.) Mr. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): It is perhaps only a Member representing an Irish constituency who has had practical experience of affairs in Ireland who can appreciate all the fallacies which have been put forth in the course of this Debate. The hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division in his Amendment charges the Government with using the forces of the Crown to carry out evictions for the non-payment of unjust rents. Now, I have just come from a distant part of Ireland, where pure accident took me, and I happened to be in the neighbourhood upon the last day of the evictions carried out upon the Olphert Estate, at Gweedore. More than a hundred tenants were evicted in three or four days. I arrived there on the last day, and gathered facts regarding 42 of those tenants. In 24 cases which I personally investigated the aggregate annual rent was £40. The total amount due on the decrees was £170, and the landlord offered to give those 24 men a full discharge on the payment of £31.

Mr. J. E. ELLIS: Were the rents judicial rents?

* Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: Mainly judicial, and these are what the hon. Member has called unjust rents. In the cases of 18 other tenants the annual rent was £47; the total amount due under the decrees was £186, and on the day on which those 18 men were evicted for non-payment they were in possession of 711 sheep, 111 head of cattle, and the crops of the whole year. On one man, who was arrested on a charge of murdering his wife, and who had 11 sheep and four head of cattle, his rent being only 16s. per annum, the police found in cash a sum of £8 17s. 6d. I want the House to appreciate at its true worth the charge that the Government of the country are lending the forces of the Crown to carry out evictions for unjust rents. I do not mean to say that there have not been unjust rents, or that there have not been evictions for unjust rents, but what I complain of is that hon. Members who go to Ireland, and tramp through bogs to the knees to witness evictions, take very little pains indeed to get at the actual facts of the situation they go to investigate. When a measure similar to the Bill now under discussion was before the House last Session, I spoke at considerable length upon the Motion for the Second Reading. I come from a part of the country where there is not the slightest difference of opinion as to the utility of land purchase. Anyone who knows anything of the Province of Ulster knows that there are only two opinions regarding land purchase in that province. There is a considerable party who are so enamoured of land purchase that they will be content with nothing less than a compulsory sale of the landlord's interest. That party is not a large one, but I have told them that they are doing what they can to impede the right hon. Gentleman in carrying land purchase. By far the greater number of the intelligent farmers of Ulster—and the small farmers are quite as intelligent as the large ones—are perfectly convinced as to the utility of land purchase; nay, more, they are persuaded that the future of Ireland, the future peace and prosperity of Ireland depends upon it. Therefore, in voting for the Second Reading of the Bill, I am acting not only with my own constituents at my back, but with the whole province of Ulster behind me. Now, the Chief Secretary has split his Bill of last year into two, and I frankly say I do not quite understand what he means by that process. The other night the right hon. Gentleman said it was designed to save time, that it was possible to get one portion of the Bill passed which will be complete in itself, while it might not be possible to get the other portion passed. I could quite understand that, but I find that in the first Bill the right hon. Gentleman makes the Land Commission a permanent body—a very proper thing to do—and that in the second Bill he proposes to create a Land Department. What does the right hon. Gentleman mean by making the Land Commission a permanent body, and then setting up a Land Department which must supersede the Land Commission? There is more that I do not like. I observe that the Chief Secretary has crowded into his second Bill a great many valuable provisions that were in his first Bill, everyone of those provisions being warmly supported by the tenants, and bitterly opposed by the landlords. Take the question of turbary, for example. Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to allow the first Bill to come into operation, and to leave the question of turbary as at present? If he is prepared to do that, he leaves the landlord still landlord of the bog, and free to exact from the tenant purchaser for turbary what he may think he has lost in the price of the land, and I maintain that that will be an improper situation to create. There is another question to which I desire to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman. The Government have given the Tithes Bill priority over the Land Purchase Bill; in other words they have given the Tithes Bill, which was within an ace of defeat last night if the Irish Members had come down from the Committee room in which they were assembled—they have given the Tithes Bill, which is not cared for by many of their own supporters, priority over the Land Purchase Bill, which is cared for. Is that precedence to be maintained after the Second Reading, and is the Land Bill to be caught in the toils of the Assisted Education Bill in the same way as it was caught last year in the toils of the Compensation to Publicans Bill? I will now deal with the alterations the Chief Secretary proposes to make, and will first of all take the question of the 20 years' limit. I am glad the right hon. Gentleman has left that out; I do not think it had any supporters in Ireland. The Chief Secretary is quite right in saying that a great many Ulster landlords object to it. Rightly or wrongly the Ulster landlords consider they ought to get more than 20 years purchase for their land, and they object to the tenant purchaser being forced to go to the money-lender or the gombeen man for the excess over the 20 years' purchase. The tenants of Ireland object to the 20 years' limit quite as much as the landlords do; for, no matter what may be said, if there is a limit in the Bill at all, an implied standard of value is set up, and therefore the tenants object to the 20 years' limit. I am glad that the limit has disappeared, and that the landlords and tenants will be able to fight the matter out. There is another alteration in the Bill which I thoroughly dislike, and I am bound to place it before the Chief Secretary. There was a most valuable practical clause in the Bill of last year which provided that where a landlord is willing to sell and the tenant is anxious to buy, but where they cannot come to terms as to the price, they may, with the consent of both parties, call in the Land Commission as arbitrator to decide the matter. That clause would have affected an enormous number of properties, because that is exactly the situation in a great many cases; the landlord would sell and the tenant would buy, but they cannot come to terms. The Bill of last year provided the machinery for bringing them together. The provision was violently opposed by the Irish landlords; it has disappeared from the Bill, and I greatly regret it. I now come to the vexed question of popular control, and I am glad to have the opportunity of stating clearly and explicitly what I think about it. We are proposing under this Bill to mortgage the property of a county, and I think the argument in favour of the county having the right to veto that mortgage is absolutely unassailable in logic. I am perfectly certain that if it were England or Scotland we were dealing with it would never be attempted to mortgage the property of a county without the consent of the county. But to give an Irish Local Authority control to veto the sales under this Act is a very serious operation indeed. The Local Authority will in the main consist of the farmers; that is to say, they will either be farmers themselves interested in the question or they will be men elected by farmers. Stripped of all rhetoric the proposal is simply to give the County Councils the power to fix the price of the land, and that is a proposal the House ought not to entertain. No man ought to be judge in his own case, and the Irish tenant farmers are no better than any other class of men. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dumfries (Mr. R. T. Reid) thought this Bill has been advocated to a large extent on false pretences. I candidly confess that I consider land purchase to be the instrument with which we are to defeat the hon. and learned Member in his designs upon Ireland. Does the hon. and learned Gentleman imagine that any sensible man would furnish his political opponent with a weapon which would undo the work he himself is doing? Upon the grounds I have stated it is perfectly impossible to place in the hands of the Local Authority the right to control or veto these sales, for they will either fix the price of the land or hamstring the

Mr. T. W. Russell

Act upon which the Government and the Unionist Party depend for the tranquillising and pacification of Ireland. There is a third reason why it should not be done. We have had some little experience in the matter of land purchase, and when hon. Members like the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division (Mr. J. E. Ellis) rise with information as to the tenants of the Duke of Leinster, the Marquess of Bath, and Lord Waterford wishing to get a change in the terms because of the bad season, I may put the matter in this way: The glebe tenants purchased 22 years ago—many of them at 28 years' purchase. They could not help purchasing under the Church Act, for which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was responsible. They had to purchase or go. What has happened? Notwithstanding that they purchased under the onerous condition of 28 years of the old unrevised rents, the glebe tenants have laboured to meet their engagements, and they have met them. Take the purchasers under the Budget Clauses, for which again the Front Opposition Bench were responsible. What have those purchasers done? Have they repudiated their engagements? Some of them purchased at 25 years of the old unrevised rents; they have honestly met their engagements, and are meeting them to-day. What has happened during the five years the Ashbourne Act has been in operation? We had it from the Chief Secretary yesterday that only £28,000 is in arrear. So we have had some experience of land purchase in Ireland. As I have more than once said, I believe a good deal of the agitation is a put-up job to deter the House of Commons from entering on the consideration of this Purchase Bill, and I believe the tenants of the Duke of Leinster, the Marquess of Bath, and Lord Waterford, know too well the bargain they have made to run any risk in the matter. In conclusion, I desire to say that, whilst I claim the right to criticise the Bill in detail, the Chief Secretary may rely upon my loyal support of the Bill. I have been told that this is a landlords' Bill. If it be a landlords' Bill, how comes it that the tenants of Ireland are clamouring for it? They have not been in the habit of clamouring for assistance for the landlords in the past. The tenants of Ireland are the hereditary foes of Irish landlordism, and I ask hon. Gentlemen who speak in the House of Commons with very little experience of Ireland to explain how it comes about that the most enthusiastic support of the Government in this matter comes from the tenants of Ireland.

*(6.50.) MR. J. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I think I can give at once a reply to the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell). He asks why it is that, if the Bill is unjust to the tenants, the tenants clamour for it. The answer is this: the British know that the intervention of tenants credit represents an enormous sum of money to be given to someone. They know, to their pain, that probably nine-tenths of that immense boon will be taken away by the landlords, yet, for the sake of the odd tenth that may come into their possession, they want the Bill. It appears to me, as one who has devoted some attention to the matter of land purchase in Ireland, that, next to its predecessor, which I admit was still more complex, this Bill is one of the most complicated measures ever laid before Parliament. Not only has the Bill itself to be mastered, but 14 Acts of Parliament to which it alludes have to be read along with it. The measure is one which may be best described as combining the most abstruse banking problems with the most abstruse legal phraseology. Its unparalleled complexity is proved by a mere recital of the different funds and accounts through which the money will have to pass. They are the land purchase account, the local taxation account, the guarantee deposit, the Guarantee Fund, the cash portion and the contingent portion of the Guarantee Fund, the Sinking Fund, the Reserve Fund, the County Percentage Fund, the Purchasers' Insurance Fund, and, lastly—to the present and future sorrow of the British taxpayer—the Consolidated Fund. Assuredly such an unprecedented measure should not have been placed in our hands with the expectation that we would master it in 48 hours. I object to the Bill because in my judgment it is an embodiment of the policy of the unjust steward in the parable. The Government know they will shortly have to give up their place, and so they are determined to transfer to their friends as much of their master's goods as possible. I think the Bill tells us pretty plainly why its predecessor was withdrawn. Mere decency caused the insertion of a limit of 20 years' purchase in the last Bill, but most of us know that the landlords—the friends of the Government—protested against that limit. They did not see why, when they had such a fine opportunity of dipping their hands into the Public Treasury, they should have any limit placed on the amount they could extract. In fact, the landlords were lukewarm about the last Bill because the Limitation Clause allowed them only to dip their arms up to the elbow in the Public Treasury, and they have now compelled the Government to bring in a Bill which will enable them to dip in their arms up to the shoulder. I should like the Government to give a categorical answer to the question why they have increased the advance to be made by the British taxpayer under the present measure as distinguished from the last Bill. I ask whether the security has increased since last February? The express contrary has been shown to be the case. Surely it does not add to the security of Irish land that a famine is expected to stalk through Ireland in a short time. Sound finance would have demanded that the right hon. Gentleman should have fixed the limit lower in the present Bill than in the last one. He has, however, actually withdrawn all limit whatever. In fact, he has done just the opposite of what every banker and financier would have done, as he has practically agreed to increase his advances in inverse ratio to the solvency of the tenants. Another ground on which I object to the Bill is that it needlessly and gratuitously gives as a present to one or two classes of men the benefit of the enormous money value produced by the interposition of British credit. Granting the most favourable supposition that all the tenants could actually borrow money at 5 per cent. for the purpose of making themselves proprietors of their holdings, and supposing they did so, and had to pay the money back at the end of 49 years, I would point out that the State, by stepping in and raising money for them at $2\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., will have saved them in interest alone the enormous sum of £307,000,000 on this one transaction of £43,000,000. The figures may seem surprising, but I think they will not be controverted. And yet the value of the whole fee-simple amounts to only £43,000,000. Then why should not the State reserve to itself at least £43,000,000 worth of this boon of over £300,000,000 by retaining the fee-simple of the land instead of giving it to the tenants? It must be remembered that the tenants would still have the benefit of the remaining £260,000,000 or so in the shape of reduced rents during the whole term. If we apply this calculation to the whole of Ireland—aye, and to Great Britain also—I think it will soon appear to everyone that, by the using of British credit, the nationalisation of the land can be accomplished with great advantage to the tenants, with full compensation to the landlords, and with great benefit to the country, which would receive the whole rents in perpetuity. But the force of the argument against the Bill is further increased by the well-known fact that the landlords will carry away such an enormous part of the boon conferred by British credit. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian during the Debate upon the former Bill last Session went fully into this demonstration, and showed that the landlord would be able to secure the lion's share of the benefit by simply increasing the purchase price. I remember that the Chancellor of the Exchequer replied to the right hon. Gentleman on that occasion, and he said that only when the tenants needed more to buy than the landlords needed to sell, such an increased purchase price would take place. But the right hon. Gentleman must know that in nearly all cases the landlord has not so much need to sell as the tenant has to buy. He must know very well that there is a great difference between the two. The landlord has not always process out against him, or the fear of eviction hanging over his head. It was in February last, I think, that the Chief Secretary made his remarkable eulogy of the advantages of voluntary purchase, because, he said, it would enable both of the parties to maintain what he called freedom of contract. An hon. Gentleman on that side of the House assured us there was no interference with freedom of contract so long as an alternative was offered. But the alternative which the landlord gives the tenant is something in the nature of that offered by the highwayman—money or life. The victim naturally prefers to part with his money. The landlord says to the tenant, "Give me my purchase price or be evicted and starve," and the tenant, if he can, pays the purchase price. That is the view of freedom of contract which the right hon. Gentleman offers to the Irish peasant. But there is another objection to the Bill, if possible, of a still graver character. It will be observed in the Bill that there is a careful avoidance of naming the limit of the amount to be granted. The two Ashbourne Acts contained an arithmetical limit; £5,000,000 were mentioned in each case. But this Bill mentions no limit of money. What does this mean? It simply means this: that the Government have reserved to themselves the power, even in the next Budget, of increasing the amount by simply voting an increase of the Imperial contributions to Ireland. The new loans are to be limited to 25 times the Imperial contributions to Ireland. That simply means that Imperial contributions may prove, and probably will prove, to be variable; and, if the landlords can make them steadily increase in amount, I want gentlemen on that Bench to tell us how we are going to prevent the lendings jumping from £30,000,000 to £60,000,000. It must be remembered that there would be no further need to apply to this or the other House. It may be said that no Government would ever do such a thing. But I say that at this moment the Government is in the act of doing it. In point of fact, the Chief Secretary boasted to us on Friday last that three years ago Ireland had none of these sums, and he is claiming to-day the hypothecation of them. We all know that one at least of those sums, £40,000 from Probate Duty, was actually given this year for the very purpose that it should be bottled up for five years in order that another £5,000,000 may be issued to the Irish landlords. I think, therefore, there is grave doubt about the object of the Government in leaving out of the Bill a statement of the exact pecuniary limits to which they intend to go. We surely must give the Treasury Bench the credit of knowing and feeling that no British taxpayer would ever knowingly incur an obligation to such an extent as that I suggest. What would happen? Supposing the £30,000,000 is exhausted, as the Ashbourne money is about done. Supposing this money were all urgently applied for and appropriated by needy Irish landlords. Supposing some noble Duke, a relative of a Member of the Government, wanted a million or so, would it not be very easy for him to persuade some Member of the Government, on the occasion of the next Budget, to give another £40,000 as a contribution to Ireland, in order that an odd million might be disposable to him? There is a noble Lord actually in that position at the present moment—Lord Ardilaun I mean, whom the Government promoted the other day to second the Address. The noble Lord's rent roll is about £7,000 a year, but he has only sold about one-sixteenth part of his property under the Ashbourne Acts. If we are to judge of his future action by his past, he still wants £130,000 of the British taxpayers' money in order to get rid of the rest of his unsaleable property. Now, suppose the £30,000,000 exhausted. I imagine that Lord Ardilaun could easily come forward and persuade the Government to make a suitable increase to the Imperial contributions. I hope, therefore, that the Chief Secretary, or some Member of the Government, will tell us whether there is to be any way of putting a limit to the money raised under this Bill. I will now take the briefest glance at the so-called securities which are said to be provided by this Bill. The first of them is the land itself. But the Chief Secretary has actually taken care to destroy the value of the land by a double system of over-valuing. In the first place, in order to determine the purchase price, he takes so many years' purchase of what is practically the gross instead of the net rent. If the rent of a farm is £100, he allows the landlord and the tenant to capitalise the gross rent, deducting only the local rates, and deducting nothing for outgoings of the landlord, such as land management and cost of collection, not to speak of arrears, which in many cases practically deprive the landlords of a great part of their income. The landlord has no right to capitalise those outgoings, and take the money out of the British Treasury, because they comprise no part of the income which he is able to retain and apply to his own use. This practice alone is sufficient to destroy the validity of the land as a banking security. But in the present condition of Ireland, I say that it is unsafe to take even the net rents for the purpose of capitalising them. The only safe basis is not the amount of any nominal rent which the tenant has marked down against him, but the actual amount of rent which he has been able to pay. For example, a man has a nominal rent of £10, and he has not been able to pay more than £5 for many years, because of the fall in agricultural values. In all such cases it is perfectly clear that by capitalising the rental of £10—at 20 years' purchase, £200—the Treasury is advancing really double the value of the land. We have never heard that land purchase prices in Ireland are based on the rents actually paid. Last Thursday or Friday I asked the Chief Secretary for information as to how many of the existing Ashbourne tenants had paid only part of their rents and how many arrears had been outstanding against them at the time of purchase, my object being to see how far the land had been over-capitalised; but the right hon. Gentleman refused the information, and he did so from what I regarded as extraordinary data. He said the Land Commissioners had no record from which that information could be supplied, and I asked him on the spot how it was possible that that body, whose duty it was to see that the land was of the full and proper value before the advance was made, could fairly discharge that duty if they did not know—not what the nominal rent was, but—the actual amount paid as rent before the purchase was arranged. Now, let me take the case of a tenant with a nominal rent of £10. Supposing he had to buy at 20 years' purchase, he would have to pay £200, although in point of fact he might never have paid more than £5 per annum in actual rent. Under this Bill the amount he will have to pay would be not £5 but £8 per annum, or, in other words, he will have to pay £3 more per annum than he was able to pay before he made the purchase, simply because the nominal rent will be capitalised in the purchase, and he has apparently never been asked as to the real rent he was able to extract from the land. We shall doubtless be told, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has already made a great point of this, that we have one great security, and that is what is called "the landlord's fifth." I believe, however, that the Chief Secretary will be one of the first to admit that, assuming the arrears to have been large, and assuming that in consequence the land has been over-valued to the extent of even 20 per cent., the landlord's fifth absolutely disappears from existence as a security—in fact, it never comes into existence at all. There are two other so-called securities that I will class with the landlord's fifth, namely, the county percentage and the tenants' insurance. In the case of all these three classes of securities the right hon. Gentleman first lends money, and then when he keeps back or gets back a small portion of it he gravely turns round and says he has excellent security for the large amount which remains unpaid. I do not think the Chief Secretary will deny that the Government are now doing what every other financier is refusing to do, namely, lending money for a long period on land at its present value, in a falling market, and with no margin left for depreciation. I ask the Government to say what preparations they have made against a further fall—say, of 25 per cent.—in agricultural values either in the present or in the far-off future, under a Bill which practically covers a century in its operation. I now come to the last point with which I will trouble the House. [Ironical cheers.] I wonder whether those behind the Treasury Bench will cheer when they have heard what I have to say? I have, naturally enough, reserved the most important point for the last, and I am sorry I do not see any financial Member of the Government present, because I am not aware whether I shall be fully understood by those who now occupy the Treasury Bench. My last point is, in my opinion, so important that although I have no right to detain the House much longer, I think hon. Members will pardon me when they hear what it is. It is neither more nor less than the pecuniary validity or otherwise of the Guarantee Fund itself. Hon. Members need not be alarmed, I am not going to analyse the details, or even to question what will happen when the particular items of this Fund are all impounded, when the roads in Ireland are allowed to go to pieces, when the pauper lunatics are set at large, and when the industrial school children are all starving. I am assuming that the money for these purposes is kept back and turned into hard cash for the benefit of the Fund in the way in which the right hon. Gentleman wants to see it done. But, first of all, I should remind the House of what the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary stated when bringing in the first Bill. He said—

"It was a mathematical impossibility that any loss could possibly fall on the British taxpayer :—" and he added that

"The deduction that the Treasury cannot suffer is not open to argument."

I propose to analyse this Fund, but before doing so I will take this opportunity of reminding the House of what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) said on the same occasion, because in the speech he has made to-night he slightly softened certain strong and clear and frank expressions which he had formerly used. The right hon. Gentleman, on the occasion referred to, admitted plainly and frankly that he only supported the Government because the Guarantee Fund had been absolutely proved by them to cover every halfpenny of the loans, so that no loss could possibly fall on the British tax-payer even in the event of total repudiation. That was the right hon. Gentleman's position, and I will now read two or three sentences from the speech he made on that occasion. He said—

"I say for the sake of this argument you have to assume that it would not be fair to rest upon the probabilities of the case. I have, in order to make my case good, to prove that the loss is impossible. It is not enough to say that it is so improbable as to be almost impossible."

The right hon. Gentleman added—

"Supposing that you have a general repudiation, you have in your hands sufficient resources to bring you home without the loss of a penny."

Now, what are the facts with regard to the amount of the Fund as compared with the liabilities that may have to be met? If you take the figures adduced by the Chief Secretary last year as to the principal amount of the money to be loaned to Ireland you will find that he put it at £43,000,000. Then we have to consider the interest. The right hon. Gentleman is going to create a land stock every year to pay the interest of $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. if he does not get the instalments in. Now, I take the total interest during 49 years on this £43,000,000 land stock, in the event of the instalments not coming in, and I find by a plain calculation that it amounts to £119,000,000, which added to the principal gives a total of £162,000,000 sterling. That is the actual amount of the land stock that would be in the possession of the public at the end of the 49th year, assuming the instalments not to be paid. Now we have to be brought home through the medium of this Guarantee Fund without the loss of a penny. What will the Guarantee Fund which is to be set off as a resource to meet this enormous liability consist of? I will take the Chief Secretary's own return, and assume his figures to be turned into hard cash. By this return he will have yearly in the shape of contributions, both of the cash and contingent portions of the Guarantee Fund, £1,169,000. The right hon. Gentleman takes 25 times that sum for the purpose of capitalising the Fund, and thus the annual instalments on the new loans will be equal to £1,169,000, and if the figures are sound that is a very natural principle; but I will show that the figures are unsound. I will go further than the right hon. Gentleman. I will increase the yearly income of his Fund from £1,169,000 to £1,200,000, I will give him 49 years' purchase of that income, and I will let him add compound interest at the rate of $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., which I admit he has a perfect right to do. What, then, would be the result? It is that mathematically there must be a deficit, and that that deficit may amount, in the event of the Ashbourne payments falling in speedily by redemption or sale from default, to £42,000,000, namely, the whole capitalised value of the land that he is operating upon. That is a direct statement, and I challenge a reply to it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian made a mild suggestion that it was possible some Members of the Treasury

Bench thought two and two made five. Now they have an easy way of showing me that I am in error. I am perfectly willing to show how I arrived at the conclusion I have stated. I have already referred to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham—a speech in which he staked his whole political consistency on the issue whether the Guarantee Fund was absolutely necessary to the loan. He said the issue was to be decided by the answer to the question whether this Bill imposed upon the British taxpayer a burden, or the risk of a burden; and he added, "If there is a fraction of a risk, then I am inconsistent in supporting this Bill." If the right hon. Gentleman were now in his place I would invite him to look at the calculations I have made, and when he had seen them I would demand of him respectfully that he should go into the Lobby against the Bill. This mistake is fatal to the whole character for accuracy of the Government, and it has happened simply because they have been so pressed by the landlords to get the control of an additional £10,000,000. Somehow or other, they forgot that whatever they re-lent of the Ashbourne moneys was destitute of guarantee. Is the Chief Secretary aware that the Guarantee Fund is so constructed that it only covers new money as distinct from the re-lending of the Ashbourne Act or any other money? Neither he nor his colleagues explained, when they asserted that the Guarantee Fund covered the liabilities created under the Bill, that the Ashbourne money being thrown into the vortex—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is arguing under a misapprehension. As the Bill was framed last year the Ashbourne money was to be re-lent with the assent of Parliament. As the Bill is now drafted the Ashbourne money cannot be re-lent.

*MR. KEAY: Then the right hon. Gentleman says that that money cannot be re-lent. I am not an expert in legal phraseology, but I certainly think that Clause 6, Sub-section 3, covers the re-lending of the Ashbourne money. This is an extremely important point.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is quite in error. There is nothing in the section which authorises, or appears to authorise, the re-issue of that money.

*MR. KEAY: Of course, I am not speaking of any mere ear-marking of that particular money, but of the use of the Fund of which it forms part. Still, I fail to understand the right hon. Gentleman when he says there is nothing which enables the Ashbourne money to be re-issued. I am delighted with the assurance.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have given it in the most categorical manner.

*MR. KEAY: The right hon. Gentleman said it was not in the Bill. I take that as equivalent to the assurance it is not to be re-lent. In that case the Guarantee Fund will hold water for the original advances. But what is the meaning of the excess money to be lent to the county?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Under the Bill as it stands, money is to be lent up to 25 years' purchase of the Guarantee Fund. With the accumulation of the Sinking Fund, by which the loans are to be paid off, further advances may be made, equivalent to the amount of the Sinking Fund. Therefore, necessarily, the liabilities of the counties will always be covered.

*MR. KEAY: Will not that be the re-lending of the Ashbourne money, which is now being paid into the Sinking Fund, as far as the principal is concerned?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; the Ashbourne Acts are left precisely as they are, with this exception with respect to further advances. This Bill only deals in the future with advances on guaranteed land stock; that guaranteed land stock is to be covered by the Guarantee Fund; and any further issue of guaranteed stock beyond the 21 years' purchase is to be covered by the amount of the Sinking Fund.

*MR. KEAY: I certainly cannot say I understand that in a financial sense. As long as there is no Sinking Fund in the Ashbourne Acts, and provision is now made for making one, I cannot see how the Ashbourne money is to be kept from being re-lent. The right hon. Gentleman would have conferred a great favour on the House if he had alluded to the point in his speech, and made it clear that he has taken away the power of re-lending this £10,000,000, which form the capital of the Ashbourne Acts. I do not think I need further detain the House. I have attempted to raise what I believe to be a most serious point, and I can only now thank hon. Members for the indulgence they have extended to me.

*(7.45.) MR. R. B. HALDANE (Haddington): Whether or not we agree with the criticisms of the last speaker, we must all feel it is of great importance that such criticisms should be applied to the details of a Bill of this magnitude. I should not have risen to address the House had it not been for a note which struck me most forcibly in the speech of the hon. Member for Dumfries. I feel that that speech marked a new point in the attitude, not of the leaders of the Liberal Party, but of a large proportion of those who support the Liberal Leaders in the House, on the general question of land purchase. My hon. Friend complained of a want of thorough repudiation on the part of the official leaders of the Liberal Party of the general principle which underlay the Government measure. As I understood him, and as I understood the speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth, the objection of my hon. Friend and some other hon. Members of the Opposition side is to the principle of employing British credit for the benefit of the Irish landlords. It is important that the House should note that this marks a new period in the history, at any rate, of a large section of the Liberal Party towards land purchase. The Liberal Party were land purchasers when the Bright Clauses were first discussed in 1870; again in 1881, 1884, 1885, when no opposition was offered to the principle of the Ashbourne Act; in 1886, when the Liberal Party brought forward a Land Purchase Bill, which, considering the difficulties of the time and the opposition encountered, displayed an amount of courage for which the leaders of the Liberal Party will be remembered in history. They are land purchasers, so far as their leaders are concerned, to-day, and there is no stronger land purchaser than my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle, as was evidenced by his speech at Swindon the other day. But new difficulties have now been placed in the way of those who believe in this principle. It is not long since the Liberal Party were in a position to discuss the question of land purchase on the basis that the objection to any scheme which the Conservative Government might bring forward was that there was no central representative National Authority to stand as a buffer between the Imperial Exchequer and the Irish tenant. But the present objections go far beyond that, and my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries and others now object to the general principle of the State intervening for the benefit of the Irish tenant or the Irish landlord. I should like to understand the principle on which that opposition is based. I could understand it well coming from those who take a wider view of the land question. It may be that it is wrong to do anything to further recognise the private tenure of land or the creation of a peasant proprietary. It may be from the point of view of land nationalisation that it is wrong to bring forward any scheme of land purchase in any circumstances, but that is not the attitude of the hon. Member for Dumfries and some other hon. Members who think with him. Those hon. Gentlemen are in favour of allotments, leasehold enfranchisement, and the recognition of private property in land. It is not enough for them to say it is only a question of the circumstances of Ireland. Are they prepared to come forward and say that the Irish landlords have so conducted themselves that the State ought not to interfere on their behalf? There may well be some truth in the general charge against Irish landlords. The Irish landlords have been responsible for a good deal in the past, but this is not the occasion on which to condemn them. In considering the question of land purchase the House has nothing to do with the conduct of the Irish landlords. They are entitled to justice, just as much as any other section of the community. If it be right otherwise, if it be proper or part of our policy to bring forward a measure of land purchase, then the mere fact that the Irish landlords have behaved ever so badly cannot affect the propriety of that policy. It is no fault of the Irish Nationalist Party that they are not able to deal with the question of the land without a certain amount of prejudice against the Irish landlord faction. I do not think it is fair to ask the Representatives of the Irish nation sitting in an Irish Parliament to take upon themselves the responsibility of dealing with this question. It seems to me, therefore, that up to this point there has been a certain amount of community of purpose between the policy of the Government and the policy of the leaders of the Liberal Party. We are strong Home Rulers, and continue to be so. We are not to be shaken or affected in the slightest degree by temporary difficulties which may have arisen at this or any particular moment. But it has been part of our policy, and I believe it still to be part of the policy of many of us, to accompany the settlement of the difficulty with regard to Irish government with a settlement of the land question. We believe that by taking that course we can make Home Rule work smoothly, and, therefore, we find ourselves to a certain degree at the same point of view as the Government. I know that at the present moment the Government are opposed to Home Rule. They hold, however, it is essential that the Irish land question should at once be dealt with. I agree with them, and I believe we should approach the subject not on a mere ordinary Party basis, but that we should deal with it with the united skill of both Political Parties. I am far from pretending that I think this is a good Bill. It seems to me to be defective in a leading characteristic. But I find myself brought face to face with this question, "What is the alternative to the rejection of this Bill?" And the question must now be answered with little hesitation. It is to have no Imperial measure of land purchase at all. I believe that if the Bill of 1886 had been carried there might have been a settlement of this question, and we should have been saved from the necessity of grappling with it this year. As a Member of the Liberal Party I am unable to see any prospect of carrying a measure of land purchase, which, in my judgment, forms a most important part of any scheme for the Government of Ireland. But there is this great defect in the Bill. There is no suggestion of even adequate local authority being interposed between the Irish tenants and the State. On the other hand, there are certain considerations which reconcile me to what otherwise would be a more weighty objection. It seems to me, from a consideration of the framing of this Bill, that there is nothing in it to prevent us or any other Party, should an Irish Legislative Body be established in Dublin, from tacking on the interposition of such a body to the scheme of land purchase. But, after all, this is largely a question of the machinery of the Bill. The Bill takes the principle of the Ashbourne Act that extends and improves it. Taking the Bill as it stands, there is much in it which seems to me to point to an improvement in the general machinery of the scheme which differentiates it for the better from the machinery of the Ashbourne Acts. For example, there is the provision of 80 per cent. for the first five years. Then, again, you seem to have made a distinct step forward in the scheme of the measure, because it will be possible for the Irish tenant to discount the future bad times by paying in advance, and the provision is improved by the clause as it comes this Session before us enabling the Lord Lieutenant still further to extend the period during which the 80 per cent. is to be payable. That provision seems to me to be one which ought, at all events, to lead those who are considering the Bill favourably readily to the belief that the Government are in earnest in trying to make the best of this part of their machinery. Then there is another improvement, the limitation of purchasing powers to resident occupiers, which not only gives relief to the class who want it, but to some extent, at all events, gets rid of the objection that a large and indefinite sum will be required before a large and complete system of land purchase can be carried out. We have heard from a Representative of the Government to-night that not more than the £95,000,000 mentioned by the responsible Representative of the Government will be required. A complete system of land purchase which would give the fee-simple to all occupiers would require provision to be made for the expenditure of that sum. On this point you have got a calculation put forward in a simple fashion, and have got away from the very large figure you had to deal with before. Taking it at a sum very much short of £95,000,000, which will be constantly used, over and over again, for carrying out land purchase, it seems to me that you have got as near as you can get, in the absence of the interposition of an Irish Executive, to getting rid of material risk to the British taxpayer. There is theoretical risk, and we ought to be prepared to run that, at least, for the purpose of getting rid of a great evil.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): No, no.

*MR. HALDANE: The hon. Member for Northampton dissents from that, but I think we owe a debt to the Irish Representatives and to the Irish people in this respect.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Where are the Irish Representatives?

*MR. HALDANE: I think the Irish Representatives have good cause to complain of the extent to which people in this country in the past have been responsible for the acute state of feeling that separates the Irish landlords from the Irish tenants, and with that in view I am prepared to run not only theoretical risk, but to a certain point substantial risk for the purpose of obtaining a settlement of the land question. And it is because I believe that the Bill has gone as far as it is possible to go in the absence of a Home Rule scheme, and as far as we are likely to go with or without such a scheme—having in view the protection of the British taxpayer—that I shall support the Second Reading of the Bill. The hon. Member for Dumfries holds that this is not a Bill for the relief of impoverished tenants. To my mind that is one of its advantages. We do not want a Bill for the relief of impoverished tenants. We do not want a Bill for the purpose of putting paupers again on these lands. What we want is to take the honest, industrious, and solvent tenants and put them into the position of owners. What we are here to do is to solve a problem which we have hitherto succeeded in dealing with only very inefficiently; because I do not believe anyone, however sanguine, will say that the Land Act of 1870, or even that of 1881, or even, for that matter, the Act of 1887, can be looked upon as anything like a solution of the Irish land question. For the first time we are face to face with a scheme which, at any rate, attempts to grapple with the question radically and thoroughly; and whilst regretting that I should give a vote which may seem to separate me from those with whom I habitually vote, I am bound to do so on the present occasion. It is all very well for those of influence and authority in the councils of the Liberal Party to stand upon a principle like this; but within the ranks there are those who have set themselves against the recognition of the principle in any shape or form. It follows, then, that those who take a different view must set their faces against opposition to that principle, and, holding that view, I for one feel myself compelled to give a vote for the Second Reading of the Bill. It is not because I have the slightest misgivings about the general policy of the Liberal Party with regard to Ireland, but because I think this Bill will assist us, and assist us materially, in paving the way towards a solution of the Irish question, which will proceed on lines infinitely wider than any that have been placed before the country by Her Majesty's Government. (8.10.)

*(8.43.) MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.): I am sure many of us, on this side of the House, have listened with great pleasure to some of the remarks which fell from the last speaker. This, he says, is the first time we have found ourselves face to face with a great measure dealing thoroughly with the great Irish land question, and, no doubt, it is pleasing to us to have such a recognition from a distinguished lawyer opposite. At the same time, the hon. and learned Gentleman went on to refer to the changes made in the Bill this Session as compared with the Bill of last Session, and said these changes were very important. Now we have the Chief Secretary telling us that the changes are unimportant, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has told us the same thing. I am glad, however, to find that the hon. Member for Haddington finds the changes important, because these, perhaps, have enabled him more easily to come round to the support of the Bill, though he voted against the Bill last Session. Further, as a reason which seemed to weigh with him, he said it would not be fair to ask Irish Members to deal with this question of land in an Irish Parliament. On that matter I think he may set his mind at rest, for I can assure him that there is no possibility of Irish Members, for a long time being asked to deal with this or any other question in an Irish Parliament. Again, the hon. Member, referring to the British taxpayers, said we owe a debt to the Irish Party, and then the hon. Member for Northampton called out, "Where are they?" Now I do not know where the Irish Parliamentary Party are at this moment, but I can tell the hon. Gentleman where they were on Thursday last, they were here, voting in favour of the First Reading of this Bill. [An hon. MEMBER: No, walked out.] I think I am correct in saying that a large majority of the Parnellite Party voted in favour of the First Reading. The hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermonth (Sir W. Lawson) cheered the remark of the last speaker, that Irish landlords have their rights, but, if I recollect, in the course of the Debate on the First Reading, the hon. Baronet told us, that Irish landlords, or landlords in general, were of no value whatever. Now, those people who have no value, perform no duties, and those who perform no duties, can have no rights, so that the hon. Baronet is scarcely consistent. Then we had some remarks of a highly metaphysical character in a speech from the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Reed), a speech so metaphysical that I was unable to understand almost any part of it—metaphysical, I mean, in the sense of that definition of metaphysics which says, "When one man is explaining a subject of which he knows nothing to another man who does not understand him; then that is metaphysics." I did, however, understand the hon. and learned Member to say he would support the Bill, if it would create good feeling between landlords and tenants. On that point I can set his mind at rest, and assure him that good feeling will result. Furthermore if the Bill operates largely, it will extinguish the relations between landlord and tenant, the latter by purchase of their holdings becoming owners. Argument has been exhausted on the principle of the Bill, and I would not have intervened in this Debate were it not that the comparative silence of the Ulster Representatives on the Second Reading last Session has been misinterpreted in some quarters, and it has been alleged that Ulster is very cold in regard to the measure. Now, I can assure the House that that is a complete misapprehension, and that not only Ulster but the whole of Ireland is strongly in favour of this Bill. If ever Ireland was united on any subject, it is on this. Last Session we had much opposition from Irish Members, speaking, as they said, the minds of their constituents. But they are met by a dilemma, for if they represented the feeling of their constituents then, they could not have done so last week when they supported the Bill, unless there has been such a revolution of opinion as would be rare, even in Irish politics. I can speak particularly of one Home Rule county, the County Donegal, and I can state positively that in all parts of that county there is a strong feeling in favour of this Bill. There are, no doubt, many persons who desire to see the principle of compulsory sale introduced. But the working of any such principle is surrounded by immense difficulties. We are told there is nothing an Irishman hates so much as coercion, and I think the real meaning of coercion, is not an Act preventing a man from doing what he wants to do, but rather an Act compelling him to do something he does not want to do. Certainly, the principle of compulsion, as applied to the sale and purchase of land, should only be adopted as the very last resource, after all other methods have failed. If landlords were compelled to sell, tenants would have also to be compelled to buy. This would be coercion of the most objectionable kind, and would certainly give the purchasers some excuse for subsequently refusing to pay their instalments. In connection with a system of compulsory sale there comes the difficulty of fixing the price. We know that where there is a difficulty in getting persons to agree upon a price, then the price must be arbitrarily fixed for them, and for this, a tribunal must be established, and the decision of that tribunal will be sure to cause dissatisfaction either to buyer or seller, or to both. There are some people in Ireland who are in favour of compulsory sale as applied to landlords, because they desire to inflict punishment upon landlords. There are some who would prefer compulsory sale voluntary sale, and would apply compulsion at once. With regard to the character of landlords we have heard much for and against. On either side hon. Members have spoken of Irish landlords in terms of the highest praise; but we have also heard them referred to, from the other side of the House as if they were the foulest wretches that ever cumbered the earth. Anyone who knows Irish landlords, and will judge from personal knowledge, will come to the conclusion that as a class they are a fair, an honourable, an upright, and, on the whole, a generous body of men. It is perfectly true that in the past, on some estates bad, tyrannical, and cruel things have been done; but they were done—and I speak from personal knowledge not small—in nearly every instance, not by the landlords, or with the knowledge of landlords, but by bailiffs and underlings connected with the management of the estate, so that those who now desire compulsory sale as a retaliatory measure against Irish landlords, would not, if they accomplished their desire, inflict punishment on the actual wrongdoers. It is admitted, that the agents or bailiffs are answerable for most of the cruel acts done to tenants, and vengeance in the shape of compulsory sale cannot reach them. Others desire compulsory sale because they believe that landlords will not be willing to sell. To these gentlemen I may fairly say, give the landlords a trial before you condemn them, give them the chance of showing what they will do. It seems to me that landlords, considering their position, would be very likely to sell, because in the proper sense of the term there is no such thing as a landlord in Ireland at all; the Irish landlords are nothing more than rent-chargers. Elsewhere landlords have rights and powers; but an Irish landlord would be treated as a trespasser if he went on the property called his own. He simply has a rent-charge upon that property. Now, when we have a rent-charger whose security is said not to be very good, surely he will be very glad to get rid of his rent-charge if he can get good terms. Therefore, it seems to me, there can hardly be a doubt, but that the landlords would be extremely glad to sell if the opportunity be given to them, and compulsion should not be used, nor will it be desired, except for purposes of revenge, until every other method has been tried. Of course, the dual ownership that does exist, and with which this Bill tries to deal, has been largely created by legislation of recent years. In many instances, this is an evil, but at the same time, while this dual ownership exists it must be dealt with, and I think this Bill deals with it in a broad and thorough fashion. But furthermore, this Bill takes into account that which every attempt at legislation for Ireland ought to take into account, namely, that in this, as in almost everything else, there is not one Ireland but two. There are certainly two Irelands in regard to the manner in which the country is populated—that is to say, there are the uncongested and the congested Irelands. Any Bill of any kind that has ignored the existence of two Irelands has failed, and had not this Bill taken that fact into account it would have been incomplete from every point of view. The hon. Baronet the Member for Cocker-mouth (Sir W. Lawson) said the other night that Unionist speakers boasted that the Irish tenant had better terms than any other tenant in the world, therefore why aid him further? It is true that he has better terms than any other tenant, but it is also true that he is more dependent on agriculture than any other tenant. His case is peculiar, and he requires to have more done for him than any other tenant in the world. The hon. Baronet also asked why, if Unionist speakers are right, in declaring that Ireland is peaceful and contented, anything more should be done for her. The hon. Baronet's argument is that because Ireland is peaceful and contented nothing should be given to her. The logical conclusion is that if Ireland were discontented and turbulent, everything should be given her. No doubt it has been the policy of Liberal Governments in the past to give to turbulence and riot what they would not give to a peaceful people. On the other hand, Tory Governments always consistently refuse to yield anything to turbulence and riot, though they are ready to give to peaceful and law-abiding men. It has been asked "Why was not this Bill brought in two or three years ago?" It was because Ireland was not peaceful at that time, and the present Government said, "When Ireland becomes peaceful we will deal with Ireland generously, and, if possible, more than generously." The hon. Baronet condemned a statement by the Earl of Derby that his chief reason for supporting this Bill was that the Irish Members were against it, therefore the hon. Baronet says in substance that one ought to vote, not against the Irish Members, but with them. If so, then in the present case the hon. Baronet is doing the very thing he condemns the Earl of Derby for doing, because he is voting against the distinct action of the great majority of the Parnellite Members, who supported the Bill on Thursday last. The hon. Baronet asked, "What is the use of a landlord?" and, in order to prove the uselessness of landlords, gave himself as an instance. The question whether or not the hon. Baronet is useless is more within the knowledge of the hon. Baronet than within my knowledge, and, therefore, I shall not attempt to controvert what the hon. Baronet said about himself; but, even granting that English landlords are useless, Irish landlords stand on a different footing. The complaint of the hon. Baronet against landlords was that "they toiled not neither did they spin."

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cocker-mouth): May I say that was a quotation from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain.)

*MR. RENTOUL: Well, the Member for Birmingham was not the originator of the language. The Member for Birmingham used the words, and the Member for Cocker-mouth quoted them, either second-hand from the Member for Birmingham or first-hand from the original source. But, to continue my argument, the Irish landlords stand on a totally different footing. Three-fourths of them have purchased their estates under the Encumbered Estates Act of 1849, and paid cash down. That money was evidently earned by somebody who did both toil and spin. A strong charge was made last Session by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for West Cavan (Mr. Knox) against the Chief Secretary, that he does not consult with the Irish Representatives, but treats them as "mere Irishmen." I do not think that the Chief Secretary has ever done anything of the kind. If my right hon. Friend ignored Irish opinion, or contemptuously treated Irishmen on every occasion, I myself am just enough of an Irishman to be sorry for it, and to resent it. But I think I did see a right hon. Gentleman opposite treating the Irish as mere Irish, and an Irish Member as a school boy on one occasion, for when the hon. Member for West Cavan commenced his speech that night, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) went and sat at the end of the second Opposition Bench above the Gangway, and put his hand to his ear and gazed into the face of the hon. and learned Member with an amount of attention I have never seen exactly equalled except by Mr. Toole when playing Paul Pry. It was evident the right hon. Gentleman left his place in order to show the hon. Member for West Cavan that he did not treat him as a "mere Irishman," but as a very important personage on that side of the House. It was evident that the right hon. Gentleman's spirit was very willing to compliment the hon. and learned Member for West Cavan, but, unfortunately, the flesh was weak, for the right hon. Gentleman yawned 18 times during the speech. Now if that is treating a man as anything else than "a mere Irishman"—and as a very poor type of an Irishman, one who is easily flattered—I cannot understand what such treatment is. I trust no right hon. Gentleman sitting on the Front Bench on this side of the House will ever offer to treat me in such a way. Now as to this Bill being a pledging of British credit, those who are most familiar with the question declare that there is no risk to British credit whatever. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian asked in this connection with great solemnity, whether any Member on this side, in good faith and openly, would assert that two and two made five. Of course no Member on this side of the House took up that challenge. No Member on this side of the House would assert anything of the kind, because we know, that figures never lie—though we know that under skilful manipulation they may be induced to prevaricate to an extent that almost answers the purpose—and there are certain gentlemen, on the other side of the House who are able to deal with figures in a masterly manner. There are also some Gentlemen—notably the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian—who always have to explain every speech they make, on this or on any other question—reminding one of the man who, when he wrote a letter, delivered it himself in order that he might read it to the person for whom it was intended, no one but the writer himself being able to read it. Now as to British credit, even supposing that it were necessary to risk it to some extent, all Parties on every side of the House have over and over again asserted that this country owes a deep debt to Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian stated that hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House obtained their seats at the election of 1886, on the distinct understanding that they would not risk British credit. Well, since the vote on this Bill last Session, the constituencies have had ample opportunity of speaking out on that subject; yet what constituency has spoken out against the vote of its Member even supposing there was an understanding of that sort in 1886, which we entirely deny? [Opposition cries of "Eccles."] Every one knows that Eccles was won upon the eight hours question, and therefore that election proved nothing with regard to the Irish question or to an Irish Land Bill.

(9.15.) Mr. LABOUCHERE: The hon. Member has blamed a Member on this side of the House because he spoke to him metaphysically. He said his intelligence was not sufficiently great to enable him to understand my metaphysical friend. Well, I am bound to say for myself that my intelligence has not been sufficiently great to enable me to understand a great deal that fell from hon. Gentlemen opposite. The hon. Member commenced by saying that he would put to us a series of dilemmas. I was puzzled to see where they were, and I confess I am not disposed to take the slightest trouble to get out of one of them.

*MR. RENTOUL: I said one single dilemma.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Well, "one single dilemma" is quite enough. As if we had not had enough speeches this Session, he fell back on last Session, and said he was in favour of the Bill because the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Cork had made a speech last year in the House, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian had yawned 18 times during that speech. The hon. Member said we were given to repetition and were not in the habit of producing new arguments. If what I have repeated from him is a specimen of the new arguments that hon. Members opposite are going to submit to the House in support of this Bill, I confess I should prefer even the repetition of an old argument, for greater nonsense, I can assure the hon. Member, I never listened to in my life. The hon. Member seems to suppose that an Orange Member is to be taken as an exponent of public opinion throughout Ireland, and having done that he comes forward to defend the landlords. I could not help thinking that if the landlords of Ireland could have heard the hon. Member, they would have said, "Preserve us from our friends." What did he say? He declared that on a vast number of estates horrible things are done.

*MR. RENTOUL: Were done.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I do not know where "were" ends and "are" begins, but we will take it either way. What was the explanation of this advocate of the landlords? Why, that the landlords were the best and noblest of human beings. They lived away from their estates, had bailiffs representing them to bully the miserable tenants and get all the money they could from them, which money the landlords were to spend elsewhere, and if anything wrong was charged against them, they were to say, "Oh, it is only the act of my bailiff." That was exactly the position taken up by the slave owners in the Southern States of America in the old slave-owning days. If anything went wrong the blame was laid at the door of the overseer, who was replaced by another person whose doings were precisely similar to those of his predecessor. The hon. Member asked why the electors have not protested if his Friends opposite have not fulfilled their pledges. Well, the electors are only longing for an opportunity to protest. They are asking every day for a General Election. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite may laugh, but they take very good care only to laugh here, and not risk a General Election. The hon. Member says that the Eccles election was not a protest on the part of the constituency, because it was won upon the eight hours question. What does he know about the eight hours question? All I know is that there was a supporter of the Government on one side and a gentleman who avowed himself as our ally—and an opponent of this Bill—on the other, and that the latter was returned by a large majority, the seat having formerly been held by a supporter of the Government. Let the hon. Member remember the number of followers the Government possessed at the commencement of this Parliament, and let him count them now. I think he will observe in the result some sort of a reply from the electors. The number of his friends has materially reduced, and it will be much more reduced when we have what we ask for, that is an appeal to the country. I have heard a speech on this side of the House in favour of the Bill from a Gentleman (Mr. Haldane) who has not even the excuse of being a Liberal Unionist. The hon. and learned Member for Haddington has said that he is a theoretical financier, and that we ought to incur risks. For my own part, I think that if the hon. Member had been in business and had tried to carry out his theoretical finance he would have been ruined long ago. The hon. and learned Member has given a curious reason for voting for the Bill. He does not think that it is a good Bill, in fact he thinks it is rather a bad Bill, but he says that he will vote for it on the ground that any Bill is better than no Bill. Then the hon. and learned Member has said that a Land Bill ought to accompany a Home Rule Bill. But where is the Home Rule Bill? The hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell), on the other hand, is going to vote for the Bill on the ground that it will prevent Home Rule. There seems to be a curious diversity of opinion among the supporters of the Bill. A has been said by my hon. Friend that we have nothing to do with the conduct of the Irish landlords and that we ought to do justice to them. I agree with that; I should like to do justice to them, but what is proposed is to make them a vast present. That is not justice to them, but injustice to the British taxpayer. There is nothing in this Bill to show that the occupier will become the owner of the land, because there is nothing in it to prevent the tenant from going somewhere else as soon as the advance has been made. I gather from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), and the speech of the Chief Secretary, that all sorts of concessions and bargains are being made. There is, I understand, a concession being made to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley), another to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, and another to the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). Well, you may make what concessions you like, but as far as I am concerned you will not lead me to abate my opposition to the Bill. I object to the principle of the Bill, and to every line and every word of the Bill. I consider that in bringing forward this measure the Government are acting ultra vires, and that the Bill, judged on its merits, is giving effect to utterly erroneous principles. We are told that the guarantee is merely a nominal and not a real one, but I deny that there is any such thing as a nominal guarantee. What do you do? You issue a quantity of Consols—£33,000,000 of Consols at $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. interest. You guarantee the interest and that is why people take them, but the persons who take them would not dream of doing so simply on the guarantee of those Irish estates. The question is what is the price at which any Irish proprietor could get money on interest? There is no doubt about the fact that Irish proprietors had to pay 5 per cent. at a time when money could be obtained in the English market at 4 per cent., and yet you tell us that we are incurring no risk in lending money at $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. almost without any margin, at a time when the Insurance Companies, knowing that the risk with a large margin on Irish land is so great, are demanding 5 per cent. for loans on Irish land. We know something about guarantees. It was only the other day that the eminent firm of Barings wanted to get money from the Bank of England. The name of that eminent firm is certainly as sound as that unfortunate Tipperary peasant occupying two acres of land, but the Bank of England said, "No, we cannot lend you the money without some solid guarantee," and the result was that they got a number of big houses in England and Scotland to unite in guaranteeing the £17,000,000 which was advanced to Messrs Baring, and yet one of those who aided in this transaction comes to this House, in conjunction with his right hon. Colleagues, and says there is no sort of risk to be incurred in lending the money asked for on this Irish security. Well, Sir, what is it that we are asked to guarantee? It is that these Irish occupiers who are to purchase the land will be able to pay the interest on the money advanced, and further in a given number of years to pay back the capital. Now let me put it in this way. Suppose you had done this 15 years ago. Land especially in Ireland has fallen enormously in value since that time. If you had made such advances on the basis of land value prevalent 15 years ago, it is absolutely clear that the tenants would not be able to make the repayments now. How then can you say we have no risk to incur when you do not know that land which has largely fallen in value during the past 15 years will not sustain an equal fall in value during the next 15 years? The tenants have not paid because they could not pay, but even supposing they could pay is there anything like certainty that they would pay? We have proof that the tenants have in many cases been bullied into these bargains, and in all probability they will again be bullied by the landlords into similar bargains. There seems to be a sort of prejudice against the payment of rent in Ireland, and if Irishmen have anything like a fair and reasonable excuse for demanding reduction of rent they make that demand. Is it to be supposed that they will be more enamoured of the payment of rent when the owner of the land is the alien Government of England? We are told that everybody paid who purchased under the Ashbourne Act. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland urged that as evidence that they would always pay; but, unfortunately for his argument, we have evidence that they have not always paid under that Act. There is evidence that on the Duke of Leinster's estate large farmers—not mere paupers—have been agitating against these payments, and saying they are not able to pay. The hon. Gentleman the Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) has said the glebe purchasers paid. That may be so, but last year we did not have to fall back on the glebe purchasers. The Government brought forward the Ashbourne purchasers, and asked us to pass the measure they proposed because the purchasers did not complain; whereas now they ask us to pass this measure because they do complain. It does not seem to signify whether they complain or not, or whether they pay or not. The Government want this Bill passed, and will do everything they possibly can to secure its passage. We are told that, supposing the Irish purchasers are not able to pay, and we may not be able to evict them, we shall still have ample cover. Now, let hon. Members see what this wonderful cover is. In the first place, there is a guarantee fund—a fund of £40,000 per annum, which is only to be paid to a special guarantee for five years, when it will amount to £200,000; besides this there is the Irish share of the Probate Duties. I ask the Government—do they mean to say that these two guarantees are sufficient for £33,000,000?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: There is the landlord's fifth.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Yes, but that is cut out. The Treasury will decide as to that. It has to lay down rules.

MR. J. MORLEY: You are mistaken.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I am afraid my right hon. Friend has not looked at the Bill. All I can say is that I have read the Bill, and we are told that everything is in this Bill. If I am mistaken, I am mistaken in my knowledge of the English language. There is the Bill and the clause referred to; and I would beg the right hon. Gentleman to read it himself. That is what is called the guarantee. After that there are certain contingent guarantees. Well, what are they? It will be seen that we give Votes in aid, we pay a certain sum for lunatics in Ireland, and certain other sums for schools for medical officers of workhouses and dispensaries, and also for industrial schools. We are told that we should be able to retain this money, that if we cannot get back our advances we are to call on the Lord Lieutenant to levy a rate on the county. Does anyone mean to say that if the Irish tenants did not or could not pay, we should be able to deprive the people of Ireland of the Votes in aid for keeping up lunatic asylums, schools, dispensaries, and the medicines furnished by those dispensaries? I am assuming, of course, that times are exceedingly bad, and that the people cannot pay. How in that case could we levy increased rates? Of course we could not do it, and if we did we should commit an act of the grossest injustice. Supposing I were a grocer in some county in Ireland, why should I be taxed because some one does not pay his rent? The fact is that the whole thing is illusory. There is no sort of guarantee for these 33 millions, and the Chief Secretary knows that if this Bill is passed, the 33 millions will come in the main out of the pocket of the unfortunate British taxpayer. If you want to make these presents why do not you give them to my constituents in the County of Northampton? They have no ownership in the land at all, and, as the saying is, "half a cake is better than none." Nevertheless you say that although these Irish tenants have part in a dual ownership, you are to step forward and make them a present of this land. I say that my constituents have a better right to this money than the Irish tenants. Now, Sir, let me ask for whom is this money really intended? Is it for the tenants of Ireland? Not a bit of it. Of course you cannot carry the Bill without conferring some little benefit on the tenants, but that is a mere incident in this matter. What the right hon. Gentleman really wants is to make a present to the landlords of Ireland. He knows perfectly well that land in Ireland has fallen greatly, and may yet fall still further in value. He knows that there are no buyers in the market, and he knows also that the Irish landlords are anxious to sell their estates. Yes, but there are many landlords in England who would be glad to sell their estates. If because Irish landlords wish to sell we are to come forward in this, why not do the same thing in the case of the English landlords who are similarly circumstanced? And here let me call attention to an important and significant fact. We are told that under the Ashbourne Act nine large landowners of Ireland actually receive £1,500,000 which we have guaranteed. That enormous sum goes into the pockets of nine exceptionally rich Irish landlords. We know that property has its obligations, although they are not very well fulfilled in Ireland, yet even an Irish landlord has occasionally to give something in charity, and probably there are a good many who give a considerable amount. But under this Bill they will be freed entirely from this obligation, and as to the State it, of course, would give nothing. It would absorb everything. It would make a hard and fast bargain with the purchasers, and nothing would be given in charity or in the shape of subscriptions for schools and other institutions. I expect the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has been influenced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman is a representative landlord, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer is a representative of the moneyed interests of the City. Now, a vast number of Insurance Offices have lent money at 5 per cent. on Irish estates. If people knew how much these offices had lent on these estates the shares would go down considerably. These offices cannot hand over the mortgages to any one else, and they cannot foreclose, because in that case the property would be thrown on their hands. They are, therefore, obliged to content themselves with a lower rate of interest than 5 per cent. These eminent City gentlemen are, of course, anxious to get repaid, and they will be repaid under this Bill. The amount of the mortgage money will go to the Insurance Companies and the rest will remain with the Irish landlords. It is really a class measure. The Government are passing it in the interests of the landocracy and plutocracy they represent. It is because the plutocrats cannot force the money out of the Irish tenants that they are now to come upon the British taxpayer for the value of their property. Unfortunately hon. Gentlemen opposite cannot get it out of their minds that there is something sacred connected with land, and when those gentlemen, whom it is said neither toil nor spin, find that they cannot get enough out of their property to keep on neither toiling nor spinning, they are desirous of making up for the deficiency in some such manner as is suggested by this Bill. Say that we are to pay the market price of these congested districts to the owners of them. What may be the market value? It may be the capitalisation of the amount that they charge—not that they get from—their tenants at present. These congested districts are the shame and disgrace of the United Kingdom. They are Irish rookeries. What would be said were we to pass a Bill saying that England and Scotland and Wales were to join together to buy out the rookeries of London at their market value? Do not allow these landlords in Ireland to crowd people as they do at present. In the name of common sense do not bring in a Bill to benefit these landlords on account of their own iniquities, saying to them, "You have raised the value of the land by crowding persons most improperly, and now we will pay you the hard market commercial value."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is not in the Bill.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Again, I would wish the right hon. Gentleman to read his own Bill. I have no objection to go through the whole of it; there is time. He has really nothing to say in favour of his Bill, and he falls back on the statement that "it is not in my Bill." The right hon. Gentleman must really look after his draughtsmen. I have no doubt the intentions of the right hon. Gentleman are most excellent; in fact he told us that the Bill is a sort of speculation which he brings before the House.

He will withdraw it if the opinion of the House is not in favour of it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have never said anything of the kind.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Well, I will not pursue this. Will the right hon. Gentleman read the Clause—page 13, sub-section 3?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That applies to the holding being bought by the tenant occupier.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Yes, it is bought by the tenant occupier; but where does the money come from? From the British taxpayer. If the right hon. Gentleman likes to buy land in Ireland he is perfectly welcome to do so, at his own price. Your tenant is a mere sham. You buy out the land, and you sell it to the occupier. You are buying at the full market value; and I appeal to Members on this, aye, and the other side, of the House whether I have not clearly made out my case, that what I have stated is in the Bill. There is a third reason why you are bringing in this Bill. I am sorry that my Irish friends are not here. [Laughter.] They are kept away by domestic affliction. Were they here I would recommend them to be exceedingly careful about accepting this Bill if they want Home Rule. My impression is that one of the reasons for this Bill is that they would be better able to oppose Home Rule were this vast amount handed over to the Irish. We should be the man in possession in Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] I like my hon. Friend (Mr. T. W. Russell). He knows what the Government are doing, and he applauds them for it. My hon. Friend admits that we shall have to spend £100,000,000. [Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: No.] More than that—between £100,000,000 and £200,000,000. [Laughter.] Hon. Members laugh, but one for whom they have the greatest respect, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, said £200,000,000 would be required. I am putting it at £100,000,000. My contention, then, is this, that you cannot have two classes of tenants—one who pay less and in a certain time get the land, and the other who pay more and in no time get the estate. Therefore, if you pass this Bill, it will involve not merely the amount named, but between £100,000,000 and £200,000,000. Anyhow, the reason for which the hon. Member for South Tyrone admitted the Bill was brought in was to prevent the Irish from having Home Rule. That is one of the reasons why I am against it, and why I trust the Irish Members, who still retain such solid opinions, will vote with us on this occasion. The Chief Secretary told us that this was an Imperial Bill, and for the advantage of Ireland. But I can conceive of nothing worse than that, in the case of a part of the Empire, consisting of two islands, Great Britain and Ireland, one island should be the landlord or financial master of the other. Such a relationship would perpetuate the ill-feeling which still exists. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to consult the Chancellor of the Exchequer about this. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer will admit that Government securities are invariably attracted to the financial centre of the country issuing them; and the consequence will be that the entire rental of Ireland will each year be swept away from Ireland to be brought to England. No country in the world will stand this for a long time. Any country would be ruined. If the whole of the land of England belonged to proprietors in Paris, and the rental went to Paris, we know very well that England would in a given time be almost ruined. The case is far stronger in Ireland. In Ireland you have only one industry, agriculture; here you have many. You will sweep the whole of the rental of one island into the other, and yet you expect the country to be prosperous. If I was an Irishman I should refuse to pay one farthing. As a British taxpayer I will have to pay, but if the Irish refuse to pay, I shall tell English taxpayers that they have only got what they deserve. I will tell the right hon. Gentleman what I should do. I should leave dual ownership alone; and I should reduce the rental if it is in any case too high. If the rent is too high, all we have to do is to have fresh Land Courts and fresh legislation to make a further reduction.

[Laughter.] Yes, I should support it. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that if he will bring in a Bill to reduce all rents in Ireland by one-half I shall give it my most cordial and warmest support. Do in Ireland what you have done in the Islands and Highlands of Scotland. That is a far more reasonable proposal than this one, which is to gorge the plutocrats and landlords with the money of the British taxpayer. Take the Campaign estates—there are five or six of them. If I had the honour of being in the place of the right hon. Gentleman what should I do? I should have a Board of Arbitration and Conciliation in regard to these Campaign estates, to decide what was fair on both sides. And I should again come for legislation and pass a little Act converting the decision of the Board into law. In that way I would get rid of the whole question of these Campaign estates. In the congested districts I should deal drastically with the landlords. I do not think I should give them anything. I do not see why they should have anything. They perfectly well know that the only economic value of their land is that which is caused by the fact of Irishmen choosing to live there. Indeed, I have always wondered why Irishmen continue to live in those districts, to which they give value, just as do people who choose to pay for living in the rookeries of London give value to those rookeries. I say there is no real economic value in these properties at all. Well, then, I should finish up by passing a Home Rule Bill for Ireland. I have been asked whether we should really leave the Irish to settle the Land Question after they got Home Rule. I have never yet discovered why they should have Home Rule and not be allowed to deal with the Land Question. I can understand that hon. Gentlemen opposite are opposed to the Irish having full power to legislate on anything. But why should you give full powers to the Irish Legislature to legislate on everything except the land? Simply because of the fetish notion you entertain that land is superior to everything else. I have now stated a few of the reasons why I am opposed to the Bill. Others I will give when the Bill gets into Committee. I always respect the traditions of this House. I consider that on the motion for Second Reading a Member should only make a Second Reading speech, and I have endeavoured to do that by stating the reasons why I intend to vote against this Bill. I oppose the Bill because, in my opinion, it is ultra vires in the present Parliament to give any species of guarantee, whether it is desirable to give it or not, and further, on the merits I think it is one of the most pernicious and injurious Bills to the entire Empire, and especially to Ireland, that can well be conceived.

*(10.1.) MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvonshire, Arfon): I ask the attention of the House to some of the features of the Bill now before the House, because, having for more than 40 years taken an active interest in the various measures and schemes for the improvement of Ireland, I am satisfied that there are omissions and provisions in this Bill which, unrectified, would intensify the misery, discontentment, and political dangers it is intended to remove. Nay, more, it would extend to the tenant farmers of Great Britain that agrarian discontent which has made the Government of Ireland so difficult, discontent which would be still more dangerous if extended to races far more tenacious and determined in the assertion of their rights than the Irish. But before entering upon the defects of the Bill let me say that I have never pledged myself against the safe use, within reasonable limits, of the credit and means of this wealthy country in the settlement of the land question in Ireland. No statesman or historian can deny that Great Britain shares with the landlords, tenants, and people of Ireland the responsibility for the state of affairs there: it is difficult, if not impossible, duly to apportion the share of each in the sad history of weakness, folly and wrong—we have all to bear our share; and instead of wasting time and strength in recrimination, it is far more practical and sensible to appeal to those many noble and patriotic qualities which history also proves our various nationalities possess, to combine all our wisdom and the resources at our command in the attempt to settle a question, the settlement of which statesmen on all sides believe to be necessary—the one party contending that without it Home Rule is inevitable, and the other admitting that without it Home Rule would be unworkable. I should also wish to express my satisfaction that Government has decided to treat the congested districts on a different footing to the rest of Ireland, though I think their proposals for doing this will require the most careful consideration, and probably considerable modification. The circumstances differ essentially from those of the rest of Ireland, and require special aid and treatment. The inhabitants of the congested districts could not live on the land they occupy, even if it were their own, if aided alone by the wretched industries which they yet possess. Moreover, there does not exist in those districts materials out of which a safe and efficient system of Local Government could be constructed. On the other hand, in the rest of Ireland the population is by no means in excess of those who can live decently on the produce of the land, aided by industries which would thrive and extend if we only remove agrarian discord, and thus restore credit and confidence. Moreover, in the other parts of Ireland are found ample means out of which you can construct a good system of Local Government. I am glad the Bill contains provision for relieving those districts from the extreme pressure of population on the means of subsistence. I am glad, too, that it gives the option of emigration and migration, and I hope there will be no delay in making a trial of the former. Migration would be, if practicable, far the most desirable; but the experience of the two systems, both tried under exceptionally favourable circumstances during the last famine, told very strongly in favour of emigration. 11,000 of the population who were emigrated from the congested districts have been removed from the depths of poverty to prosperity in America and Canada, and have remitted many thousand pounds to support or bring out relatives; while those who remained behind in the Unions from which the emigrants went have been materially relieved by the removal of pressure of excessive population on the labour market, and on resources of the district. Of this we had ample evidence before the Colonisation Committee. I am sorry to say we were not equally successful in the attempt at migration. At that time the same preference for migration was expressed as is now, the people were starving, and I suggested that we should try just the experiment that was suggested last year by the hon. Member for East Mayo, that we should do it by private means assisted by a loan from Government. The hon. Member for Cork took up the measure very warmly, a Land Purchase and Settlement Company was formed under a Board of Directors, who ought to have ensured success, if success were possible. It consisted of those who believed in the success of migration; the hon. Member for Cork was Chairman, one of our ablest and successful and improving English landowners was Deputy Chairman, the late Mr. Dwyer Gray, the Members for Londonderry, for North Galway, the hon. and learned Member for South Hackney were Directors; it was difficult to conceive a more influential or stronger directorship. They bought exactly such a property as that recommended by the hon. Member for East Mayo, consisting largely of grass lands, which the Directors were to have possession of, but not a single tenant from the congested districts migrated on to this land. The Deputy Chairman came to me, I think soon after the purchase, and told me that the neighbouring tenants had given it to be understood that not one tenant should come on to the estate until they had all the land they wanted, and the whole plan broke down. I am aware that legal difficulties arose, but they were those that could have been got over, had not this greater difficulty been behind. I fear that while the greed for land in Ireland continues to be as strong as it is at present, migration cannot be considered a sufficient remedy for the surplus population of the congested districts. I agree, however, that it ought to be tried and to be adopted if it can be made successful, but it ought not to stand in the way of other remedies if unsuccessful; and if it can be tried under the management of those who believe in its success, I consider the decision so important that I should be willing under proper circumstances to join in a similar experiment. I think it is most desirable that a cheap system of land transfer should be embodied in the Government measure.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General has a Bill for that purpose.

*MR. RATHBONE: I am very glad to hear that, as when once we have put those districts on the upward course of improvement it will enable them to work out their own salvation in a way that neither the Government nor charity can do. I am most anxious to see the land question of Ireland settled, and had hoped we should find that the Government had largely amended the Bill of last year, for the Purchase Clauses of that Bill contained provisions so dangerous and unguarded that I dare not vote for a Bill that is to retain them. But I cannot see that they have introduced any limitations or safeguards which have any chance of being effectual. I think that I can show the House in a very few words that, if we attempt to purchase the larger holdings, say those over £30 a year, you cannot complete the edifice you are thus beginning to build without putting a strain on the resources of the United Kingdom which it neither will nor ought to bear. I maintain further that instead of benefitting Ireland, and removing her discontent, you will recreate, and in a more aggravated form, the evils which you seek to prevent, and that the measure would, in its present form, create a precedent in the United Kingdom with which you would be incapable of dealing. I feel strongly the dangers of extending the purchase system to the larger holdings in Ireland, repeatedly pointed out by the hon. Member for Cork and other Irish authorities. I contend that to so extend them will impose unnecessary liabilities on both Irish and Imperial resources. Independently of being in itself evil, it will furnish a precedent so dangerous that on that ground alone it ought to be, if persevered in, absolutely fatal to the measure. If you refer to the Returns of the Agricultural Holdings of 1881 you will find that they show 585,721 holdings of £30 per annum and under; and only 74,430 of holdings of above £30 per annum, or, in other words, eight-ninths of Irish holdings are stated as below £30 per annum, and only one-ninth above. But while the eight-ninths of holdings of £30 and under, taken at 20 years' purchase, would require only £95,000,000 at the rates of rent current in 1881 to buy them the remaining one-ninth would require £103,000,000 to buy them. The Census Returns give different figures, they state 400,000 holdings at £30 per annum and under, and 163,000 holdings at over £30 per annum, or about seven-tenths and three-tenths respectively. I have been unable to find any tables or calculations which would enable us to ascertain what amount we must deduct from these figures for demesne and other grass holdings, which will not be dealt with under the Act, or for other deductions, which must be very large, for reductions in rents since 1881, and other deductions which will have to be made from the £95,000,000 and the £103,000,000 respectively. These reductions must be very large, and will emphasise the fact that for the comparatively manageable sum, less than one-half of what would otherwise be required, you can buy up from seven-tenths to eight-ninths of the whole of the agricultural holdings in Ireland, and they the only holdings which would create a bona fide peasant proprietary, where the labour of the owner and his family was the principal factor in the cultivation of the holding. Of course, the landowner would prefer to sell his property as a whole, but the part of his property left him is the safest and best; the large tenants are able to pay the rents and less likely to wish to shoot him. And though they will, no doubt, be discontented at being left out, what claim have they to force us to extend our advances to £120,000,000, or £150,000,000, or more, in order to include the purchase of these larger holdings whose owners are in a better position in many ways than English, Scotch, or Welsh tenants? If you once admit the principle of buying up these large tenancies you cannot possibly stop at the limit fixed by the Bill. And for what are we asked to take this extended liability and risk

If you do it you will inevitably create a large number of small landowners, who as soon as they become owners will at once want to set up as landlords, and live on the margin between the reduced rents they will have to pay, and those excessive rents which that intense greed for the possession of land which exists, and I am afraid for some time will continue to exist, in Ireland will enable them to exact. Those who are unacquainted with Ireland would be astounded to know the rents and tenant-right money that Irishmen will pay for land. I could give the House recent facts proving this, if proof were needed. I know that there is a provision against sub-lettings such holdings without consent; but with the intense desire and great temptation there will be on both sides to let and take these holdings, no Government Department will be able to prevent sub-letting, any more than good resident Irish landlords have been able to prevent it in times past. The Bill as it now stands will inevitably create before many years are out the greatest curse of Irish landowning, the small grinding squireen landlord. The new landlords will be of the same character as the middleman of 50 years ago—poor, remorseless, exacting; and the new tenants, without tenant-right or capital, poorer, more reckless and desperate than even those now to be found in the congested districts. But the want of a proper limitation of the size of holdings involves in the precedent it will set a still greater danger to the country at large than the one I have pointed out. Any practical politician, any reader of history, knows that the democracy when its interests are concerned is apt to be very clear-sighted and very sternly logical in demanding the application of principles admitted to be just to its own affairs. And I would ask the House to consider how, if you pass this Bill in its present form, you are to meet the demands of the English, Scotch, and Welsh farmers, that they too shall receive similar facilities for becoming owners of their holdings, and at a large reduction of their present rents. Yet, without such limitation as has been suggested, the credit of England would be all too small to carry out a land purchase scheme on these principles. But if you adopt boldly the sound limitation of peasant proprietary of £30 and under you are safe, because the number of such tenancies in Great Britain is not excessive, and could be dealt with on sound principles, as it can be in Ireland, by a compassable amount. I must say that it has of recent years appeared to me that our statesmen too often, as in this case, grasp at an immediate palliative for some present difficulty, forgetting that they are establishing principles which involve frightful danger when people come to realise and insist upon their being carried out widely and consistently. I have not dealt with the precautionary restrictions introduced for the first time in the Bill of this year. They are absolutely worthless—that with respect to residence could be easily evaded, and both are made subject to an exception that they do not come into force if they interfere with carrying into effect sales on the estate of the same landlord. I fancy there will be few estates in Ireland where this exception might not be held to apply: and knowing, as the framers of this Bill must know, the history of the way in which such provisions have been disregarded in Ireland in times past, and the pressure that will be brought to bear by landlords and tenants interested to have the same treatment for the future; knowing this, it is really hardly respectful to this House to offer for their consideration provisions so utterly illusory. I have spoken strongly from no antagonism to the object of this Bill, for every one interested in, and acquainted with, the state of Ireland must earnestly desire the settlement of this land question, knowing it to be a necessary preliminary to the establishment of peace and prosperity in Ireland. This is a moment peculiarly favourable to the settlement of such a question. Could we not, in the present chaotic state of Parties, proclaim what was called in olden times “a truce of God” on this question, and combine the wisdom, experience, and patriotism of the wisest and best men of all Parties, and approach the subject in a spirit of sympathy, justice, and last, and not least, firmness, settle what all consider an essential preliminary to other Irish reforms, in whatever shape respective Parties contemplate them—do this, and I am confident you will make Ireland one of the most prosperous, easily governed, and I venture to predict, from the character of her people, not the least loyal and conservative part of Her Majesty's dominions.

(10.30.) MR. ATKINSON (Boston): I could not listen to the Senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) without endeavouring to respond to his manner of putting the question. We all know what to expect from him, both by his speeches out of doors and the rumours in the Lobby, as to the way in which he is going to prevent business being done. To-night, amusing as he generally is, he has been more amusing than usual. He has given us to understand what the springs of his action are. He appears to think that the Liberal Party is so hopelessly split up that the section of which he is the leader is coming to the front, and he is evidently expecting that in the event of a political crisis the Queen will be sending for him. I, however, do not think that the hon. Member will be sent for during the present century, at all events. His idea is that we ought to have another Government—any Government so long as the present one is driven from power. Well, I would ask him to show us what benefit would result to the country from a change of Government, either in Irish affairs or anything else. They would not be able to bring from the Benches opposite any two or three men who, combined, would have the same grasp of Irish affairs as the present Chief Secretary, or who would fill the post of Chief Secretary as ably as the right hon. Gentleman has done. The British electors will read between the lines of the speeches of hon. Members opposite; they will see that they want to be in Office; they will refer to their doings, and then will vote in such a manner as will astonish the hon. Member for Northampton and his friends. [Cries of "Question!"]

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not speaking to the question before the House.

MR. ATKINSON: Then I will not follow the observations of the hon. Member for Northampton any further, as I see he is an unsound guide. I will only say that I congratulate the Government and the Chief Secretary upon the way in which they have framed the present measure, which, in my opinion, will cut the ground from under the feet of the agitators who are demanding Home Rule.

(10.35.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I do not know whether I should congratulate the Chief Secretary or condole with him on his present position. I remember him as the great advocate of Protestant landlordism, on which our civilisation depends, and now he brings in a Bill which will strike a fatal blow at landlordism, and, if your civilisation depends on it, then at civilisation. As I do not believe in landlordism, I am glad that he has brought in his Bill. I hope to see it finished even in my own day. I think we are all agreed that Irish landlords must go, and but few hon. Members would like to eject them without giving them compensation. I object to the provisions of this Bill, however, and shall vote against the Second Reading, because I regard the prices at which the tenants are required to purchase their holdings as unfair, even when based on the rents fixed by the Courts, inasmuch as the Courts require the tenants to pay rent upon their own improvements, and because the Irish tenants are being coerced into buying their holdings. I object to it, on the second ground, in the interests of the public as well as of the tenant. Badly as the present tenant-farmers in Ireland have been treated, those of Scotland have also been badly treated; for every £1 stolen from the Irish tenants there have been £10 stolen from the Scotch tenants; therefore, I say that a Bill of this kind ought not to be used for a class, badly as they have been treated. I hold that the public as a whole should get the benefit of it, and not one class. The difference in the value of the estates in Ireland as between State purchase and the price that would be given in the ordinary way in the market is from £50,000,000 to £80,000,000. That sum, I hold, should not be given to a class, but to the whole community. I know that under the present tenure Irish tenant-farmers are paying their 15s. an acre, and are charging labourers and others £4 an acre in conacre, putting the difference into their pockets. I do not see why we should seek to benefit the small farmers alone by this Bill. Why not adopt a system by which the labourers and the general community could benefit as well as the small farmers? Such a plan has been proposed for England by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, as Chairman of the Small Holdings Committee, and the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Agriculture and some of his colleagues. If this Bill applied to Ireland the system recommended by that Committee I, for one, would support it. If you gave the tenants the land at a perpetual rent instead of letting them buy it out and out you would be able still further to reduce their rents. If we are to abolish the present landlord system, I do not think we ought to create new landlords. If it is wrong for a man to let land to tenants, it can only be wrong because private property in land of this character is an expedient. I do not think you will be able to prevent the subletting of some farms. When you are making a change of this kind the best way is to make it thoroughly and completely. If you make the payments by the tenants perpetual you can reduce the rents 30 per cent. instead of 20 per cent., and I think the farmer would much prefer a system under which this could be accomplished. Economic rent is not created by the tenant, but is the price paid for the more valuable sites and soils as against the poorer ones. The tenants do not create the artificial value of the soils. The soil has been created by the Almighty, and He never opened land offices and sold it. The economic rent from site is two or three times as great as the economic rent from soil. If, however, you are going to transfer a monopoly from one class to another you will not get rid of the monopoly, but will perpetuate an injustice, and you will soon have the community fighting as much against your new tenure and your new landlords. The new owners of the soil will be as bad as, if not worse than, the old landlords, because the wealthy landlords are generally the best and the poor landlords the worst. Very often the old Tory landlords are the best, and the new commercial men, who have bought the land, are the worst possible owners. The latter apply commercial principles to the land, whilst the old families still allow sentiment to influence them. I look upon it as a curse to the land when new men come in and apply economic principles to it. An hon. Member has said that in Donegal the people are all ready to buy. If the hon. Member had been to Dunfanaghy and Gweedore he would find there much the same state of things as in some of the Western Highlands, namely, that if you were to give the land rent-free and tax-free you would not be able to much improve the condition of the people. I know of one well-managed estate in Ireland, the proprietor of which is a very good-humoured gentleman, and probably as easy a landlord as any in the country. Nine-tenths of the people are on one-tenth of that estate, and the remaining nine-tenths of the estate is occupied by one-tenth of the tenants. It would be no solution of the land question at all to bring these tenants in as purchasers. To do so means the creation of another form of land monopoly and privilege which will lead to fresh agitation, and give us more work in this House in future. At the present time I am not very much interested in politics, but by-and-bye the questions in which I am interested will come to be legislated on, although it may not probably be for three years. But looking at the questions which come before us, I am, for one, beginning to feel Conservative. Even from hon. Friends from whom I expected better things I hear views expressed that show them to be in a state of sentimental socialism. There will before long be new lines of cleavage between Parties, and the great fight will probably be between Individualism and Socialism. I am an old-fashioned Individualist, and I want to get rid of conditions of property which are dangerous to property as a whole. I believe a man has a right to whatever his labour has created. Land, of course, has not been created by labour, and I would point out that a bad form of property will help the crusade against all forms of property. The best way of settling the question is not to create new privileges and new monopolies that could not be justified, but to get rid of those who possess the present privileges and monopolies. They will consent to be bought out at a rate which is not a dear rate. Do not create new landlords, but pass over to the community what ought to belong to the community, and you will then avoid the struggle to get from the community that which the community ought not to have. I say that if you adopt the system recommended by the right hon. Gentleman the Minister of Agriculture, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, and others who sat on the Agricultural Holdings Committee, you will be able to reduce the amount paid by the tenants much more than you can do under this Bill; you will be able to get a better price for the landlord, and will put an end to an agitation which you will not bring to an end by this Bill.

*(10.52.) SIR E. GREY (Northumberland, Berwick): I do not wish to enter into any discussion on the merits of the Bill, because they have already been so extensively discussed by the House that I can say nothing additional. I think there were many valuable criticisms in the speech of the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark), but I think they come rather nearer to Socialism than he himself seemed to be aware of. I admit that some of his criticisms might with great advantage be given full weight to in the further development of this Bill, but I regard the vote that will be given on the Second Reading of this Bill as one on the principle of land purchase, and the question to be answered is not whether the Bill before the House is or is not perfect, but whether the Bill is so bad that those in favour of the principle of land purchase ought not to vote for the Second Reading. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) has made an attack on the Bill from the point of view of the British taxpayer, and has directed the British taxpayer's attention solely to his own pocket. The British taxpayer would have been more grateful if his attention had been a little more directed to the merits of the Irish question from the point of view of Home Rule. As an English Home Ruler I intend to vote for the Second Reading of the Bill. The great difficulty in governing Ireland so far has been the agitation and unrest in the country which Government after Government have found it almost impossible to allay. The same agitation will be the difficulty of a Home Rule Parliament, and, as I wish to see the success of Home Rule in Ireland, I wish first to remove as far as possible all difficulties from the settlement of the land question. There has been no stability in Ireland, because the great body of the people who are engaged in the chief industry of the country have had no future to which they might look forward. The Bill before the House proposes to create such a future, and it will go far to create a class of people who will form a sound and stable basis to resist those trials to which a new Government in Ireland must necessarily be especially subject. One of the great difficulties in connection with the land question in Ireland has been that the Irish tenant cultivating the soil has never been brought face to face with economic conditions. Between him and economic conditions there has always stood the landlord, and when the tenant has suffered—not always, though very often, from high rents—it is the landlord and landlordism he has blamed. The first duty of Parliament ought to be to remove this wall between the tenant and economic conditions, and to let the tenant see things clearly as they really exist, so that he may shape his course accordingly. People talk about sub-division and sub-letting, but it is landlordism that has been at the bottom of the sub-division and the sub-letting, because the tenants have never recognised the true economic conditions. There are many Home Rulers who feel that the Home Rule movement has been greatly and mischievously complicated by the land question, and that it will be a great advantage if we can get the political question put before Irish public opinion quite free from the agrarian complication. One great difference between us and Unionists is this—that Home Rulers believe that if you settled the land question absolutely to-morrow there would still remain the demand for Home Rule. On the other hand, Unionists seem to think that if we could only settle the land question we should get rid of political difficulty in Ireland. Home Rulers do not believe that, and I, for one, wish to see the point put to the test; and I am, therefore, willing to support any well-considered effort on the part of Unionists to put an end to the land difficulty in Ireland, and I am willing to abide by the result as it affects the political movement. It will be said that this Bill is capable of improvement, and that I ought not to take so strong a step as to vote against my Party; but those who are in favour of land purchase have no choice in the matter. A large section of the Liberal Party have done their best to put it beyond all doubt that the Liberal Party will never support a policy of land purchase for Ireland; they have done their best to make that policy for ever impossible. At all events, they have told the country it ought never to be done by British credit, and how will they do it without, if the terms offered are to be as favourable as now? What alternative remains if there is no chance of a Land Purchase Bill being passed by the Liberals if they come into power? The alternative seems to be this: Assuming this Bill to have merits that are worth voting for, it is to vote against this Bill, and by so doing obtain whatever credit is to be gained for having resisted a measure which is not popular in every part of the country, and for having opposed the Government, and then to go for Home Rule for Ireland, feeling that all difficulties have been removed by a Unionist Government, and that it was these very difficulties the removal of which Home Rulers had opposed. This would be to obtain all the benefits of a land purchase measure, and at the same time to take credit for having opposed it. I will not say anything about that course on conscientious grounds, for I have observed in politics that when a man begins to talk about his conscience people conclude that he does not possess one. The course I have described is one which is very obvious, but it is one which is sure to be found out, and it is one which will be resented by the electors when it is found out. I do not believe that this Bill is as unpopular as some seem to think. When a surgeon is advancing to perform a painful operation on a patient, we do not expect him to make any great show of cheerfulness and enthusiasm, and land purchase is not a pleasant operation to undertake. Land purchase in Ireland is not a pleasant subject, but at the same time the question is one it is necessary to take into consideration, and I believe the country will look upon it from that point of view. Apart from the question how far this particular measure is unpopular throughout the country, the Opposition have something to gain by showing themselves willing to support it. I do not think that many by-elections have been won by anti-land purchase speeches, but they have been won by Home Rule speeches, and the two things are not the same. There are still doubtful electors throughout the country, and, considering how English Parties have for years come under the suspicion of using Irish questions for Party purposes, the Liberals have more to gain by making some show of courage, firmness, impartiality, and disinterestedness in supporting a measure brought forward in the interests of Ireland, even when it comes from the other side, than they will lose by risking the loss of the votes of a few timid and selfish taxpayers.

*(11.8.) MR. MACARTNEY: The opposition to this Bill should not be based on the assumption that it is a landlords' measure; no one can think so who knows the reception it has met with in Ireland among the landlords of the country. The landlords have never asked the Government to introduce it. With regard to the objection that there is a want of local control in the purchase department, I can quite understand the right hon. Members for Mid Lothian and West Birmingham placing great value upon the interference of Local Authorities; but if the Government want to hang up the Bill and to make it inoperative, they will give effect to the views of those right hon. Gentlemen, because I am perfectly convinced there would be no possibility of the measure having any operation if that had to depend upon the decision of a Local Authority. I hope, therefore, that if the Government desire to make this an effective measure they will resist the suggestions that have come from the opposite side of the House. Objection has been taken to the elimination of the 20 years' limit of purchase; but that, I think, has been answered by the hon. Member for South Tyrone. The objection last year came from both sides. In fact, the objections made last Session, when the previous Bill was before the House, were not directed to inflict injury upon the tenant, but to remove hardships inflicted on the landlords by certain provisions, and the removal of the limitation in no way interferes with the operative value of the scheme of land purchase for the tenant. I do not pretend to say that this is a Bill I entirely approve. I presume that there are very few landlords in Ireland who would approve it as it is now drawn, but I agree with many Members on both sides of the House in desiring to see the land question in Ireland settled. Recognising, therefore, that the Government have given an ear to the complaints which have come from both sides of the House, that they have, as far as they could, endeavoured to meet the arguments used against certain portions of the measure introduced last year, I shall vote against the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division of Nottingham, and shall support the Second Reading of the Bill as it is drafted, and as it has been now introduced on the authority of the Government. I have never been an enthusiastic admirer or advocate of an extended scheme of land purchase in Ireland, but I should not like to take the responsibility at the present time of declining to support a measure which has been, to a certain extent, re-cast, which I believe to be as good a measure as can be produced by any Government, and especially when there is no prospect of any measure being forthcoming from the Party opposite.

(11.15.)* MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): It is not my intention to join in any attempt to talk out the measure, or prevent a Division being taken, but I do not like to give a silent vote against this Land Purchase Bill. I oppose the Bill, first, because I was one of those who at the last election declared against the land purchase scheme of my own leader. I am not one of those hon. Members, of whom I see several opposite, who at the election placarded the walls of railway trucks stating the number of tons of gold which would be taken out of the taxpayers' pockets by a land purchase scheme and given to Irish landlords; but I declared against using British credit or the money of the British taxpayer for the purpose of buying out Irish landlords. I shall vote against the Bill next on the principle that I object to using public money for private good. This Bill will benefit a certain number of landlords (who will sell their estates for more than they could get in the open market), and also will benefit a certain number of tenants who will become landowners through the use of British credit. I fail to see that a tenant has any right to demand from the Legislature more than two things—first, that the conditions of tenure on which he holds his land shall be fair, reasonable, and just; and, secondly, that the rent he pays shall be a fair rent. This is a very awkward precedent which is being set up, and hon. Gentlemen opposite may rest assured that if public credit is to be used to-day for the purpose of creating a new class of landlords in Ireland, it may be used hereafter when it shall be sought hereafter to dispossess landlords in Scotland, England, and Wales! But while putting the British Exchequer in this most invidious position of rent collector in Ireland, the Government have not the justification (though, doubtless, many of their supporters honestly believe they have), of being satisfied that this measure will tend to the lasting peace and contentment of the country. Forty-nine years is a long time to look forward to, and probably only a very small proportion of tenants who purchase will carry out the bargain they have made; every few years a certain proportion of the holdings will change hands—some of them will change hands repeatedly before the redemption is complete. I therefore fail to see that this Bill will do anything to bring about permanent contentment in Ireland. At the most, it will only affect at all a small portion of the tenantry of Ireland, while it will leave the rest more discontented than before. It is, indeed, no final settlement. My last objection is that the Government are giving the gigantic bribe of a large sum of money to the landlord class in Ireland. They are making themselves a reputation as a Government of being a kind of “universal provider,” because, after trying to endow out of public money the property of the brewers and the public-house holders, they have called Parliament together at this season for the purpose of rewarding two other classes of their friends. The Tithe Bill is intended to benefit the clerical supporters of the Government, and the Land Purchase Bill is intended to buy out at enormous cost Irish landlords. Hon. Members opposite know that the sum of money that the landlords will get under this Bill will be far above what would be got by them in the open market on the free sale of their property. I believe the constituencies, who declared in 1886 against the employment of British money for such a purpose, will be found at the approaching General Election to adhere to that declaration.

(11.21.) MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I was amused at the way in which the hon. Member for South Antrim (Mr. Macartney) came down here to bless the Government. Generally from the loyal and patriotic class there come complaints that the landlords would be robbed by land purchase proposals, but at last, apparently, the Government have done enough to please their supporters in the North of Ireland. To meet the views of their friends in the North of Ireland the Government have removed the limitation of years' purchase, and thus the risk to the British taxpayer is increased. At the best it is very doubtful whether the money advanced will return to the British Treasury, and I have not yet heard any argument showing the necessity for the Bill. I speak, of course, of the Purchase Clauses. As to the congested districts part of the Bill, that, I understand, deals with Irish Church surplus money, in which I am not concerned to interfere. I may say that I do not think that the congested districts part of the Bill will have any far-reaching effect. That, however, is not a matter a British Member need go out of his way to criticise. But I do not think this part of the Bill will do any harm. So much cannot be said for the Purchase Clauses.

We all know where the benefit will go. The Conservative Party, after four years ago denouncing land purchase for Ireland in unmeasured terms, have introduced a Land Purchase Bill every year since, and I must say it is not a very creditable thing that these proposals emanate from the Party many of whose supporters are directly interested. I believe that under the Ashbourne Act of 1888 £1,500,000 of the purchase money went to families members of which have seats in this House. I have no doubt in this there is to be found a reason for bringing forward this Bill. We are within a measurable distance of a dissolution, the position of affairs is precarious, and the Government have resolved that before they run the risk of leaving Office they will endeavour to reward their Irish friends. Hon. Members opposite have praised the conduct of Irish landlords; but the Chief Secretary when he introduced this Bill told us that Irish landlords had not, in many cases, made improvements on the land, or put up cottages for labourers, and that owing to political agitation the Irish landlord is no longer in a position to perform the ordinary social duties of a landlord. In other words, the landlords do not do their duty. But good or bad, at any rate the Chief Secretary has determined that by his scheme he will extirpate them from Ireland as far as he possibly can. Supporters of the right hon. Gentleman may say this legislation is brought forward for the settlement of the Irish question, but everybody who has knowledge of the operation of the Ashbourne Act knows that a very large number of the holdings purchased under the Act were so small that tenants could not live from the farms rent free. The purchase of these small holdings cannot have the effect of settling the land question, because the people cannot live on the holdings. They would not be able to do so, even if they were given to them for nothing. In speaking on the Irish land question, it is a common thing to refer to the way in which Ireland has been coerced by absentee landlords, but by this scheme of legislation you are creating the greatest absentee landlord it would be possible to make. This money which will be paid in the form of rent will all go out of the country to London, and you will have a complete system of absentee landlordism. The economic effect of that cannot be other than bad. [Cries of "Divide!"] There seems to be an idea amongst hon. Gentlemen opposite that landlords demand some sort of special consideration, but why should landlords receive more consideration than other people? Recent legislation, it is true, has brought down their rents, but the original rents were unfair; therefore I fail to see why the landlords deserve special consideration. We have already spent £5,000,000 on this land purchase; we are told that another £33,000,000 will be required under this Bill, and it is an open secret that that is not all that will be required. At the last General Election the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) said that £150,000,000 or even £200,000,000 would be required. [Cries of "Divide!"] I must say this anxiety for a Division is somewhat excessive, seeing that no one can say that the business of Parliament has been obstructed during the last two or three days, and that the subject we are debating is the expenditure of £33,000,000. We consider, having regard to the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland in introducing the Bill, and taking it in conjunction with the speech the right hon. Member made in the early part of this year, that he has made considerable efforts to hedge round his plan with collateral security. If I rightly remember, in the spring he said that his securities made us safe against everything but an organised repudiation of the payment. But is such a repudiation impossible? Hon. Members opposite never tire of telling us of the illegal combinations of the Irish tenants, and it certainly seems to me that it will be much easier for the tenants in Ireland to combine together against one landlord and one estate than it is to combine against different landlords and different estates. When the peasantry come to reflect upon the large sums of money which will have to be paid by them—paid, as they will say, by them to Englishmen—it will be a very easy thing for an agitator to go round and call on them to repudiate this tribute altogether—and "tribute" was the word used by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. [Cries of "Divide!"] I cannot see that we have any strong guarantee from anybody that this attempt at repudiation will not be made. We have had no Irish Members getting up and declaring that they approve of the scheme, and will accept it. I do not say that if the Irish Members accepted it I should be in favour of it; but I say that whatever a guarantee from the Irish Members might be worth, we have not even got that. Two or three Members who have spoken to-night have put before us what they call dilemmas—even the hon. Member for South Tyrone. He says that the Bill will be popular in Ireland, and that there has been pressure brought to bear on the Irish Members to induce them to vote for it—

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I did not say that.

MR. PHILIPPS: He said something to the effect that the Bill was popular amongst the tenant farmers of Ireland.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The Member for East Down said so. I spoke for the tenantry of Ulster.

MR. PHILIPPS: I thought the hon. Member was speaking for the whole tenantry of Ireland. I accept his correction. At any rate, another hon. Member opposite said that all classes in Ireland were clamouring for the Bill. Hon. Members were candid, especially the hon. Member for South Tyrone, who said it would be impossible to give the localities control over the money. He said the localities would refuse to accept the responsibility, and that the Bill would be ruined. He was candid, and we were charmed by his candour. It is too much that hon. Members should tell us at one moment that this Bill is popular with everybody, and at the same time say, "We will not trust the localities with any veto in the matter, because if we did they would veto the scheme at once." As to the safety of the scheme one thing is certain, namely, that if

Ireland liked to combine against the payment of rent it would be absolutely impossible for the British taxpayer to evict the whole nation. We know well enough that even now landlords arouse a certain amount of public opinion when they are evicting the poor tenants even on one estate; and every one will admit that it would be impossible for the British Executive to evict the whole peasantry of Ireland if they chose to combine against this scheme. Even if we turned these poor people out of their holdings we know from the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel Saunderson) that "evicted farms do not let very readily." I am glad the hon. Member for Northampton gave us his opinion as to how this question ought to be settled; because I take it that very few Members of the Liberal Party who are in favour of the House dealing with the question of land purchase are in favour of this Bill. Judging from the speeches of Liberal Members, it is clear that they are becoming every day more strongly opposed to any further guarantee by the British taxpayer. Then what I, for one, wish to see is that this question should be left to the Irish people in an Irish Parliament to settle. That is what Home Rule means to a great many people. I am sure I can speak for my own constituency. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, I come from a bye-election, having been returned more recently than some hon. Members opposite; and I can assure the House that my constituents look forward to decentralization not only in Ireland, but in Scotland, and they think that one of the most essential powers of any Home Rule Parliament should be the control of the land system of its country. It seems to me that the Irish would be very unwise if they accepted a Land Purchase Bill of this kind, because whatever advantage the Irish tenant may get from buying his land now there is no doubt that the tendency of the value of land in Ireland is downwards, and that if the tenant will wait a few years he will get his rent reduced. He will, at any rate, be able to buy his land under a Home Rule Parliament at a great many years less purchase than he will have to pay to-day, and the Irish Executive will have the advantage of having the whole rent roll of the country as a basis of taxation. The tendency of the legislation of hon. Gentlemen opposite is to make endless calls upon the public purse—as we saw last Session in their proposal for the compensation of the publicans, and as we see this Session in their proposals for tithe redemption and Irish land purchase. I do not say that the money they spend is always wasted. It was not wasted in the case of the Bill passed in the early part of the year for the housing of the poor. When one sees how the public expenditure is being increased, and how local debts are being increased, and how they are sure to be increased by useful legislation like that relating to the housing of the poor—I say that when we see this tendency towards the expenditure of public money going on increasing, and when we see it proposed to spend the money in a fresh manner every Session, it is a most serious thing. It is not as if we were paying off large sums of debt. Hon. Gentlemen opposite in their platform speeches are continually boasting of having paid off large sums of public debt; but it is within the memory of some of us that we are still, under the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, reducing the Debt by £500,000 less per annum than was the case in the last Administration. You must remember that it is not possible for this country to borrow unlimited sums of money—that the amount people will lend at $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. is limited. Whether the Debt is large or small, the credit of this country is the possession of all its people. Speaking as a Scotch Member—[Cries of "Oh!"—] I do not pretend to speak for Scotland, but surely I may speak for my own constituents; I represent a very poor industrial community, and, speaking for the people there, I say that if the State is going to use its credit at all, it should be used for the benefit of the poor people of Scotland just as much as for the benefit of the landlords in Ireland. It is a very serious thing that the Government are proposing these extravagant plans for dealing with many millions of public money; and it is in the interest of the taxpayers, in the interest of the poor people, to whom I should like to see this money voted, that I oppose the proposal, as I shall oppose any proposal of land purchase, whether brought forward by hon. Members opposite or by gentlemen sitting on the Front Bench on this side of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Storey.)

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I think, Sir, it is the general desire of the House to bring this Debate to a conclusion to-night. If there is a wish on the part of any considerable number of hon. Gentlemen to continue the discussion I shall not oppose the Motion for adjournment; but from information that has reached me I am led to believe that it will be for the general convenience to close the Debate to-night. If it is the opinion of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite that it will be to the advantage of the question that the Debate shall be prolonged I will not oppose the adjournment, but will submit to the convenience of the House.

(11.53.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I feel that it would be hardly decent to limit to one night the Debate on the Second Reading of a Bill of this magnitude, which involves such enormous interests, as long as there are gentlemen who desire to prolong it.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I certainly shall not object if there is a general desire to take a serious part in the discussion.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE RECOVERY BILL.—(No. 110.)

Order for Committee read.

An hon. MEMBER: Now, Sir—

SIR W. HARCOURT: I understood that a pledge was given—

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: To-morrow.

Mr. Philipps

SIR W. HARCOURT: Mr. Deputy Speaker—

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: There is no Question before the House. The Order being called, I called upon the hon. Member in whose name the Instruction stood, and as he did not respond, no one else could move the Instruction. The Question is postponed till to-morrow.

Order postponed till to-morrow.

TRANSFER OF RAILWAYS (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 113.)

SECOND READING.

(11.55.) Motion made, and Question put, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

The House divided:—Ayes 224; Noes 73.—(Div. List, No. 5.)

Bill read a second time.

On the Motion that the Bill be committed on Wednesday, (12.8.) DR. CLARK: May I ask the Government whether, seeing that this Bill has only been delivered to-day, they will not consent to postpone the next stage, so that hon. Members may have time to propose Instructions for the purpose of modifying the measure? I think that to bring in a Bill like this, and attempt to rush it through the House without a word of explanation in the manner proposed, is very unfair.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I may point out that if the hon. Member had been in the House when I introduced the Bill he would have heard a very adequate explanation of it. Everyone who is acquainted with the state of things in Ireland is well aware that the measure is one that ought to be passed with as little delay as possible. I can assure the hon. Gentleman there is nothing in the Bill which puts an extra 6d. of taxation on the people. However, if it be any satisfaction to the hon. Member, I have no objection to defer the Committee stage until Thursday.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Bill be committed on Thursday," put, and agreed to.

House adjourned at ten minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 3rd December, 1890.

MR. SPEAKER'S CONTINUED ABSENCE.

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House that Mr. Speaker was again unavoidably prevented from taking the Chair of the House this day.

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

HISTORICAL MANUSCRIPTS COMMISSION (LIST OF REPORTS.)

Address for—

"Return of complete List, with dates of issue, of the Reports of the Historical Manuscripts Commission, and of the Appendices thereto, together with an Alphabetical Index of the Collections examined and reported on, giving a reference to the Report and Appendix wherein the result of the examination may be found."—(Mr. Stuart-Wortley.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PURCHASE OF LAND AND CONGESTED DISTRICTS (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 111).

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment to Question [2nd December], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "inasmuch as the Government have advised the landlords in Ireland to combine, strengthened their already exceptional power of eviction, and freely placed at their disposal the forces of the Crown to evict for the non-payment of unjust rents large numbers of those to whose toil the rental value of their holdings is chiefly due, and have also passed and ruthlessly administered a law of exceptional nature to prevent combination on the part of the tenants, and whereas, as a result of this policy, equality of conditions as between buyer and seller has been greatly impaired, and the landlord's interest is maintained at an artificial value, and it is not proposed by the Bill to invest any Irish authority with a control over the transactions, this House declines to pledge the credit of the country to the scheme proposed by the Bill as being alike unsafe to the Imperial Exchequer and unjust to the Irish occupier,"—(Mr. John Ellis.)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

* (12.20.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I had hardly expected to address the House at this moment, but I understand that other speeches which would have preceded mine will be delivered at a later hour. There are one or two considerations which I wish to lay before the House in order to justify my opposition to this Bill, especially after the speeches delivered yesterday by my hon. Friend the Member for Haddington (Mr. Haldane) and my hon. Friend the Member for Northumberland (Sir E. Grey). The hon. Member for Haddington stands alone, I think, in his interpretation of the machinery of the Bill, in thinking that machinery might easily be adapted to the new condition of affairs, if Home Rule were carried. He stated his case with clearness and moderation, and consideration for those who do not agree with him. But I must say that the speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for Northumberland gave me a certain amount of pain. He had a perfect right to express dissent from the action of the rest of his Party, but I do not think he did so in a manner which tended to create confidence in his judgment among hon. Members on this side of the House. He said that the views expressed on this side of the House were merely in the interests of timid and selfish taxpayers. He added that the Radicals were not sincere in their opposition to the Bill, and that secretly they wished it to be carried so that one of the main difficulties which stand in the way of Home Rule may be removed. I demur to the contentions of both of my hon. Friends. The question goes far deeper. We are sent here to protect the pockets of the taxpayer, and if he is subjected to any risk or danger we are bound to protect him. But the question is one which goes even deeper still than any interest of the taxpayer. We oppose the Bill because it offends against the economic and social principles which lie at the root of the reforms which we wish to see carried out in Ireland. We desire to see self-government established in Ireland, but we think that the Bill, in the form in which it is drawn, will tend rather to postpone than to promote that object. Both the hon. Member for Haddington and the hon. Member for Northumberland seem to me to treat the question in a superficial way. They have treated the Bill as if it were an indispensable preliminary to the carrying out of any measure of Home Rule. The hon. Member for Haddington contends that it is the merit of this Bill that it will place the substantial Irish tenants—the men with some capital—in possession of their farms, whereas the hon. Member for Northumberland is of opinion that the Bill will affect the poorer tenants, will remove the discontent of the Irish people, and so lead to their pacification. These two reasons contradict and defeat each other. We do not admit that land purchase is essential to, Home Rule for Ireland, but we maintain that the proposals of the Government are fraught with social, political, and economical dangers. It is on account of these dangers that we believe the passing of the Bill would create difficulties in the development of self-government in Ireland, and the final solution of the land question. I have yet to learn that the arguments put forth last year with great force by the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) as to the danger of making the State the creditor, or the universal landlord of all the tenants of Ireland, have received an answer; or the powerful speech of the First Lord of the Admiralty in 1883 when he brought this question before the House, and pointed out that the danger was not to be despised, and urged that it would be necessary to provide a Local Authority which should be interested in the collection of the rents. Nor have we had any answer to the contention of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) in 1886, when he pointed out to the working classes of this country

the dangers in which they would be involved if they became the creditors of the Irish tenants, and the terrible position in which they would be placed if they had to carry out evictions and to enforce payment at the point of the bayonet. The hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division (Mr. J. E. Ellis) has laid before the House evidence which I personally regretted to hear, because I am not sure that the action of some of these Irish tenants can be justified in finding fault with the instalments they have to pay. That evidence creates uncertainty in regard to the future of land values in Ireland, and shows the danger of social disorder and disorganisation in Ireland that must ensue if the debts of the purchasing tenants were repudiated, a contingency that would not be unlikely. But I will go further. I am not afraid of the full logical results of Home Rule, and I will say that no Home Rule Parliament would be worth granting in Ireland unless it is fit to discharge the duty which we Radicals, at any rate, wish to place in the hands of the County Councils and Municipal Authorities, namely, of dealing in an equitable way with the land within their jurisdiction. The hon. Member for Northumberland said that it would be beneficial if the tenants of Ireland were brought in contact with economic facts, and made to face them. That has been our contention from the first. We want them brought face to face with them, and made to see the social and economic facts which stand before them. But I say the same for the landlords. They should be made to face the facts, too, and it would be doing them no kindness if we created a false impression in their minds by passing a Bill of this kind, and by blinding their eyes to those economic laws which, sooner or later, they would have to face. The future of Ireland depends upon the tranquillity and good understanding between different classes, and this can only be brought about, not by such a measure as this, but by a full recognition of facts and economic laws. We object to this Bill primarily and finally, too, because it is a Compensation Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Mr. Reid) made a strong speech on the point yesterday, but I do not think he was quite aware how strong a case he might have made out that the Bill from the beginning to the end is a Compensation Bill. What has been the origin of these proposals? My hon. Friend was in error in attributing to the Chief Secretary in his speech in 1883 the argument of compensation as a justification for land purchase, but he would not have been in error if he had pointed out that the Motion of the First Lord of the Treasury in the previous year was the direct outcome of the Report of the Lords Committee on the working of the Land Act of 1881. In 1882, in moving for the Committee, Lord Donoughmore, after referring to the terrible results of the Act of 1881 upon the position of the Irish landlords, and expressing alarm at the 70,000 originating notices under the Act, stated that they wanted the Committee in order—

“To take some steps to check, before it is quite too late, that ‘heavy loss’ and ‘ruin’ which the Prime Minister himself repudiated and disavowed, but which is being inflicted day by day upon an admittedly guiltless class, the landlords of Ireland.”

Let me turn to a still higher authority, Lord Cairns, who was then Lord Chancellor of Ireland. He said, in the same Debate—

“The Land Commissioners are alienating a portion varying from one quarter to one-third of the ownership of land in Ireland from those who have hitherto held it to those who have never held it at all. . . . The Act was like the infant Hercules; it had taken to strangulation—but it has strangled the landlords instead of the Land League.”

We have here the clearest proof that the real motive of these proposals was to obtain compensation for Irish landlords for that average of 20 per cent. loss in their rents which they had sustained by the operation of the Land Courts in Ireland. After this House had committed itself not only to the original judicial rents, but to the revision of them, it would be an outrage upon common sense to deny that the motive and the arguments out of which these proposals sprung were not, in the main, the desire to secure some relief and some compensation to the Irish landlords for their losses as the result of the legislation affecting the position of rent. That is my first contention against this Bill. My other contention is that whether it is a compensation Bill or not, the price to be paid for the land—the price for which the British taxpayer is to contribute his credit, and to stand a certain amount of risk in the future, is not a fair price nor is it to be assessed in a fair manner. How is this assessment of price to be arrived at under the proposals of Her Majesty's Ministers? It is to be left to freedom of contract. We know what freedom of contract in Ireland has been in the past, and how persistently and effectively Her Majesty's Government have strengthened the hands of the landlords in exercising what they call freedom of contract. They have at their backs a force of 35,000 armed men; they have new machinery of law creating new offences to defeat combination, and they have been able to reduce anything like freedom of contract to the most contemptible farce. Now, what should be the true basis of the price for land if it is to be bought at all in Ireland? In this very Committee of the House of Lords to inquire into the operation of the Land Act, Mr. George Fottrell, then solicitor to the Irish Land Commission, said in his evidence—

“Both parties arrive at the capital or purchase value of the land through its annual value, so that until the annual value shall have been established, they have not got a standard by which they are likely to come to a bargain for the sale of holdings.”

Going further back than Mr. Fottrell, there was the Commission, presided over by Lord Devon, which came to distinct conclusions on this point, and nothing can be more pregnant of wisdom than the words of that Conservative Peer when he said that the fundamental problem to be solved in Ireland was—

“To draw a distinct line between what was the property of the landlord and what was the property of the tenant.”

My contention is that that maxim laid down so wisely more than 50 years ago by that Conservative statesman has never yet been carried out. We have not yet arrived at a real separation of what is the property of the landlord from that of the tenant. Mr. Knipe, one of the Cowper Commission, in his separate Report, said—

matter if tenants were compelled to purchase upon the basis of judicial rents fixed prior to January, 1886, or that they should involve themselves in all the consequences and responsibilities of ownership before rents have been readjusted, so as not only to meet the fall in prices, but also to exclude from the rent the value of the tenant's interest and improvements. I am anxious to see dual ownership abolished, but purchase on any large scale can only follow the revision and reduction of rents."

That is the opinion of a man of practical experience in regard to land matters in the North of Ireland, who up to that time, at any rate, was a warm supporter of the policy of Her Majesty's Government. I will refer to only one more statement, which I think will be held to be one of weight and force in support of my contention that the rents of Ireland are not nearly fair, and that until they are any scheme of land purchase which enables the landlords to bargain on the basis of so many years' purchase of a rent which is confessedly unjust, can only result in social confusion and economic discomfiture. There was a Memorandum appended to the Cowper Commission, signed by the Bishop of Elphin and other bishops of the Roman Catholic Church. I will not read it, because the Chief Secretary and others must know it by heart. It put forward in the most moderate terms the contention I am now insisting upon, that the rents are not fair, and that they do include a portion of the tenants' improvements and the tenants' interest, and that until you have righted that fundamental wrong, land purchase will always remain tainted and full of danger. We know what happened in this House in regard to the Healy clause in 1881, and what happened in Ireland in the decision of the case of "Adams v. Dunseath," which practically placed at the mercy of the landlord the tenants' improvements from one end of Ireland to the other. When the Healy clause came under the consideration of this House the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone), in urging the restoration of the clause in this House, after its mutilation by the Lords, said—

"The doctrine accepted at the time of the Land Act of 1870 was that the tenants' improvements were the tenants' own property, and he would not admit the principle that the time during which he had enjoyed those improvements was any reason of their passing from him."

Mr. Channing

That is the basis of our contention. On the decision of the Courts in Ireland these rents have remained tainted with unfairness, and do involve an injustice to the tenants. We were returned to the House of Commons as persistent opponents of land purchase from whatever side it came. There is no question upon which the Liberal Party would be so firm and so unanimous as the question upon which I am now addressing the House. But the Bill of 1886 had, at least, these two great merits, that it carried out what the First Lord had insisted upon in 1883, that the administration of land purchase in Ireland should be entrusted to authorities locally responsible, and there was machinery in that Bill for the assessment of a fair price under certain circumstances. Then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in his Bill deducted from the judicial rent 20 per cent. on the average for rates, tithe rentcharge, repairs and other outgoings of the estate, but in the estimate laid before us by the Chief Secretary last spring the deduction made in this respect was only 7 per cent., and was based entirely upon rates. In the Bill of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian you had 20 per cent. reduction for every £100 of judicial rent, while in the present Bill you have only a reduction of 7 per cent., which makes a difference of £13 or £14 in the £100 in favour of the Bill of 1886, if you take the same number of years' purchase. I denounce this Bill as a sham, a delusion, and a dishonest settlement of the land question. I denounce it as a Bill for the benefit of a class. And I denounce it most of all as a bribe to obtain the consent of the ignorant peasants of Ireland to a robbery, not only of themselves, but of the taxpayers of this country. The hon. Member for Haddington said there were substantial farmers in Ireland. Thank Heaven there are, but what I ask is whether the credit of the country should be invoked for the improvement of the condition of men of capital and substance in Ireland? I hold in my hand a series of letters upon the operation of Lord Ashbourne's Act by the Times Commissioner. He says—

"The first man I met was able to boast of holding farms under five landlords, 'some good and some bad.' He was evidently a very substantial farmer, and had a fine lot of cattle. His holding on the Lane-Fox property was one of 140 acres, the old rent of which had been £155, reduced in 1883 to £147, and his annuity will be £102 per annum. Another man had formerly paid £105, but this had been reduced to £92, and he will now have to pay £60 a year for 49 years, which he considered 'a pretty fair bargain.' One of the next houses was as nice and well kept as any farmer's place in England. There was a small flower garden in front of the door, and the kitchen was as neat as if it had been a sitting-room. A set of old pewter plates and dishes, well polished, were ranged on the dresser, and there was not a speck of dust to be seen. The parlour was carpeted and well furnished. There was a bowl of flowers on the table, and excellent engravings of the Queen and Prince Albert hanging on the walls. The owner, who was evidently a most industrious and thriving man, held 74 acres, the old rent of which had been £85 reduced to £80. The value was £78, and the interest on his purchase money came to £56 a year."

There are dozens of such cases I could quote from this volume, but what I ask is, is it fair that in such cases the credit of the British taxpayer should be invoked? I am quite ready to apply in Ireland the same principles as are applied to allotments in England, and the object of providing allotments is to benefit those who are now crushed down in the social scale and who need the help of the Government in order to enable them to obtain a better position. That is one side of the question. We know that the Chief Secretary has excluded graziers from the Bill, but he has not attempted to exclude men in the condition so graphically described by the Times correspondent. Let me turn now to the congested districts, and I say at once I am heartily in sympathy with the motives of the Government; but I do not think they have set about the solution of the problem in the right way. I do not think it can be solved by the action of a Board in Dublin. I challenge the congested district part of the Bill on two grounds. In the first place, there is no real Local Authority brought in to superintend the transfer, and in the second place, the necessity I have insisted upon of a fair price tells, in regard to the congested districts, with infinitely greater force. Hon. Members talk glibly of so many years' purchase in the congested districts. So many years' purchase of what? Why, we know that the rent in these congested districts consists not only of the landlord's reasonable share in the produce of the land, but also of the share which, backed up by the forces of the law and the battering ram, he has forcibly embezzled from earnings of harvesters in England, the wages of housemaids in America, and the earnings of shepherd boys in distant parts of Ireland. We know the origin of these congested districts. Their first cause was political. The landlords found it convenient to have more tenants, because they wanted more voters, and therefore they divided the holdings. The next cause was the use which has been made by the Irish landlord of the potato. Sir James Caird said that the policy of the Irish landlords has been based upon the dependence of the Irish people upon the potato, and there was an article in the Times at the time of the great famine upon the same subject, which said—

"It is one of the means by which the landlord extracts a rent wholly out of proportion, not indeed to the natural wealth of the soil, but to the capital invested upon it. In a country without capital, and without that security for life and for property which capital requires, the comforts and decencies of life pull against rent. Could the Irish live on the tops of their potatoes, they could then give the roots to their landlords."

The Government brought in a very good Bill last year—a Bill which I took great pleasure in supporting—the Housing of the Working Classes Bill. The principle of that Bill was that the owner of unhealthy buildings and unhealthy areas should not profit by his own negligence. Well, let the principle of that Bill be applied to the congested districts in Ireland. The landlords who own congested districts in Ireland should not be allowed to take money out of the pockets of the British taxpayer, because of their impolicy, indiscretion, cruelty, injustice, and extortion. But the Government, instead of making these men contribute to heal the festering sores which they have created, are going to hand over to them the remainder of the Irish Fund, the last asset of Ireland, which I contend belongs to the whole of Ireland, and is not for the benefit of men who deserve no consideration from the House, for in the development of a system of land purchase—a system which will enable them to capitalise their extortion from the tenants, not only of the results of the produce of their holdings, but the earnings of their friends in America. There is another consideration which seems to me to be again and again lost sight of. It is this: If you have Home Rule—and Home Rule you will have ere long—one of the important results will be that you will have a real national life in Ireland. [Laughter.] You mock at Irish national life, but Irish national life may laugh at you before long. You will have this result, that there will be a development of industries in various centres of Ireland, and you will consequently have migration from congested districts to the centres of new and various work. You will cease then to have competition for miserable holdings in the West of Ireland, and, therefore, the value of the land there will decrease. You have no sound economic basis on which to rest land purchase, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted as much two years ago, when the second edition of the Ashbourne Act was before the House. There is no real security or value in the land, and if Home Rule is carried out, and fresh and various industries are started, you will soon be brought face to face with the bare agricultural value of the land, which is practically nil, and you will find that the money laid out upon it has been lost to the English people. Valuable suggestions have been made by those who are connected with the Land Commission in Ireland. The Chief Secretary has based his scheme on the suggestions of Mr. Lynch and Mr. McCarthy, but he has not carried them out in that spirit and scope with which they were laid before the Land Commissioners. I, for one, as a Radical in this House, am ready to support a policy of dealing vigorously with these congested districts, and I am not disinclined to see the Imperial credit applied to the relief of the poor people of these congested districts. But what we must look to as the only solution of the question is the handing over to the Local Authority, under, of course, Imperial checks, power to acquire the whole of the estates in these congested districts, at a fair price, and not the artificial price which coercion and the circumstances of Ireland have enabled the land lords to place upon the land. Let the Local Authorities acquire the land at a fair price; let them, and not the landlords, administer questions of bog and of turbary. Let the land be municipalised; let the Local Authorities have power to buy land in neighbouring districts, and to transfer such of the population as is desirable, in order to lighten the pressure in the congested districts. These are suggestions which, of course, are of no use to Her Majesty's Government. They are determined to refuse the formation of a Local Authority for this purpose. The Chief Secretary has talked about a plébiscite, and we have heard the further explanation of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, that a Local Authority is undesirable, because they are interested in the question of the land. I should think that is just the very reason why they should have the powers which I suggest. I conclude by protesting against this Bill, because in its inception and origin, and in its machinery, it is a Compensation Bill, and because it carries out a system of land purchase which involves risk to the English taxpayer, without ensuring at all to the Irish tenant a fair rent or his interest in his holding.

*(1.10.) SIR JOHN COLOMB (Bow, Tower Hamlets): Sir, the Bill before the House consists of two parts. One provides for a continuation of the policy already adopted by Parliament, and the other is to provide for something entirely new, and that is the practical remedies, the administrative machinery, and the money, to enable an effort to be made for the amelioration of the condition of the congested districts. I call the attention of the House to this fact, that while speakers on the other side have been going up and down the country picturing the gaunt figure of famine stalking through the land, the measure providing remedies for the difficulties of the congested districts has been delayed by an hon. Member moving the adjournment last night, and who does not even take the ordinary course of continuing the Debate himself next day. And the burning desire of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby for further discussion is evinced by his coming in after the Debate has been going on one hour and a half. The country and the people of Ireland will judge them. [Cheers.] The Gentlemen who cheer do not live in Ireland. I repeat, that the people of Ireland will recognise who are desirous of passing measures for their relief in the congested districts, and who desire to delay them. I venture to think that the speech of the hon. Member who has just sat down would never have been delivered if he had any practical knowledge of Ireland. But there was one remarkable passage on which I will touch. He said that he was certain that the question of the congested districts could not be settled by a Board sitting in Dublin. The hon. Gentleman will, therefore, concede this—that it cannot be settled by a Parliament sitting in Dublin. [Mr. CHANNING: Why not?] I leave the hon. Gentleman himself to explain. Turning now to the Amendment before the House, it is quite obvious that everything has been stuffed into it that may give rise to interminable debate. It makes the assertion that exceptional powers of eviction have been given to Irish landlords. I challenge hon. Gentlemen opposite to establish that assertion by reference to facts. If a comparison is made between the powers of the landlords in London and those of the Irish landlords, it will be found that the powers of the latter are restricted and restrained in a way those of the former are not. Then the Amendment speaks of the landlords' interest being maintained at an artificial value. What is the meaning of that? Is it that the Land Courts, created by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, are keeping up the value of the land in Ireland at an artificial standard? We know perfectly well that the judicial rents are fixed, after due inquiry, by these Courts, established by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), and supported by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir W. Harcourt). It is rather strange proceeding on the part of the supporters of these right hon. Gentlemen to condemn the machinery which they created. Now, the Bill before the House is a small Bill compared with the proposal introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in 1886. The amount of money is limited by financial considerations, while the proposal of 1886 was unlimited as regards financial responsibilities. We know that the only limit in the latter proposal was that the amount of money to be provided by the British taxpayer was to be drawn at the option of the Irish landlord. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), in introducing the Bill of 1886, on the 16th April, said it was—

"To undertake not a partial, tentative, and timid touching of the land question, but a serious endeavour to settle it."—(3 Hansard, Vol. 304, p. 1780.)

Again, he said—

"The object of this Act is to give to all Irish landowners the option of being bought out on the terms of the Act."—(3 Hansard, Vol. 304, p. 1794.)

Again, he said—

"The policy is a policy which is to be distinctly understood as the policy of giving this option to all Irish landowners as regards their rented land."—(3 Hansard, Vol. 304, p. 1794.)

Therefore, I do not think I overstate the case when I say that the financial responsibilities imposed upon the British taxpayer by the proposal of 1886 were only confined by the discretion of the Irish landlords. This Bill only provides £33,000,000 for converting tenants into owners; and I think it may be well to remind the House, in order to emphasise the statement respecting the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), that the annual value of the land in Ireland is £14,000,000, and the aggregate value of the buildings £2,500,000. Even supposing every house was built by tenants, which it is not the case, you have £11,500,000 as the aggregate value of the land in Ireland. Therefore, if you multiply that by so many years' purchase, you get, under the proposal of 1886, into hundreds of millions to be saddled on the British taxpayer. It is important to remember that. But why are we considering the question of land purchase at all? It is because the land legislation of the last generation has been such as to get landlords and tenants in Ireland into a state of confusion, or hodge-podge. The only way out of the difficulty is to create new owners. That is admitted on all hands. [Mr. CALEB WRIGHT: No.] Well, it is admitted by all thinking persons. I would like to remind hon. Gentlemen who controvert the statement, I would like to remind them that the hon. Member for Cork, in his celebrated Kilmainham letter, used these words—

“It is unnecessary for me to dwell upon the enormous advantage to be derived from the full extension of the Purchase Clauses, which now seem practically to have been adopted by all parties.”

["No!"] If Gentlemen say “No” to arguments in favour of the termination of dual ownership in Ireland, then their quarrel lies not with me, but with the hon. Member for Cork. I say that this Bill before the House is really a full extension of the purchasing clauses, restricted only by financial considerations, and the necessary securities for the money advanced. Turning from that, I agree entirely with what my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary said last night, that this Bill is not going to terminate dual ownership in Ireland, but that it will make a large impression upon the present unsatisfactory condition of things arising out of dual ownership as it now exists in Ireland. I also endorse what the right hon. Gentleman said, that as time goes on it will be found that many tenants of Ireland will find themselves better under landlords than under the Land Commission. While there can be elasticity in relations between the landlords and their tenants, there can be no such elasticity between the tenants and the Land Commission. From experience I can entirely endorse that view. I have said to tenants that I wondered they did not go to the Land Commission to get their rents fixed, and they have replied that, if they did so, they would have to pay to the day. “Certainly. Why do you not purchase; perhaps that will meet your case?” The invariable answer I have received is—“We know we can squeeze the landlords; we cannot squeeze the Government.” That is an obvious and practical way of looking at the matter. I wish to say that I do not believe that this is a final settlement of the Irish question. I do not believe there is any legislative solution for the difficulties which now exist in Ireland. I believe these difficulties are too deep for legislation to touch. No Parliament on College Green could do it. The Irish question can only be settled by the lapse of time, the education of the people, and improvement of the individual. But the Government is doing what is right in endeavouring to clear away obstacles to the free exercise of liberty and to strengthen the appreciation of the rights of property in Ireland, no matter to what class they belong. With regard to the question of local control, I am in entire sympathy with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, but my practical experience teaches me that the attitude of the Chief Secretary on that point is correct. I think that a provision might be introduced into this Bill in a direction which I will indicate. I do not understand whether the labourers who hold allotments as tenants of Boards of Guardians are included in the Bill or not. I feel it very important that they should be so included. I do not see why a labourer is to be excluded simply because he is the tenant of a Board of Guardians, when so-called farmers, who are really labourers, are included. I hope the Government will consider this question and include those labourers, for I believe in that way you might get an expression of local opinion that would be valuable as to the operation of the Act. Supposing we made the operation of the Act in any county contingent upon the Unions of the county resolving to include their own tenants occupying labourers' cottages and allotments. In that way local authority would be invoked, and Boards of Guardians, in selling to their tenants, would not likely sell below the true value. I throw out the hint. I ask the House to note how very badly the farmer often treats the labourers of Ireland. I have often had to interfere between tenants and labourers in order to get even the commonest justice done to the labourers by the so-called farmer, and, knowing what I do of the labouring population of Ireland, I say that I have a higher opinion of them than I have of the farmers in respect of their capacity for work. I entreat the Chief Secretary to look into the question, and to see whether it is not possible to extend the operation of this Bill to labourers who, under the Labourers' Act, are tenants of Boards of Guardians. The attitude of farmers sitting on Boards of Guardians towards them is illustrated by something which appeared on the 8th of November last in the organ of the evicted Tipperary tenants, called New Tipperary. In this paper, under the head-line "Tipperary Union," is the description of the case of a labourer who, having been evicted by the Board of Guardians, had re-entered and taken forcible possession. The article says—

"At a meeting of the Tipperary Board of Guardians the collector of rents reported that a labourer named Ryan who had been evicted at a cost of £6 had again taken possession of the cottage. The Clerk to the Board said that the Guardians should take action to prevent the repetition of such conduct. Some Guardians acquiesced, observing that if this were tolerated labourers would do what they liked, while other Guardians were indisposed to prosecute, and advocated a reduction in the rents of the labourers. Ultimately it was decided to prosecute Ryan for re-taking possession."

Thus an organ run in the interest of evicted farm tenants who did not choose to pay rent, although they were able to do so, declared that a labourer's attempt to follow their example thus set must not be tolerated. I think that by calling in a Local Authority it would soon be discovered that tenants who represented ratepayers on Boards of Guardians would take a view of the value of land in the case of the labourers different from that which they have taken in their own case.

MR. PINKERTON (Galway): How many ex officio Guardians attended at that meeting quoted by the hon. and gallant Member?

*SIR J. COLOMB: I have read an extract from New Tipperary, and I have yet to learn that there are ex officio leading article writers on the staff of either that organ or of United Ireland. Our object ought to be to substitute a healthy opinion for that which has been produced by a falsely got up agitation. I am sorry to detain the House, but I wish to explain that I regard the congested districts clauses as the most important part of this Bill.

Having lived long in a congested district I thank the Government for approaching this part of the question from a rational, common-sense, practical point of view. That has never before been done, and the state of things in these districts have usually been used as a lever to secure the reduction of rents of men occupying large tracts of splendid land in the Golden Vale of Tipperary. It is sometimes said that in these congested districts a large portion of the land has no real value as rent producing land. If that assertion be limited to agricultural land it is, no doubt, true that it has little or no economic value, but I say that the mountains and bogs have an economic value if it is only called out by wise legislation. A great portion of the congested districts is not adapted to ordinary agricultural purposes. In some districts there are tenants who are endeavouring to utilise large areas of mountain land as dairy farms that are fit only for sheep walks. All this land would be of great economic value if it were applied to the purpose for which Nature evidently intended it—say, for the growth of timber; but such a use of it is absolutely incompatible with the conditions of the Land Act. There may be quarries, mines, fisheries, and great capabilities for sport. As far as I can make out this Bill makes over to tenant purchasers rights for which as tenant they have never paid. For instance, take the ordinary condition of things in a congested district. You have the low-lying land let in small patches to tenants who have besides in common enormous mountain runs; but rights of timber, of mines, minerals, and sport are all reserved to the landlords. They are specially excluded in judicial rents, and yet they are to be transferred to purchasers. These rights are valuable, and they ought not to be thrown in as a make-weight. They are in a sense national property. I will explain what I mean by that. Everything that goes to create wealth is national property; the nation may distribute it among individuals in private ownership; nevertheless it is national property in the sense in which I use the term. There ought to be some arrangement made by which when the landlord sells the tenant shall have the option of purchasing, at so many years' purchase on a valuation, rights of timber, fishing, sporting, and mining; and if he does not so purchase, and the landlord who sells does not care to reserve for his own use these rights, I would have the rights made over to the Local Authority, the Local Authority paying the valuation to the landlord, which the tenant refused to pay. To that I attach considerable importance, because I say it is essential to the welfare of the congested districts that intelligence and knowledge of the outside world should not be entirely driven away, as they will be if rights and enjoyments which have hitherto been preserved to landlords are bartered away to the purchasing tenants for nothing at all. I therefore trust that these two points will attract the attention of the Irish Government, i.e., first the inclusion in the Act of labourers who are tenants under Boards of Guardians, and secondly, the invoking the aid of the Local Authority in securing that the land, especially in the congested districts, is put to its natural uses. Whilst admitting that the Bill will not produce a final settlement in Ireland, I am thankful to the right hon. Gentleman for having introduced it, because I know there are many tenants who are looking forward anxiously for the passing of it; and the benefits of its operation, I believe, will extend to the people of this country.

(1.44.) SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I had no intention of trespassing on the attention of the House, and should not have done so had not the hon. and gallant Member pointedly attacked me for saying a word last night in favour of the Adjournment of the Debate. I only spoke then from the knowledge I had that there were several Gentlemen who desired to speak on the subject. Of all the instances of human depravity, can any compare with hostile criticism on the Adjournment of the Debate coming from the hon. and gallant Member, who wished to deliver the carefully prepared and valuable speech to which we have listened with the greatest interest? If I have in any manner contributed to providing an opportunity for the delivery of that speech, I ought to receive thanks, if not from the hon. Member, at all events from the House itself. The hon. and gallant Member spoke with great personal knowledge on the subject, and I listened to his speech with great interest and, I may add, with considerable instruction. I only wish his own leaders had been present to see the illumination the hon. and gallant Member is capable of throwing upon the subject. I hope, therefore, that upon due consideration the hon. and gallant Member will think more charitably of what I did last night. I do not desire to detain the House, but I think the suggestion that I and others have sought to pursue the arts of obstruction is very ill founded on the course which has been adopted to-day, and, as I never refuse a challenge coming from an adequate quarter, I could not ignore that thrown out by the hon. and gallant Member. If I attempted to go into the subject under discussion at the present time, all I could say is that I do not agree with the hon. and gallant Member when he observes that all thinking men are against dual ownership, because a stronger argument for dual ownership has never been delivered than that of the hon. and gallant Gentleman himself, and I consider him a thinking man. He told the House the tenants do not want to do away with dual ownership; and some months ago there was a very strong letter from the Marquess of Waterford, who may be considered a thinking gentleman I suppose, and he said the best and most successful land tenure in Ireland was the old Ulster custom, which is pure dual ownership, and which existed long before the Act of 1870 and other Acts. Then the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh has strongly expressed himself to the same effect, and therefore again I hope the hon. and gallant Gentleman will modify his view with reference to the opinion of thinking men on the subject of dual ownership. Another point in the speech of the hon. and gallant Gentleman which I listened to with some astonishment was his pronouncement on the Conservative doctrine of land nationalisation. That was worth hearing, and will afford food for reflection for all thinking men, because he holds that that which the tenant has no right to is the property of the nation. It is held by some eminent writers that all property is the property of the nation, but that is an important question on which I will not now enter, and the treatment of which depends not a little on its special application. I am not going into the very large matters which the hon. and gallant Gentleman thought fit to introduce into the Debate; I only rose to explain my interposition last night, which, if it has had no other fruit, has produced the speech of the hon. and gallant Gentleman.

(1.48.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I do not presume or pretend to represent the Irish Members in the few words I am about to address to the House. I only rise to point out a notable omission in the Bill. Now, in the congested districts part of the Bill there is a certain amount of provision for adding to the holdings of tenants. It is not a sufficient provision, in my opinion, but it might be readily re-modelled in Committee so as to make it work satisfactorily. By a short Act of Parliament, which was recently passed at my instigation, the Land Commission had power under certain peculiar circumstances to allow the tenants to purchase land in addition to their actual holdings, and that Act has received the highest commendation from the Land Commissioners, and has worked most advantageously in the few cases in which it has been applied. As the Bill now before the House is a very large Bill, I want the Government to deal with this matter on a more extended scale. What is the use of allowing a man to purchase three acres of land? It is not sufficient for the necessities of a family. If a man has half an acre of land he becomes a labourer or a carter; if he has 10 or 12 acres he can live on his holding and be a farmer. But with three acres of land he is neither one thing nor the other, and he consequently drifts into poverty. I want the Government to put into their Bill a provision by which these tenants may increase their holdings. Such a provision would be very beneficial to the landlords and would be of the greatest advantage to a large number of tenants. By enabling the small tenants thus to increase their holdings the Government would satisfy the cravings of the western portion of the country more than by any other provision contained in the Bill. I desire also to see some definition in the Bill of what is a congested district, because we want elasticity in dealing with those districts. There are portions of Connemara which are less under the influence of the congestion than parts of richer counties. There are districts where the holdings are large and the people able to live on them; but on the other hand in Galway, although the population generally may be sparse in particular districts, the people are crowded together, and the holdings are too small. The provisions of the Bill regarding seed potatoes may be excellent for another year, but they are useless for this year.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): Hear, hear!

COLONEL NOLAN: I am glad to elicit that expression of opinion from a Member of the Government, and I trust that some steps will be taken to afford the necessary relief this year.

*(1.58.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): The hon. and gallant Member for the Bow Division of Tower Hamlets commenced his speech by a statement showing that he was in the way of rapidly becoming a good Home Ruler, for he contended that no Member who did not live in Ireland had a right to speak on a purely Irish question. I am disposed to agree with him in that, but I submit that this is more of an English than an Irish question, for it involves English credit to a much larger extent, I believe, than the Bill purports to show. The hon. and gallant Member made an elaborate comparison between the proposals of the Government and the Bill of 1886 brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. He appeared desirous of making me responsible for that Bill. Now, I do not propose to enter into that comparison or to point out the important points in which the two Bills differ; but as far as I am personally concerned, I may say that nothing I said in 1886 is inconsistent with the position I now occupy. In 1886 I said that portions of the Bill then before the House did not meet with my approval, and should the measure go into Committee I would raise those points. But turning to the Bill now under debate, it has been commended to the House as one which will effect a complete and final settlement, if not immediately, at any rate ultimately, of the land question in Ireland, as one which will ultimately do away with dual ownership, which will create a vast body of small peasant proprietors, and which will effect all this without any more than a mere theoretic danger to the English taxpayer. If I thought the Bill would be a complete and final settlement of the land question I would be very unwilling to oppose it; but I am confident that the Bill as now framed will not bring contentment to Ireland, but will lead to new agitation, will give rise to other difficulties, and will not be confined to the £30,000,000 of English credit which is now demanded. Even on the showing of the Chief Secretary, it will be necessary to advance £95,000,000 before the settlement will be complete. It is easy to show, moreover, that on the principle of the measure it will take about 100 years for the completion of the settlement and for the abolition of dual ownership, even on the assumption that all the landlords are willing to sell upon the reasonable terms which are contemplated. Meanwhile, there will be constant agitation and constant pressure, both on the landlords to agree to sales and on the State to advance more money. This measure is presented as a great remedial measure for Ireland founded on the advance of English money. A first principle of wise statesmanship is that a remedial measure should be accepted as such by the Representatives of the people for whom it is intended; but there is no evidence whatever that any large section of people in Ireland accept this measure in that spirit. The Representatives of the Irish people voted against the measure of last year, which was practically identical with that before the House, by a majority of four to one. There is no doubt that the Irish Members look upon the Bill with extreme suspicion, that they believe in many respects it is not in good faith, that the object of many of the clauses is to screw up the price of land in the interest of landlords. This year the Irish Party are unable to give attention to the Bill. Their attention is distracted by internal matters; but there is no evidence whatever of their acceptance of the scheme. Again, the tenant farmers in the North of Ulster have declared, through their Associations, that they will never be satisfied until this measure is made compulsory and universal. They say that it is very hard that those who have paid their rents with regularity should find themselves debarred from taking advantage of the Bill because their landlords refuse their consent, while those who have agitated and given their landlords great trouble will get the full advantage. They demand universally that where landlords refuse to consent to sell on reasonable terms they should be compelled to do so by the Land Commission at a price to be fixed by the Commission. Turning to the landlords, I do not find that there is any general support to the measure; those landlords who desire to remain in the country and to live with their tenants are strongly opposed to it. They know that it will give rise to an agitation against them, and to a demand for their expropriation. The people who are in favour of it are the great absentee landlords, who desire to clear out of the country, the great landlords like the Duke of Abercorn and Lord Waterford, who desire to reduce their estates in the country, and the English mortgagees who desire to realise their mortgages. As to the scheme of the Bill, I will assume that the measure as it stands will have every success which the Chief Secretary can expect; that within a very few years, say four or five, the whole of the sum will be applied for, and that tenants to that amount will be converted into owners on reasonable terms—namely, about 18 years' purchase. At 18 years' purchase those tenants will pay 28 per cent. less than their previous rents in the shape of interest and instalments. That is not, however, the full measure of the benefit. The annual repayment of capital is in the nature of an investment: it increases the interest of the owner, and is not to be compared with the same amount of rent. The real comparison is between the previous rent and that portion of the tenant's annual payment which represents interest. Looked at in this way the real reduction is 46 per cent., or nearly one-half. When, therefore, the £30,000,000 are exhausted there will be about 130,000 tenant-purchasers paying 28 per cent. less than their previous rent for a limited term, or enjoying an advantage equivalent to 46 per cent. on their previous rent; while the remaining three-fourths of the tenants will be paying their old rents for ever. The amount available for extending the scheme will be about £400,000 a year, and at that rate it will be 100 years before the remaining tenants can be dealt with. Is that a condition of things which is likely to be a settlement? Just in proportion as those who obtain this benefit are contented, so those who are left out in the cold will be discontented. The Chief Secretary has felt the strength of this argument and has endeavoured to lessen it. For five years he provides that the purchaser shall pay 80 per cent. of his previous rent. That is a mere blind. The tenant who pays this extra amount for the first five years will derive the advantage of a reduced payment later. The real comparison between the tenant who has bought and the tenant who remains a tenant is unaffected. The one will receive an advantage equal to 46 per cent. of his rent, or 28 per cent. for a term of years; the other will pay rent for ever. Suppose two estates adjoining one another where the tenants are equally anxious to buy on these terms. The landlord of the one consents, the other refuses. I ask whether the tenants who continue to pay their rent will be content? It is certain that an overwhelming and irresistible agitation will arise for making this scheme universal and compulsory; and if this House refuses to advance the further £90,000,000 necessary for the purpose, there will be an agitation for an equivalent reduction of rent. The fact is, we shall have created by these transactions a new standard of rent. No one has appreciated that prospect better than the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell), who supports the Bill with the full knowledge that such agitation must arise. This is what he said in an able article in one of the monthly reviews a few months ago—

"The measure will introduce a new standard of rent. No Irish tenants will consent to pay more for the hire of their land than some of their neighbours are paying for their purchase. The present fair rents, which have been judicially fixed, will then appear so unfair that a new agitation will spring up, and such pressure will be brought to bear upon landlords that they will practically have no choice but to sell. One result of this will be that it will be impossible to stop lending when the limit of £33,000,000 has been reached, and it is well Parliament should understand that once it is committed to the principle of land purchase it must go on until the whole body of tenants is dealt with."

And again he said—

"In my own constituency a large estate has recently passed from owner to occupier. The transaction has meant a reduction of 30 per cent. on the judicial rent, and a terminable annuity takes the place of an annual rent. The result is that every tenant in South Tyrone is discontented, and compulsory sale is demanded in every fair and market. The larger the transfer the greater the benefit, the more will the feeling spread."

I quite agree with the hon. Member. There will be a universal demand either for compulsion and expropriation of landlords at the average rates of sale and for an immediate further advance of £60,000,000, or for an equivalent reduction of rent. Let me illustrate the argument by specified cases. The House will be rather surprised to hear that the Land Purchase Commissioners have refused their assent to schemes of purchase in no less than 3,000 cases. In nearly the whole of these cases the Land Commissioners have refused their assent on the ground that the number of years' purchase agreed upon between landlord and tenant was too high in relation to the security offered to the State. I believe I am right in saying that in no single case of that kind have the terms of purchase been more than 18 or 19 years' purchase; in very many of the cases I am informed the number of years' purchase has been as low as 10 or 12. I actually know of one case where the terms of purchase were as low as five years. I ask the House to think what the result is in this case. The landlord and the tenants agreed to five years' purchase, and the Land Commissioners refused their assent to the transaction. The tenants then continued to pay the old rent. If the Land Commissioners had given their consent to the scheme of purchase, the tenants' payment would have been reduced to one-fifth of what was the previous rent. How is it possible that you can maintain the rents at their present rate in cases of that kind? In this case the tenants have already gone to the Land Commission and got judicial rents fixed, but you have one Government Department saying the rents are so high that there is practically no security to the State in case of purchase, and you have another Government Department maintaining the rents at their present rate. That is an unstable condition of things.

*MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): Can the right hon. Gentleman state whether in the case he refers to the Purchase Commissioners based their refusal to agree to the purchase on the rent or the size of the holding?

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: On the rent. Of course, the holdings were very small; the rents averaged £4 or £5 a year. But that very much strengthens my argument. Here are tenants paying £4 or £5 a year, and if they could have got the assent of the Land Commissioners they would have had their annual payments reduced to one-fifth of what they previously were. There is one other point I wish to advert to, and that is the position towards the state of the tenant-purchasers under the Act. We have had a good deal of light thrown upon this relation by the events of the past few months. In previous discussions on this subject I have said that I do not expect that the tenant-purchasers will repudiate their obligations; the pressure will come from them in a more insidious form, grounded on inability to pay through the fall of prices, or other causes. That is what has happened during the last few months. There have been numerous Petitions and Memorials presented to the Land Commission by large bodies of purchasers praying for relief in various forms. The Chief Secretary has said that they are all of a stereotyped form, and are not worthy of attention. That is not the case. I have eight of them in my hand. The petitioners allege various causes for their applications, and they apply in various forms for remission. Some ask for remission on the ground that, by reason of a great fall of prices, they are unable to pay their instalments; others allege the failure of crops; many allege that they were coerced into terms of purchase by threats of eviction. This Petition from 17 tenant-purchasers in the County of Kerry is an illustration of the kind of pressure they will bring to bear. In this the petitioners say—

“That on account of poverty, the fall in prices, and the potato famine, they are unable to meet the instalment due, and they therefore humbly request inquiry into their allegations, the truth of which they offer to support by documents; that they were compelled to purchase harassed by rack rent and writs of ejectment held over them. They had no option but to buy or leave their holdings. They pray for an extension of time and a reduction in the amount of the instalments.”

This is an illustration of many cases of the same kind, varying in circumstances, but all based on the representation that they were coerced into the scheme of purchase by threats of eviction or otherwise. Hon. Members may have doubts if these representations are true; but unfortunately we have evidence from the Land Commission that threats have been used by landlords and their agents to force tenants into purchase. Mr. J. G. McCarthy, the head of the Land Commission, stated before the last Royal Commission that agents exercised pressure by telling a tenant that he must either sign a contract of sale or go out, and Mr. McCarthy said he had seen a letter of the kind, and had in his possession a letter from the agent of an extensive estate telling a tenant that he could not put off the Sheriff beyond the morrow, but that if he entered into a contract for purchase he would get possession. It is beyond doubt that there are cases in which such pressure has been used, cases in which tenants have been coerced into purchase by threats of eviction. I am not concerned with further inquiry into the truth of these statements. It is not necessary for my argument to go into the question whether these representations are founded upon truth or not, but they are very significant indications of the kind of pressure that will be brought to bear in the future. It may be easy for the Land Commission to intervene and prevent such cases where tenant-purchasers are not numerous; it may be possible to protect tenant-purchasers under such circumstances when they are few in number, but if, we multiply cases by hundreds—if, instead of there being 4,000 or 5,000 applications brought into Court there should be 150,000 and thousands more under renewed applications to Parliament for further advances, where will there be any force on the part of the Land Commission in Ireland or on the part of the Executive in Ireland under pressure of Petitions of this kind from all parts of the country, where will be the force to insist on prompt payments, or to evict those who do not pay their instalments? My conviction is, that it will be almost impossible for any Central State Department to insist on payment, or for County Courts to enforce evictions. I should have pointed out before that the kind of relief tenant-purchasers ask for is not so much reduction of the amount as a postponement of the instalments. What they ask for generally is either that the present instalment shall be postponed until after the whole term of 49 years is over, or that the term over which payment of the capital is spread may be extended to 60 or 99 years, making a very important reduction in the amount of the instalments. My belief is that the form in which pressure will come will not be by repudiation. I do not believe that, but in a demand for an extended period of payment from 49 to 99 years. When that comes from a vast body of tenant-purchasers, enforced very likely by political action in this House, I believe it will be extremely difficult, if not impossible, for a Central Department to resist the demand. Such a scheme can only be carried out with safety, with any prospect of collecting the annual amounts if the collection is made by a Local Authority interested to a large extent in collecting the money. The Chief Secretary told us last night that evictions would not be carried out by the Land Commission in the interest of the State, but of the Local Authority. But if the sympathies of the district are evoked on behalf of the tenant-purchasers, where will be the force on behalf of the Local Authority? I believe the Land Commission in the long run will find it most difficult, if not impossible, to insist on any very great scale in presence of pressure such as I have referred to, on the prompt payment of instalments, the faithful fulfilment year by year of these obligations, or in enforcing eviction of those who do not pay. I will not detain the House at any greater length; but it appears to me that a scheme of this kind, if it is to be carried out, must be coupled with many precautions and conditions. I began by saying that if I thought this was likely to give content and be a permanent settlement of the question, I would not oppose it. I have never been an opponent of some limited scheme in this direction, but there are certain conditions absolutely essential to make it more safe for the Imperial Exchequer and the taxpayer, and to create content throughout Ireland. The first condition is that the scheme shall be accepted by the majority of Irish Members as complete and final. Without this I believe any scheme would be dangerous. It must have popular assent elicited on its behalf. Secondly, the Local Authority ought to be the instrument for the collection of the annual payments, and responsible for the collection to act as a buffer between tenant-purchasers and the State. My opinion is, that the collection of the annual payments by any Central State Department would be dangerous, and would probably result in failure. Thirdly, in my opinion the operation of the measure ought to be confined to the small tenants of Ireland. The object of the Bill is to create peasant proprietors, but the Bill actually goes far beyond that. It will enable a class of persons far removed from the position of peasants to become proprietors—farmers holding 200 or 300 acres, and paying a rent of £250 a year. These are not the persons we are interested in converting into owners at great expense or great risk to Imperial credit. Fourthly, it ought to be so framed as to be complete and final within the limits it proposes, not giving rise to further agitation and discontent on the part of a number of persons left outside the operation of the scheme. These are the main conditions which ought to be fulfilled in any proposal of this kind, the main conditions which were fulfilled by the two proposals made last Session by the hon. Member for Cork. I will not further allude to them, except to point out that there was an opportunity at that time for the Government to come to an agreement with the Irish Party on the subject, and I believe if they had accepted either of the proposals made by the hon. Member for Cork they could have framed a scheme likely to give contentment to Ireland, and not open to the many objections which have been pointed out in the present measure. But their scheme is so large and is so certain to lead to further demands, is so certain to give rise to discontent among large classes in Ireland, that I cannot give it my support. It will be attended with the greatest possible danger to the British taxpayer, and in no sense will it be a settlement of the question. On the contrary, far from it being anything of the kind, it will lead to greater agitation and give rise to feelings of discontent among a very large body of tenants in Ireland, who will be unable to avail themselves of the privileges offered by this Bill. Hence it is I shall vote against the Second Reading.

(242.) MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): This Debate has been made the opportunity of trotting out a number of fallacies we thought had been disposed of long ago. In this direction no speaker has distinguished himself more than the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken. In the first place, he says we are setting up a new standard of rent in Ireland; while the fact is, rent has really nothing to do with the subject in hand. The payments to be made by the tenant are payments by instalments of principal and interest, and not rent at all. That fallacy underlies the whole of his argument, and a great many other arguments which have been addressed to us by other and more important debaters. The right hon. Gentleman further said that in certain cases—and he dwelt on the fact—advances had been refused by the Land Commissioners, and that he had little doubt that this was because of the number of years' purchase in the proposals submitted to them. The fact of the matter is, the Land Purchase Commissioners have to look not at the number of years' purchase or existing rents, but at the total amount submitted to them and the sum to be advanced by the State for the purpose of enabling tenants to become owners of the property they occupy. The exposition of this fallacy completely removes one of the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman and one of his objections to the Bill. But he is not the only one who has argued under delusion. The Senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) and also the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian have given other instances of fallacious arguments disposed of long ago. We who are Unionist Members had no part in the pledges given against land purchase. That certainly is so, as far as I am individually concerned.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): Against a guarantee. I never said against land purchase.

MR. SINCLAIR: Against a guarantee; I will put it in that form.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Put it in that form if you like, it is a totally different policy.

MR. SINCLAIR: I, for one, quite admit the fact that land purchase on an extended scale cannot be adopted without some form of guarantee, Irish or British. Individually, I have invariably supported land purchase based on a British guarantee. The objection we held at the time of the General Election of 1886 was not to land purchase based on a British guarantee, but to the particular form of land purchase then put forward in the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman, then Prime Minister, and coupled as it was with the scheme of Home Rule for Ireland. In the first place, it was compulsory, and therefore the amount under the Bill one might be justified in saying was practically unlimited. Then, again, it seemed unequal and unfair because, though not universally, it was based on 20 years' purchase of the rents, rents in many cases since reduced by the Land Court. Then the security was considered bad, for it was a second mortgage.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: A first claim on the farm.

MR. SINCLAIR: I think the expenses, local and executive, were to be the first claim.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: No.

MR. SINCLAIR: Well, if I am wrong I apologise for using the argument. The principle of the Bill is an endeavour to transfer the property of the landlord to the occupying tenant, and, in the opinion of those who have the welfare of the country at heart, in that transfer lies the hope of a solution of a great deal of the difficulty that exists in Ireland. The security under this Bill and under the Ashbourne Act is ample — first, the land itself, not only the landlord's interest in it, but the tenant's interest, and then the 30 per cent. of the amount which is ultimately to be given to the landlord. Then we have 1 per cent. every year and the interest on each payment added year by year, an increasing security on behalf of the State. I do not think I ought to detain the House by going in detail into the advantages of land purchase; they are very great and have often been referred to in former Debates. I have already stated that one of the fallacies underlying much of the arguments of the opponents of this measure is on the question of rent. Now, one of the advantages of this scheme of land purchase is that it can be applied where a holding is rack-rented, or where the rent is fair and reasonable, simply by varying the years' purchase. Take two identical farms, one fairly rented at £15 a year, the other highly rented at £20. By simply in the one case arranging for the purchase of the farm at 20 years where it is fairly rented, and at 15 years in the other case, you in each case get identically the same sum of £300. The Commissioners, it must be remembered, will have simply to consider the amount to be advanced, not the way in which it has been arrived at. This entirely disposes of the argument of the hon. Member for Northampton, who says it cannot be supposed that the Irish tenant will be more reconciled to the payment of rent when the landlord is an alien Government in England. The English Government will not be the landlord, but will simply advance money on good security to the occupiers for repayment under the favourable terms of the Ashbourne Act and this Act. The benefit is not to the landlord only. Though this has been called a Landlords' Bill, it is far more a Tenants' Bill, and that is the reason why over the length and breadth of Ireland this land purchase scheme is loudly called for. The only real justification for the intervention of the State in matters of this kind is the part the State has taken in the past in creating the present difficult situation, and in its recognition by unfair laws in the past of the power of the landlord to charge rent on the improvements of the tenant, and the necessity that now exists for getting away from the present unhappy state of affairs and changing the system of land tenure by these advances to promote land purchase. We have satisfactory experience of the working of land purchase under these conditions so far as it has been in operation. Last year the Chief Secretary furnished me with certain statistics which give very favourable evidence on the subject. On 31st October last year, instalments to the amount of £235,000 had become due since the Land Purchase Acts had been in operation, and of this amount there was £2,590 still outstanding. Of that amount how much is there still outstanding in the shape of arrears? Out of nearly £3,000 there is only £216 owing. We have had two half years in which instalments have become due since, and out of a total of £410,000 instalments due on November 1st, according to the information given by the Chief Secretary the other day, the arrears are only £2,554. Here is evidence that the tenants of Ireland appreciate the advantage of land purchase by the payment of these instalments, and I may fairly say there is every encouragement to the Government to proceed further in the direction of land purchase. As was well stated by my hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) last night, we have had experience of purchases under the Ashbourne Act, under the Bright Clauses of the Land Act, and under the Church Act, and in the different circumstances under which they purchased the manner in which the tenants have kept up their payments gives every encouragement to proceed by further legislation in the same direction. There is, however, one danger in the Bill, I think, which it would be well for us to guard against. I have always felt that the only valid objection to the Ashbourne Act lay in the fact that it was possible to allow the tenant to pay too much for the landlord's interest, and practically to buy some of his own improvements in buying the landlord's share in the holding. I put an Amendment on the Paper last Session dealing with this subject. I proposed to cast on the Land Commission the duty not only of estimating the total value of the holding to see there is security for the advance, but the further duty of estimating the value of the landlord's and tenant's interests respectively, to enable the real and ostensible object of the Bill to be carried out, the purchase by the occupying tenant of the landlord's interest in the holding. It is not possible to judge from the examination I have been able to give to the Bill now before us, how far the Government have endeavoured to meet this valid objection to last year's Bill, but I trust when we see the second part that we shall find the suggestion has been adopted by the Government, or the difficulty in some way met. Then it has been stated there is danger in raising the limit of £50 for purchase under the Bill. Now, I think that a modification of the assistance to be given under this Bill might very fairly be considered. We had a very admirable speech from the hon. Member for Carnarvon yesterday, dealing with the danger that may exist in the creation of a new class of landlords in Ireland, worse than the old, and, certainly, such a danger would arise if the purchasers of large farms were allowed such a large margin as to enable them to sublet at a profit. It seems to me that while the Government may fairly ask the occupying tenants of farms of £30 or thereabouts to re-pay the principal at the rate of 1 per cent., where the value is more than £30 they may fairly ask an increased percentage. I would suggest that where the value is between £30 and £50 per annum the farmers should be required to pay at the rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.—3 per cent. for interest and $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for principal—and that where the value is over £50, 5 per cent. should be required, that is to say 3 per cent. for interest and 2 per cent. for principal. This, I think, would operate largely in favour of small tenants. If I were asked to find a reason why this Land Purchase Bill, or one like it, should be passed into law, I would go no farther than the speech made in Ireland by the hon. Member for Longford against the Bill. He used these remarkable words, advising the tenants against Land Purchase—

"Therefore, until a great Treaty of Peace has been made between England and Ireland, no Irish farmer ought to make a Treaty of Peace on his own account, and the man who purchases under the Ashbourne Act is making a Treaty of Peace behind the backs of the nation as a whole."

It is because I believe that the individual farmer, throughout the length and breadth of Ireland, is making a Treaty of Peace on his own account with the English people and the English nation, and that it will, thereby, assist in the restoration of peace and tranquillity to the nation at large, as well as bring additional happiness to himself and in his home, that I urge the passing of this Bill into law at the earliest possible moment. (3.5.)

(3.29.) MR. JOICEY (Durham, Chester-le-Street): I must express my surprise that this Bill, which, in my opinion, contains such a dangerous principle, has not met with stronger opposition in this House. I am very much surprised, too, that the Front Opposition Bench has not offered a stronger opposition to it. I have listened to the arguments which have been addressed to the House, since the Second Reading Debate began, most carefully, and I must say that in none of them have I seen anything to justify me in supporting the Bill. The hon. and gallant Member for Bow, who addressed the House a short time ago, stated that the Bill consisted of two parts—the land purchase portion, and the congested districts portion. But, for the purposes of this Second Reading Debate, we have to consider the Bill as a whole.

I confess that if the Bill had been introduced in two parts, I should not have offered very strong opposition to that part which deals with the congested districts. I recognise that there are difficulties in Ireland which require to be dealt with by Her Majesty's Government, and if that part of the Bill had been brought in as a separate measure, I would have given the Government the best assistance in my power to enable them to deal with these difficulties in a satisfactory manner. The hon. and gallant Member for Bow told us that, on comparing the measure with that which was introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), he regarded the present Bill as only a little one. I must say that that is an argument which does not have much weight with me. This is the third time a measure has been introduced for the extension of the right hon. Gentleman's measure. One measure that was introduced and passed is now known as Lord Ashbourne's Act, and in that we are asked to assent to an expenditure of £5,000,000. That Act was found in its operation to be insufficient, and a second measure was asked for, with the result that we now find ourselves called upon to increase the sum formerly agreed upon by something like £33,000,000. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Bow has stated that this Bill would not terminate dual ownership in Ireland, but that it will nevertheless make a large impression upon it. The meaning I gather from those words is nothing short of this, that the expenditure of a further sum of £33,000,000 will not be sufficient, but that the time will come when we shall be obliged to give a further sum, if we are to carry out this policy to its ultimate end. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary said last night that, in his opinion, it will require £95,000,000 to carry this land purchase scheme to its full extent; but the right hon. Gentleman very carefully guarded that expression of opinion by saying he had to confess that it was very difficult to make an accurate estimate. For my part I quite agree with what he has stated, and in my opinion £95,000,000 will no more settle the Irish land question than the £33,000,000 for which the Bill provides. In point of fact, the amount that will be required is practically only limited by the willingness of the landlords of Ireland to part with their property. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Bow pointed out that the Irish tenants were receiving various rights for which they were not called on to pay. Now, Sir, I take issue with the hon. and gallant Gentleman on that statement. I cannot believe that anything in the shape of timber or minerals is not taken into consideration by the landlord if he means to part with his property for so many years' purchase, and I do not agree with the hon. and gallant Gentleman in saying that anything which is on the property, and which is not paid for by the tenant, should become the property of the State. I am altogether opposed to that view of the question, and I must say that I think it a very dangerous thing, particularly for a Conservative politician, to advocate such a view as that. I must certainly express my surprise at the change of policy on the part of Her Majesty's Government on this question. I think if we were to look at the election addresses of hon. Members opposite, delivered on the occasion of the last General Election, we should find that, almost without exception, they declare themselves opposed to what is the main principle of this Bill. I was amused at the attempt made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) to give a reason for the support he is offering to this measure. When we are dealing with a Gentleman like him, who has again and again accused those who sit on these benches of having changed their minds in regard to the question of Home

Rule, I think I am entitled to say that he ought to be most particular in seeing that he has a good reason to put forward for having changed his mind on a question of this sort. Only the other day my attention was drawn to a speech delivered by the right hon. Gentleman on the 13th October, 1887, at Coolgraney, on the Irish land question, and I will trouble the House with a brief quotation from that address. The right hon. Gentleman said—

“The question, therefore, is how to establish a fair value for the transfer that all agree ought to be made. I do not believe you can lay down a number of years’ purchase of judicial rent, whether it be 20 or any other number, which would be fair under all circumstances and in all cases, or which would be universally adopted. I should think the first condition of any settlement of this business would be that there should be a new and independent valuation for the purposes of purchase.”

I think that this statement shows very clearly that the right hon. Gentleman does not consider that the judicial rents are fair rents upon which to base the purchase of land in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman goes on to say—

“This separate valuation for the purpose of purchase alone is the foundation on which any transfer of the ownership of land can take place.”

I trust that if the colleague of the right hon. Gentleman who sits below me (Mr. Jesse Collings) intends to address the House he will be able to give some satisfactory explanation of the reason why the right hon. Gentleman now undertakes to support the Government on an important measure of this kind, when in 1887 he distinctly laid down the proposition that the foundation on which the transfer of the ownership of land could alone take place was a separate and independent valuation. As it now stands I think I may claim the right hon. Gentleman as one who agrees with us that the basis on which these purchases are to be made is not a fair basis. I cannot think that the tenants are allowed a free hand in this matter. I quite agree with what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, that the tenant is threatened with purchase or eviction. It is as if a pistol were held at his head with a demand for his money or his life; for I think that to many of the Irish tenants to be forced to leave their homes is as bad as the loss of their lives. I may state that I am one of those who voted against the Ashbourne Act. I believe the principle of that Act is a wrong principle, and certainly if any opposition to the passage of an Act of Parliament was justified, I think the opposition to that Act has been justified by the Bill now brought in by Her Majesty’s Government. At the time the Ashbourne Act was before Parliament it was pointed out to the Government that they could not stop at £5,000,000, but that of necessity circumstances would arise to compel them to increase the amount. To illustrate my point I would say it is just as if a waggon were placed on the top of a steep incline where a very slight push would be required to start it; but when once it was started it would accumulate force as it descended, so that it would be impossible to say what disaster it might not ultimately cause. I oppose this Bill on principle. I look on the measure in pretty much the same light as I should regard that waggon. We cannot see or estimate the disasters it will cause. At the present moment our vision is obscured by the advantages it offers; but I, for one, feel assured that time will show that the advantages are very small in comparison with the mischief that will be brought about. I maintain that even those who were in favour of the Ashbourne Act are not justified in supporting this measure. We have not as yet, it is true, sufficient experience of the working of that Act; the time has been too short. We have seen statements to the effect that in some cases tenants who had purchased under that Act had begun to complain that the farms they had purchased were too highly valued. We do not know exactly to what extent rents have fallen, and we cannot tell whether there may not be a greater fall of rents than has already taken place. Another question is, what capital will the tenants have to fall back upon? If this Bill is to be justified at all, the purchasing tenants will be mostly those who have little or no capital, and the only way in which they can be kept going is by a reduction of their annual instalments. But there is another important point in connection with this measure which I will endeavour to put before the House. We all know that rent is a fluctuating thing, and that it is affected by the fluctuations in the value of the land which the rent represents. If heavier rates are put upon the land than the tenant can meet, those rates ultimately fall on the landlord, because of the inability of the tenant to pay. Now, I object to this measure, because I hold that in it we shall be practically stereotyping the rent upon the holding for another 50 years, and if there should in the interval be an increase of rates, as I have no doubt there will be, for we must look forward to the time when Ireland will have control over her own affairs, when many improvements will be wanted and undertaken, and money will be needed to carry them out, the result will be disastrous to the tenants purchasing under this Bill. Indeed, it must be obvious that whether under a local Parliament dealing with the whole of Ireland, or whether under a system of county government, it will be found absolutely necessary to increase the rates in that country. What, then, is the position of the purchasing tenant? At present he can appeal to the landlord, and in many cases he does get a reduction of rent, and therefore the rates practically fall on the landlord; but those who purchase their holdings under this Bill will be prohibited from that. The whole of the rates and taxes, whether for educational purposes, for which at present I believe no rate exists in Ireland, or for improvements that may be required, will fall on the purchasing tenant, while for the next 50 years the rent is practically prevented by this measure from undergoing any modification. I have said that I have seen nothing that can justify this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary boasted not long ago that Ireland was quiet, and hon. Gentlemen opposite have made it one of their platform utterances throughout the country that the policy of Her Majesty's Government has been successful, and that Ireland is in a calm and peaceful state. If this be so, what is the need of this Bill?

Surely there is nothing in the condition of Ireland to call for exceptional legislation, and I maintain that you have no right to take the public money to enable any class of tenants to purchase their holdings unless you can show that they are in a condition which absolutely requires it. If you will look at the purchases that have been made under the Ashbourne Act it will be found that a large number have been effected by tenants well able to pay their rents, and for whose assistance the Government have no right to advance money from the Treasury Funds. The Government have made it somewhat difficult properly to oppose this measure owing to the small amount of information they have furnished on the subject. Before you advance State money to enable any class of men to purchase their holdings you are bound to show that there is an absolute necessity for it, and in this case I say that that has not been done. Admitting that there is a difficulty in getting rents in Ireland, that is only the case in regard to a very small area, and I ask the House why should we be called on to advance money to every leaseholder in London to enable him to purchase his holding, or to every tenant in Wales for the same purpose, or to the artisans throughout the country for the purchase of the works in which they are employed? I say it is a monstrous thing for the Government to bring forward a scheme of this kind to enable well-to-do tenantry to purchase their holdings at the expense of the State. Another point I desire to put before the House is that this scheme contains practically all the dangers of the nationalisation of land without any of its advantages. We are to enable a large number of tenants to purchase their holdings whereby they will become tenants of the State. We who do not believe in land nationalisation hold as one of the greatest objections to such a system that in this case, instead of the State having any of the benefits of land nationalisation, it will simply be advancing money for the purpose of enabling one class of landlords to succeed another class. The trifling advantage accruing to the small area in which there is any difficulty in the collection of rents is a mere nothing compared with the immense amount of money the Government are asking the country to advance without, as I contend, any justification. Before any such advance is conceded the Government ought to show that a corresponding advantage will accrue to the State; but in this case there can be little or no benefit to the State. In the case of what is termed nationalisation the State would get the full value of the land; but here the State gets nothing whatever. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham last night asserted that there was comparatively no risk in the matter, and he made a comparison as between the credit of the State and a £5 note of the Bank of England. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he would prefer to have his money in the hands of the Irish peasantry or in the Bank of England? I think I know what his answer would be, and that is that he would prefer the Bank of England. How are we to get the money back? The hon. Member below me (Mr. Jesse Collings) says we have got it in our pocket. I cannot agree with him. If we advance the money how can we have it in our pocket? If the money is raised on the credit of the land, the land may depreciate in value, and if the instalments are not paid there is very considerable risk. The right hon. Gentleman has recommended the Government to insert in the Bill a clause providing for control by the Local Authorities. I am surprised to hear him recommending that, when he knows that one of the chief arguments against a Local Government scheme, which Her Majesty's present Government have promised to give to Ireland, but which they apparently dare not propose, has been the argument used by hon. Members on the opposite side of the House, that every Local Authority which might be set up would simply mean an additional tool for obtaining Home Rule. But the right hon. Gentleman says that the Local Authority will act as a buffer between the State and the tenant. Now, what is the nature of a buffer? As I understand it it is something that yields to pressure. Does he intend that the Local Authority is to yield to the pressure that may be put upon it? If so, I can hardly think he would recommend it. This being the case what becomes of the right hon.

Gentleman's argument that there is no risk? On the whole I think that the more we consider the details of this Bill, and the recommendations of those who support it, the more dangerous does it appear. I am not one of those who are anxious to get the landlords out of Ireland. I think that in Ireland the majority of the landlords will bear comparison with those of any other portion of the kingdom. Many of them deserve well of their country. They are not all bad, and we know that there are many who do much good in the districts in which they live. I regard this Bill as a measure for the wholesale expulsion of the landlords. I think the public safety is better ensured when the community is composed of different classes, and I will support no scheme that will practically tend to the expulsion of the landlords from Ireland for the next 50 years. One of the reasons why I urge the views I have expressed is that I think the measure would prejudice the Home Rule scheme. If there is to be, as no doubt there will be, a Home Rule Parliament, it ought to be able to deal, more than with any other question that can be suggested, with the subject of the land; for if there is a vital question in Ireland it is the land question, and for my part I will be no party to any land purchase scheme that will practically remove the consideration of this question from an Irish Parliament. I am not one of those who think that in the event of an Irish Parliament being conceded the landlords will flee the country. I think that when they find they have their own interests to protect they will protect them, while the tenants will also protect theirs. It is in keeping the different sections of the community together that we shall find the general safety. I regard the whole scheme of this Bill as unfair to the United Kingdom. If you are just to Ireland you cannot stop at £33,000,000, and I cannot see where you would be able to stop. It is unfair to ask this House to sanction a scheme that will enable only one section of the community to purchase their holdings. There are many industries in this country, in some of which a large number of men are employed, that have been obliged to stop for want of capital, and I say we should be as much justified in advancing money in such cases as in the case of the Irish tenants. For my part I do not see why the miners of the County of Durham should be prevented from applying for an advance to enable them to purchase the collieries in which they work, if the principle of this Bill is to be sanctioned. Indeed, I fail to see where we are to stop if we allow this measure to pass. Are you prepared to advance money to the Welsh tenants and Scotch crofters to enable them to buy their holdings? Unless you are you have no right to advance money in the way you propose to do in Ireland. But, Sir, one of my strongest reasons for the opposition I offer to the Bill is that Her Majesty's Government came into office chiefly through their opposition to two measures: one being the Home Rule scheme of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and the other the land purchase scheme. I know which of the two was made the most of in the country. My own district was inundated with pamphlets asserting that we were going to give 150 or 200 millions of cash to Ireland. That was one of the chief subjects on which all the Conservative candidates dilated in my district, and what was the case there I feel assured was the case throughout the country. I maintain, therefore, that Her Majesty's Government will be committing a breach of confidence if they pass this measure. They had no mandate from the country to do it, and I, for one—recognising that the advances would not stop at £93,000,000, the figures stated by the Chief Secretary, nor even at £153,000,000, because if you are to be just, and you advance sufficient to buy the property of a certain number of landlords, you cannot in equity refuse to do the same in the case of the others—I shall oppose this measure with all my power, contending, as I do, that the Government have no right to ask the House to pass a Bill which I maintain really means an advance of at least £100,000,000, without having previously appealed to the sense and feeling of the country.

(4.0.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): The speech we have just heard is one directed against State-aided land purchase of every description and under any circumstances, and I must commend that speech, which was so loudly cheered from hon. Members below the Gangway on this side of the House, to the labouring population of this country. My hon. Friend said that one of his objections to this system of purchase was that the rent at once became stereotyped. But stereotyped rent is a principle in all such purchase, and therefore to object to such a rent is to object to all land purchase. The hon. Member says he can see no difference between the State-aided purchase of land and the purchase of other undertakings; but on this point I would refer the hon. Member to the practice of almost every civilised country which has had to deal with the tenure of land either by revolutionary or by constitutional methods, such as are now proposed by the Government. The security of the British taxpayer under this Bill has never been questioned by any speakers in this Debate. The subject of a Local Authority interposing has been raised, but this fact has never been disputed: that the £33,000,000 which is to operate under the Government scheme is simply the capitalisation of money over which the Government have absolute control—which they have, in fact, got in their own pockets.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): Does the hon. Member really mean to say—

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I mean to say that for every penny of indebtedness, or credit, or liability, or whatever you like to call it, which the British taxpayer will incur, he will have its equivalent under his own control. Hon. Members may, if they can, dispute the fact that the £33,000,000 is simply the capitalisation of subventions, or money to be paid, which moneys are under the absolute control of the Government of the day. And, be it remembered, that is only one of the securities offered, although it is enough, it is absolute, and cannot be questioned. At the same time, there are collateral securities which strengthen the case of the Government. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford stated that this was an English question, and I agree with him for reasons which I will state directly. But he went on to say that he believed the repudiation of which we have heard so much would not take place; that there was no danger of it unless political pressure is exercised on the tenants; any arrangement, of course, must be subject to the action of those who, if they choose, can exercise political pressure. I think the right hon. Gentleman was rather unfortunate in anticipating that the only danger of repudiation was not from inability to pay the instalments, but from political pressure being put on the tenants not to pay. An hon. Member near me says danger may arise from both sources. Then I tell him it is contemplating a most dishonest proceeding on the part of those who are able to exercise that political pressure. I do not belong to the new-fangled Radicalism of those hon. Members who oppose the Bill. I prefer the constructive Radicalism of Cobden, Bright, and Fawcett, who have achieved something to that of hon. Members who have accomplished nothing. Those who to-morrow read the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford will come to the conclusion that his complaint against the Bill is that it does not provide for the outlay of £95,000,000 instead of £33,000,000. He said he was confident of this thing and certain of that, but he adduced no proof of anything, and the only point he amplified was that £33,000,000 would be insufficient. Hence his difficulty. All those who have addressed the House against the Bill have spoken of it as merely a question between landlord and tenant. I say that it is not merely a question between landlord and tenant that is at issue. The benefit derived by either is merely incidental, and the great purpose for which the Bill is proposed is the public good. That is our only warrant for dealing with this question, as speakers and writers, both in the past and in the present, have always represented the land question as the difficulty in Ireland. I go further, and say that if that question is settled on a satisfactory basis, Home Rule will not survive, at any rate in its present proportions, and, therefore, the Government have every justification for the proposals they are making. If the history of the magnificent land legislation in Prussia, which begun in 1807, is read, it will be found that the result of that legislation, which was similar in its lines to the Bill now before the House, has been to reconcile sections of the community who had long been discontented, and to bring them into the ranks of the law-abiding. The Chief Secretary has reason to be extremely contented with the Debate which has taken place, for if the speeches of objectors are placed side by side, they will be found to answer each other. One speaker declared that the instalments are so high that the tenants must repudiate, while the next declared them to be so low that the tenants who are kept out will have a grievance. Again, one speaker asserts that purchasers will have a grievance, and another declares that non-purchasers will have such a grievance as will almost justify them in revolting, and so you may go on. One speaker declaimed against the severity of Irish landlordism, while another occupies himself with the glorification of Irish landlordism. Thus do hon. Members destroy one another's arguments. I was amused to see how lightly the question of repudiation was touched upon on the Home Rule Benches; it has been spoken of as if it were positively of no account whatever. But I should like to remark on that question that the argument of repudiation has been advanced by some speakers in face of the fact that the Irish have been among the best and most punctual ratepayers in the whole world. They have, as my hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone pointed out, fulfilled their pecuniary engagements under very difficult circumstances, and in places where the Plan of Campaign has been in force, have paid rents in the dead of night, well knowing that if the act were known they might be subjected to outrage and even death, and yet the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford speaks coolly of the exercise of political pressure. We have been told to-day that this Bill is a bribe to ignorant tenants in Ireland for the benefit of the landlords. What did the Front Opposition Bench think of that, seeing that their proposals in 1886 were of a compulsory character, and would have handed the tenant bound hand and foot over to the landlord? The landlords under the Bill had only to declare their intention to sell when the tenant was obliged to buy at a high price, whether or not he was willing to do so—at prices which have since been declared to be 20, 30, and even 50 per cent. too high. Again it has been suggested that under the Bill the British taxpayer will become an Irish landlord, and that he will have to collect the rents. Neither of those statements is true. The tenant as soon as he agrees to purchase the holding becomes the landlord, subject only to the payment of the annual instalments, which are not rent at all. I am glad that the Government have taken out the 20 years' purchase which appeared in the last Bill, for, though no fair-minded man could misunderstand the proposal, it provided a peg on which any amount of misrepresentation might be hung. One more point and I have done. One Party has constantly opposed this Bill, and that is the Party represented by the hon. and senior Member for Northampton, by the hon. Member for the Cirencester Division, and by my hon. Friend who last spoke. Those Gentlemen oppose land purchase under any circumstances. I understood the hon. Member for the Cirencester Division to say that in his election address in 1886 he stated that he was opposed to land purchase. I had hoped he had altered his mind about that, as he has since changed his attitude on the Home Rule question. I take it that the issue raised by these hon. Members is really the one we are about to divide upon. Liberal Unionists have never opposed the principle of land purchase or the pledging of British credit for the purpose of purchase. What they have opposed is the monstrous proposition that Great Britain should undertake an enormous liability for a country which is immediately to be placed in the position of Canada or of a foreign State. The hon. Member for Cirencester based his objection to the Bill also on the ground that that might be used to dispossess the landlord in Ireland, but if the rural population in either England or Ireland are to have a closer connection with the land the present owners must be dispossessed. I take it that my hon. Friend does not favour confiscation. I recommend his views to the consideration of the agricultural population. He has figured on many occasions as the friend of the labourer, but I fear he is rather giving himself away in his opposition to the principle of land purchase, without the adoption of which the vivid hopes of the rural population of this country must be disappointed. The hon. Member for Caithness wishes that the scheme may be so arranged that the County Councils shall have the land and let it at perpetual rents to the cultivators. I hope that those lines will be adopted in any legislation of a similar kind for England. But the proposition now before the House is simply a continuation of legislation that has long been adopted in Ireland, and it would be absurd for the Government to create another class of tenants now, after both Parties have gone so far in another direction. I hope that the results anticipated from the Bill will be obtained, and then it will be possible to see the net value of the Home Rule movement in the eyes of those who have attached themselves to it for the sake of agrarian advantages, about which they alone care.

(4.25.) SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I hope my hon. Friend the Member for the Bordesley Division will himself go into villages and explain to the labourers—who, after all, are taxpayers—why it is desirable that their money should go into the pockets of the Irish landlords. He talked about the new-fangled Radicalism, but it is not new fangled to me. I have been a Radical ever since I came into this House, and I intend to remain one. I am glad that we have had this Debate to-day, and that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House agreed so courteously to the adjournment last night, because we have been discussing the real issue, namely, whether or not the principle of State-aided land purchase is right. It is desirable that that matter should be thoroughly threshed out. But the curious part of the Debate is that it has been carried on for two days without the presence of the Irish Members. The House can now see what it will be like when the Irish Members are withdrawn—and a precious dull place it will be. As English credit is to be so extensively pledged, the question before the House is essentially an English question. I have been sent to the House by taxpayers, and it is my first duty to look after their money. The hon. Baronet the Member for Northumberland spoke in a high tone about the "timid and selfish taxpayers." I do not see why taxpayers have not every right to be timid and selfish, seeing that for several generations they have been robbed by the upper classes. We had on this side a very interesting Debate last night. The hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division gave us a comprehensive speech full of facts and figures, the ex-Prime Minister followed with a very moderate speech, then came the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham with a diplomatic speech, the Member for Elgin with a practical speech, and the Member for Haddington with a theoretic speech, for he said that both he and his constituents were prepared to run a theoretic risk with regard to this guarantee. But he was only following the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, who asserted that there was absolute security for every penny used, and remarked that British credit was used, but not risked. What do you give a guarantee for unless there is some risk? If there be no risk, if the security is sufficient, why put in the guarantee at all? That is the whole question; that is what I am fighting about. I am opposing the bringing in of British credit for this scheme, and if you take that part out of it, leaving the scheme with the other security, I believe this Bill might pass in 10 minutes to-morrow. But my hon. Friend the Member for Haddington will find that he is mistaken; it is no use giving this guarantee and saying we shall not have to pay. Just as certain as that I stand here this guarantee will come into operation, and it can only come from the taxpayers. From the results of the labour of the country is this guarantee created, and by this scheme you are proposing to sacrifice the interest of labour for the benefit of land. The two most interesting speeches we have had during the Debate were those delivered last night by the hon. Baronet the Member for Northumberland (Sir Edward Grey) and the hon. Member for Haddingtonshire (Mr. Haldane), and what I was most struck by in these speeches was an admission which pleased me very much indeed. Both hon. Members said things had now got to such a pass that a certain section—meaning the Radical section—had made such work up and down the country that the Liberal Party, if ever they came into power again, would never be able to carry a scheme of land purchase. This did good to my heart. We have not lived in vain. We have educated our Party. We have educated our Leader. I should like to be quite certain that we shall never be able to carry such a Bill. When Robert Bruce was told by one of his friends "I doubt I have slain the Red Comyn," he replied, "Dost thou doubt, I will mak sicker." I hope it is a certainty impressed upon the leaders of our Party that they may as well attempt to fly us to carry a wholesale scheme of land purchase for any place. Of course hon. Gentlemen will find something to say against us, and they will say that in 1886 the bulk of the Party were willing to accept a scheme of land purchase.

An hon. MEMBER: And will again.

SIR W. LAWSON: No, never again. That is the point we have reached. We accepted it then, some of us, as part of a large scheme for settling the Irish difficulty. We will never accept it again coupled with any scheme for Ireland. I believe, myself, the bringing in of that Bill, done though it was with good intentions, has been one of the greatest causes of the confusion into which the Liberal Party has fallen in late years. It was brought in as a good idea to float the Home Rule Bill, but it had the effect of sinking Home Rule for a time, though it will rise again. All the revelations of the last few days show that the abominable proposition of buying up Irish landlords is at the bottom of much of the trouble we are undergoing at this moment. Nothing has been more oppressive than these land schemes. Last Session it was sickening to hear the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) talk as if he were negotiating with the Chief Secretary. We know what it means. The hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) "let the cat out of the bag" last night in replying to my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Mr. Reid), who made a capital speech, thoroughly Radical, against land purchase.

"I know," said the hon. Member for South Tyrone, "why the Radicals go against land purchase, because they think that is not the way to arrive at Home Rule."

This Bill is brought in then to block the way to Home Rule. The hon. Member admits it. But "in vain is the snare set in the sight of any bird." Every real Home Ruler, everybody who believes that a nation ought to govern its own affairs, will spurn this Land Purchase Bill. I have listened to speeches from the right hon. Gentlemen the Members for Mid Lothian and Newcastle; but they never convinced me that it is a wise or desirable thing to settle the land question, not leaving the plan to the Irish people. The land question is the great trouble and difficulty in Ireland. You say you are going to give them Home Rule, and yet you will not let them settle the one question which makes Home Rule necessary. That commends itself to the hon. Member for South Tyrone.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I say we are not going to have Home Rule.

SIR W. LAWSON: But I say we are going to have it, and I say to withhold from Home Rule consideration the most important of the matters concerning the country seems to me—and I should think so if it were not advocated by so many able men—to be absurd. If you settle the land question you can only do so in a way to satisfy the Irish people, and you might as well leave to them the settlement. If you do not satisfy them, you settle nothing. It is a curious Bill. We are told landlordism has been the curse of Ireland, and now you are going to turn hundreds of landlords into thousands. It is an extraordinary way of settling the question. Judge O'Connor Morris has written a pamphlet, and in this he says—

"Before many years two-thirds of Ireland will have become the land of mere peasant landlords, presiding over a mass of rack-rented tenants."

That is your Bill. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Jesse Collings) has talked about new-fangled Radicals, and said he followed Mr. Bright. But a very few years ago John Bright said the idea of buying out the propertied class was both unnecessary and unjust. We shall hear, when the time comes, what the constituencies say. New-fangled Radicalism will have something to say, and I think it will have an effect on the Ballot when we tell constituencies that money is going to be taken from them to enhance the price of land for the landlords of Ireland. We have had three pamphlets on this land scheme of the Chief Secretary, one written by my hon. Friend who spoke last night (Mr. Keay), a Radical, and who went carefully into the matter; another written by a Tory, to which I have alluded, and another written by the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill), who is not a Radical. I do not know what he is. These afford full opportunity of studying the question. In the pamphlet by O'Connor Morris, a Tory landlord and County Court Judge, the writer says the Bill, if it passes, will disturb or subvert Irish land legislation, will bring new mischiefs out to be endured, do enormous wrong, and probably lead to revolutionary changes, aggravate instead of heal the feuds in Ireland, will have far-spreading disastrous consequences, and be at once iniquitous, mean, and selfish.

This is a pretty good description of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman. I want a declaration from our Front Bench. What do they think of the Bill? If the usual occupants of that Bench are not present they ought to be. I remember how they fought last Session against compensation for the brewer and the publican; why will they not fight now against compensation to Irish landlords? If they would make a bold stand, if they would lead us now as then, if they would use all their power, influence, eloquence, and argument against this Bill as they did against the Licensing Clauses, the Liberal Party would follow them almost to a man, with the exceptions, perhaps, of the hon. Members for Northumberland and Haddington (Sir E. Grey and Mr. Haldane), who would form a Party of their own, I suppose. I think it is our duty, whether they lead us or not, to use every mode of opposition, every resource of resistance, every Parliamentary form we can possibly find to frustrate this attempt at wholesale robbery of the British taxpayers.

*(4.35.) MR. MADDEN: I am glad that at last a speaker has risen in opposition to the Bill who has taken upon himself the task of proving that it is financially unsound. During the Debate I have listened with attention for that part of the argument to be reached. It appeared to me to be a most important part of the attack, and when the hon. Baronet approached that point I endeavoured to follow him and to grasp his argument. It is within the recent recollection of the House. What argument did the hon. Baronet use to rove the financial unsoundness of our proposals? Did he address one single argument to meet the proposition advanced earlier in Debate, namely, that the Imperial taxpayer is his own paymaster? If there is no risk, asked the hon. Baronet, why give a guarantee? The very idea of a guarantee, he said, involved the idea of a risk. I answer, not if you got an absolute, counter security, and in the present case the excellence of this counter guarantee removes all risk.

Sir W. Lawson

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): What is it?

*MR. MADDEN: What is it? The counter security is this, and to this argument no answer has ever been attempted, either last Session or this: The total capital amount advanced cannot exceed 25 years' purchase of the annual amount which you have under your own control. You are your own paymaster, you have that sum under your own control, and until that argument is met it is idle to deal with vague attacks on the financial soundness of the scheme. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in his speech used an expression which I heartily and respectfully endorse. He said that the Debate appeared to him to be rather a continuation of the discussion of last Session than as a substantive Debate upon a new Bill. In one particular, I must admit, the present Debate has had a resemblance to the Debate last Session: each opponent of the Bill has in turn been answered by speeches from his own side. Following out the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, though not exactly as he intended, I think the continuity of the Debate has in this respect been strictly observed. Thus the hon. Member for Dumfries anticipated general repudiation of instalments; but he was answered to-day by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), who indignantly repudiated repudiation. The whole point of the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford was, there was no risk of repudiation or dishonest attempt to evade legal obligations. He declined to entertain the idea of repudiation, though he added there might be instigations to dishonesty proceeding from political advisers. Upon the probable action of the political advisers of the Irish tenants he is more competent to form an opinion than I am. His opinion is that men might be dissuaded from paying from political motives.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I did not say not to pay just debts; indeed, I said exactly the opposite.

*MR. MADDEN: I accept the right hon. Gentleman's explanation; but he stated that in his opinion there might be opposition to payment of instalments caused by pressure largely applied from political motives.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Pressure applied, I said, in Parliament, for postponement of payments, and for spreading these payments over a longer period.

*MR. MADDEN: Pressure from political motives in the direction of declining to pay at the proper time a legal debt. That is another way of stating the same thing. The right hon. Gentleman uses the euphemism "spreading payment over a longer period." I leave the difference of opinion on the subject of repudiation to be settled between the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries. Then we have been told this is a landlords' Bill, and from that standpoint the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) has denounced it. It was a Bill for the benefit of the plutocracy. He even coined a word, describing it as endowing the landocracy. Again, to save us trouble the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) has entirely demolished the argument of the hon. Member for Northampton. He says his objection to the Bill is that it will not be a final settlement, because the bonus which some tenants will get will prove such an enormous benefit to them that we shall never have peace because of the continual pressure which will be applied to landlords who refuse to sell. How it is possible to recognise this argument of the right hon. Gentleman with the description of the Bill by the hon. Member for Northampton I do not see. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian also says the action of the Bill in conferring a boon on individual tenants is fraught with danger in the future, because it will engender agitation and discontent on the part of those who are left outside the operation of the Bill. Again, I leave that argument to be met by the opinion of hon. Gentlemen opposite. When the arguments of our opponents thus destroy each other, I am left with little to reply to. Again referring to the remark of the right hon.

Gentleman that this is a continuation Debate, I ask what is the position? The House has now had the advantage of having the Government scheme before it for eight months. It was subjected to five nights' criticism last Session, and it has been debated for two nights on this occasion. Further, it has been subjected to criticism on platforms and in the Press, and I ask, has any alternative scheme for dealing with the Irish land question been propounded during the eight months which have intervened between the beginning and the end of this discussion? Into the general question of the propriety of a system of State-aided purchase of land in Ireland I will not enter now, for I take it there is practical unanimity on the subject among all classes and conditions of men. I take it as a political axiom that a well-considered and safe system of land purchase for Ireland is desired, and that no considerable body of politicians desire to terminate the experiment which has proved so successful in the past. Well, then, I ask—Does not the scheme of the Government hold the field? Has any alternative scheme been presented—have any counter proposals been seriously attempted? On the Second Reading Debate last Session the House and country were surprised when the hon. Member for Cork, speaking for his Party, laid as an alternative scheme before us a proposal for the fining down of rents. A discussion followed, and was continued throughout the country by the Press; but I fail to find that this alternative received any substantial support on public platforms or in the Press. Indeed, judging from an article in the North American Review on land purchase written by the hon. Member himself, I conclude that he has dropped, apparently for ever, the suggestions he made to the House on the Second Reading Debate last Session—at all events, as an alternative solution of this question. Our scheme holds the field. It has been admitted on both sides by speaker after speaker that the Irish land question is at the root of the Irish difficulty, and that it is a question that must be settled, and yet nobody has even provisionally offered to the House any other solution of the difficulty?

MR. LABOUCHERE: Leave it to an Irish Parliament.

*MR. MADDEN: To one portion of the Bill little allusion has been made except by the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Joicey.) I mean the portion relating to the congested districts. The hon. Member said if this portion of the Bill stood as a Bill by itself he would be well disposed to assist in passing it into law. I welcome that statement. As soon as the House has got through the earlier portion of the Bill now before us, the House can take up the congested districts portion as if it were a Bill by itself. If it is admitted that the land question is the root of the Irish difficulty, that difficulty presents itself in the acutest, most accentuated form in the congested districts, and surely this is a time when circumstances have brought home to the heart and mind of every Member of this House the duty of dealing effectually with this difficulty? I attach the greatest importance to this portion of the Bill, and I say that the gratitude of the Irish people is due to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for this first serious attempt to grapple with the troubles and difficulties of the congested districts, intensified, as they are, by the incidents of the present year. It is remarkable and encouraging that this part of the Bill has met with no hostile criticism, though some questions have been asked in regard to it. I have been asked for a definition of a congested district. Well, rightly or wrongly, the Bill contains a definition founded on the ratio of valuation to population. That may be right or wrong, but it is a practical basis for discussion when we reach that part of the Bill. The hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) took exception to the scheme of the Government being divided into two Bills, and asked for an explanation on this point. I will give it him. Either there will be time to pass the entire scheme or not. If there is time to do so, no harm will have been done by dividing it into two measures. If there is not time to pass the entire scheme, it will be because of that class of opposition to every line and word of the Bill with which we have been threatened, and because of that alone. The second Bill contains improvements of the law as to head rents, turbary, and so on, as to which there will probably not be much opposition when included in a separate Bill. But those are technical and difficult subjects, dealt with in complicated clauses, which will readily lend themselves to the class of opposition I referred to, and, therefore, to embody them in a Bill dealing with controversial subjects might lead to opposition on points as to which there is no dispute in principle, but which would be treated as controversial, with a view to defeat or delay the passing of the other parts of the Bill. If there is no time to pass both Bills, and if we secure the first, I think that everyone will agree that half a loaf is better than no bread.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: When will the second Bill be printed?

*MR. MADDEN: The second Bill will be printed in the course of a few days. The differences between the former and the present Bills have been so fully dealt with by my right hon. Friend that I need only mention one. It is a provision to which I attach great importance—namely, the strengthening of the judicial force Land Commission by giving power to the Lord Chancellor to nominate any Judges of the High Court to act as additional Judicial Commissioners. I venture to say, in conclusion, that the Government scheme, and it alone, holds the field; I believe it will be passed into law, and that, when so passed, it will prove not only safe to the taxpayer, but the cause of peace and prosperity to many generations in Ireland.

*§(5.3.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): Holding as I do opinions which conflict somewhat with those which have been expressed on this side of the House, and being a very advanced land tenure reformer, I think it only fair I should express the opinions which I entertain of the Bill, opinions which I believe are, rightly or wrongly, shared by a very large number of my countrymen. This Bill contains two main proposals: one to buy out the Irish landlords with British money, the other to sell the land which has been so purchased to the tenants who now occupy it. The first proposal indicates the great advance which has been made upon the subject of land tenure reform within the last 20 or 25 years. Twenty years ago Mr. John Stuart Mill, who sat in this House, published a remarkable pamphlet in which he advocated the same principle which is embodied in the Government Bill—namely, the using of British money for the purpose of buying out the landlords of Ireland. At that time the views of Mr. Mill were considered so advanced that the principle he advocated was scouted by a majority of the Members of this House, and received but very scant support amongst the general public. But now that principle has been embodied in a Bill brought forward by the great Tory Party, who are thereby placing in the hands of those who advocate land nationalisation a very powerful weapon, because the land nationalisers propose that the whole land of the Kingdom should become the property of the State, and one of the methods by which they wish to secure possession of the land is that the national funds should be used for the purpose of buying out the landlords. I will not discuss whether it is right or wrong to apply British money for buying out the landlords of the Kingdom; but the great fault I find with the proposal of the Government is that when the funds of the nation have been applied for buying out the Irish landlords, and the State has taken possession of the land, the State should again part with it. When the funds of the nation have been to some extent jeopardised by this process, why should the nation create another race of landlords? The fact that the land of the country was owned by the State would be the best guarantee to the tenant against anything like arbitrary eviction. It is the arbitrary evictions on the part of the Irish landlords that have produced the present crisis, and it seems to me a very extraordinary thing to knock down one man and set up 20 in his place—to buy out one big landlord and manufacture a number of little ones. What guarantee have we that the new landlords to be created under this Bill will be of a better type than those which at present exist? The Bill affords no such guarantee, and I am inclined to think that the new landlords will be of even a worse type than the old ones. I therefore prefer to retain the existing system rather than create a new class of landlords about whom we at present know very little, and who, I fear, would be harsher in their conduct towards the tillers of the soil than the present owners of the soil. I object to the scheme also because the evils of the present system, as far as I can judge, would remain and become more crystallised. I further object to any man or any hundred men appropriating to themselves what is called the unearned increment, which should be appropriated for the benefit of the nation, and that evil is not dealt with in the present Bill. Finally, I object to the Bill on the ground that it would not be a complete or lasting settlement of land tenure reform. If you have a small or peasant proprietary created under this Bill what will happen will be that in a few generations the evils of the present system will be reproduced. The men of wealth will be always tempting the owners of small plots of land to sell; they will yield to the temptation, and the result will be that the small owners will in a short time disappear. The evils against which the Bill is now directed will then be reproduced, and in a short time we shall be face to face with another agrarian difficulty. The process to which I refer is going on at the present time in France. Some of our friends who advocate peasant proprietorship are never tired of praising the French system of land tenure, but I am informed by friends of mine in France—men who are entitled to speak with no small amount of authority on the subject—that the process of swallowing up the small men in France is growing scarce. There is a class of men who lend money at an enormous rate of interest to those who own small plots of land, and as the small owners are frequently unable to pay the interest, they lose their property. Consequently, these small owners are rapidly disappearing, and unless steps are taken by the enactment of a law to prevent any individual from holding more than a certain quantity of land, the evils which the promoters of this Bill profess to be desirous of removing will be reproduced. This Bill may afford some temporary relief to the tenants in Ireland, but it will not afford permanent relief, and cannot be regarded as a final solution of the difficulty. Again, if this Bill passes, what is to prevent a cry proceeding from the tenant farmers of England, Scotland, and Wales for State assistance to purchase their farms; and why should not the same principle be applied to the crofters of Scotland as you propose to apply to the tenant farmers of Ireland? I presume that those who have made this proposal have thought it out to the end, and are prepared to face similar demands which must come from all parts of the United Kingdom. All such difficulties would be avoided if the State purchased the land and held it. To such a proposal I should give my cordial support; but to the present scheme, which involves the creation of a new class of landlords, I shall give my determined opposition.

Main Question again proposed.

Debate arising;

It being after half-past Five of the clock, Mr. Deputy Speaker proceeded to interrupt the Business:—

Whereupon Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Mr. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): I rise to a point of order. I apprehend that as the Motion now made is not a Consequential Motion to the one just carried, it is not open to the right hon. Gentleman to move the Closure after half-past 5.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The question of order has been repeatedly decided.

(5.35.) Question put, "That the Question be now put."

The House divided:—Ayes 242; Noes 172.—(Div. List, No. 7.)

Main Question put accordingly, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

(5.50.) The House divided:—Ayes 268; Noes 130.—(Div. List, No. 8.)

Bill read a second time.

On the Question, "That the House go into Committee on the Bill to-morrow":—

(6.4.) MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I would ask the Government not to put down the Order for going into Committee to-morrow, as hon. Members desire to move Instructions to the Committee.

(6.5.) MR. W. H. SMITH: It is proposed to take the Seed Potatoes Bill and the Tithe Bill first to-morrow, and I hope hon. Members will be willing to proceed with the Land Bill after those.

MR. LABOUCHERE: On what day?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Friday.

Bill committed for Friday.

It being after Six of the clock, Mr. Deputy Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

House adjourned at five minutes after Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 4th December, 1890.

MR. SPEAKER'S CONTINUED ABSENCE.

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House that Mr. Speaker was again unavoidably prevented from taking the Chair of the House this day.

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

QUESTIONS.

THE NEW MAGAZINE RIFLE.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he would state how many magazine Infantry rifles of the present pattern were sent to Hythe for trial and report prior to the adoption of the new arm; when they were so sent down and reported upon; who is the official at Hythe responsible for such Reports; whether the Report was favourable or the reverse; and whether he will lay such Report or Reports upon the Table of the House?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): No rifles were sent to Hythe at that time, and, as I understand, for the reason that the Commandant, Colonel Tongue, was one of the Committee who chose the new rifle. One rifle was sent there in September, 1888. In August, 1888, five magazine carbines were sent there for trial, and the Report upon these and upon the rifle, which appears to have been tried with them, was received in November, 1888. The officer generally responsible would be Colonel Tongue, but, in the circumstances, he very naturally offered no remarks on the Report. The Report was generally unfavourable, and was curiously at variance with the tone of all the Reports which had been made by regimental officers and others, after the rifle had been placed in the hands of the private soldier. I will not produce any particular Report by itself, but I have not the least objection to producing all the Reports made before the adoption of the rifle, if the House wishes to have them.

MR. HANBURY: Will the Reports be laid on the Table?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I will begin by placing them in the Library, where any hon. Member can see them. Although it would involve considerable expense, I would not oppose the printing and circulating of the Reports if it is desired.

In reply to a further question by Mr. HANBURY,

*MR. E. STANHOPE said no orders had been given to withdraw the ammunition marked I. for the magazine rifle.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will state who is the official responsible for the introduction of a new small arm, such as the magazine rifle, into the Navy; whether he will lay the Report of such official upon the Table; and what trials were made by naval experts before it was adopted?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The Director of Naval Ordnance is responsible for the introduction of a new small arm into the Navy. There is no Report such as is implied in the question, since the rifle was accepted as adopted by the War Office. Before the magazine rifle was accepted a certain number of the rifles were issued to Her Majesty's ships for trial, and the Reports were generally favourable.

COLONEL NOLAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will place in the Tea Room drawings or models of the mechanism of the new rifle, and also a detail of its trajectories at various distances?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I shall have much pleasure in meeting the wishes of the hon. and gallant Member.

SIR WALTER BARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will explain the reasons why it was necessary to introduce Mark II. of the magazine rifle?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The reason why Mark II. is to be introduced is that an improved magazine has been adopted, which presents several great advantages, especially because it is easier to load and holds 10 cartridges. The other small improvements which are being adopted could easily have been introduced (and some of them have been introduced) into the manufacture of Mark I. Perhaps I ought to explain that we allowed the new rifle to be used in the drilling of the troops this year, in order to expose it to the roughest possible test, and we ordered that at the end of six months the rifles should all be examined by experts. Out of this examination have come various suggestions, some of which have been adopted. If the hon. Member, or any other hon. Member, would like to see them, I will direct that rifles of Mark I. and II. shall be brought down to the House at 5 o'clock on Monday. I may perhaps add that all my advisers, technical as well as military, are absolutely unanimous with respect to the general merits of the rifle.

DANGEROUS USE OF FIREARMS.

MR. TALBOT (Oxford University): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the following remarks of Mr. Justice Denman, reported in the Times of 27th November, in passing sentence on a prisoner named Sharpe, who was indicted for sending a letter threatening to kill a young woman, and who,

"When arrested, was found to have a loaded revolver in his pocket." He "urged the necessity there was for putting a check on the facility with which revolvers could be obtained. He had many times pointed out to juries and Grand Juries that it would be a very good thing if some enactment to this effect could be passed, that no gunsmith should be allowed to sell a revolver to any person who could not produce his right then and there to carry one, and there should be a certain fee to the Exchequer due in such licence. It would be a wholesome thing if such an enactment could be passed, and he hoped that these cases would have the effect of calling the attention of the Legislature and the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day to the subject, to see if the evil could not be turned into good ;"

and whether he can hold out hopes of being able to take measures to prevent the indiscriminate and irresponsible use of the most dangerous firearms?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I cannot say if it is generally known sufficiently that every person who carries a revolver at present is bound to pay the same Licence Duty as a person who carries a gun. Whether he always does so I am not aware. There is the same obligation to take out a licence, and certainly anyone carrying a revolver without having taken out a licence ought to be prosecuted, but the general question of taking any further measures with respect to the sale of revolvers remains with the Home Office, which has the matter under consideration.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Isle of Thanet): Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the expediency of increasing the amount of the Licence Duty?

MR. GOSCHEN: I have considered the amount with my official advisers, but they do not see their way to recommending an increase. I will consider the matter further.

PENAL SERVITUDE.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he contemplates taking any action towards giving effect to the recommendation of the Directors of Convict Prisons that Her Majesty's Judges should be empowered to pass sentences of three or four years' penal servitude instead of the present minimum of five years?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; I hope to be able to introduce such a Bill this Session.

ASSISTANCE TO THE POLICE.

MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to some observations recently made by Mr. Horace Smith, the Clerkenwell Police Magistrate, when hearing an application for a summons by Inspector Dixon against a young man for refusal to assist the police when called upon in the Queen's name; whether the learned Magistrate is correctly reported to have said—

"That it was a matter for discretion on the part of a man whether he assisted the police or not,"

and

"That he (the learned Magistrate) should hesitate before going into the midst of a violent crowd to assist the police ;"

whether the police are instructed to demand the aid of any of Her Majesty's subjects whenever such a course appears to them to be necessary; and whether they are entitled to receive the same?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the learned Magistrate that what he said was that it was a matter of discretion for the police whether they would call upon a stranger to assist them, and he added that he himself would hesitate, except in a case of grave necessity, to go into the midst of a violent crowd to assist the police, because at his time of life it would be foolish. in the same way as it would be foolish for a policeman to call for assistance from a cripple, a woman, or a child. He expressed his full intention of committing the prisoner for trial, but it having been proved that the defendant suffered from rheumatism in the arm the prosecution was dropped. The answer to the last two paragraphs is in the affirmative. The law is well known that where there is a reasonable necessity, and a person is called upon to assist the police, and there is no physical impossibility or lawful excuse for his refusal, he is bound to render assistance, and is guilty of a misdemeanour if he refuses.

JURISDICTION IN PETTY AND QUARTER SESSIONS.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has observed any report of the remarks made by Mr. Justice Hawkins, on 22nd November, in charging the Grand Jury at Norwich, especially those in which he commented on the "cruel hardship" suffered by men who are kept in prison two months or more after committal for trial at the Assizes for offences that would be adequately punished by six weeks' imprisonment, and on the necessity thus imposed on the Judge of Assize of discharging on the spot a man found guilty, for example, of a robbery deserving six weeks' imprisonment, but already punished by a longer term; whether the same consequences frequently follow committal to Quarter Sessions; whether the Government intend to take any action upon the subject and to adopt the suggestions of Mr. Justice Hawkins; whether any steps will be taken to remind Magistrates of the discretion which they already possess, enabling them to deal summarily with some of these cases, and in others to admit to bail; and whether he will bring in a Bill "enlarging," as the learned Judge advises, "the jurisdiction of Magistrates not only in Petty Sessions, but in Quarter Sessions"?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have seen a somewhat confused newspaper report of the remarks made by the learned Judge, who, as I understand, was referring to the power given to Magistrates by the Assizes Relief Act to commit to Quarter Sessions cases triable at Quarter Sessions, unless special reasons exist for committing to an intervening Assize. It is, I believe, generally understood that long detention in prison constitutes a "special reason" under the Act, which was passed with a full knowledge that it would in some cases cause a longer period of detention, but it was believed that on the whole there was a balance of advantage to prisoners in the principle which the Act contains. The Government are not prepared to reverse that legislation upon such short experience of it. I have no reason to believe that the Justices generally are not fully aware of the powers they possess. I have on one or two occasions called their attention to those powers where cases have been brought to my notice, and will continue to do so. A Bill has more than once passed the other House adding burglary to the list of offences triable at Sessions, and if the right hon. Gentleman will promote such a Bill, the Government will not oppose him. The Judges, as shown by their Report of April, 1878, are strongly opposed to any enlargement of the jurisdiction of Sessions in other respects, and the Government would not favour any such proposal.

CHIEF CONSTABLE OF CARDIGAN- SHIRE.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with regard to his refusal to sanction the appointment of the late Mr. David Evans, of Aberystwyth, to the office of Chief Constable of Police for Cardiganshire, whether there was any correspondence relating to the subject of the appointment between the Court of Quarter Sessions, or any magisterial members of the Joint Standing Committee, and the Home Office; and, if so, whether he will lay it upon the Table of the House?

MR. MATTHEWS: In order to form the best judgment I could in this matter, I saw and corresponded with various persons who appeared likely to be able to afford useful information. But these communications were all of a confidential character, and it would be contrary to precedent and public policy to make them public. I must, therefore, decline to lay upon the Table any correspondence on this subject, or to answer the hon. Member's question more particularly.

THE CONVERSION SCHEME.

MR. DILLWYN (Swansea, Town): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average number of transfers of small amounts (say under £1,000 each) of Stock in the New Converted Two and Three-quarters per Cent Stock made in the course of any week during the last month as compared with the average number of like amounts of Consols Three per Cent., Reduced Three per Cent., and New Three per Cent., made in the corresponding week in the year 1880?

MR. GOSCHEN: The total number of transfers for the last week in November, 1880, was 2,093, and for the last week in November in this year, 2,330.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the pay of the 1st and 2nd class attendants in the South Kensington Museum of Science and Art is much higher than that of the same classes of attendants in the corresponding Museum in Edinburgh; whether the qualifications for both classes of posts are identical; and whether he will state by what consideration the inequality in pay (if any) is explained?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The pay of the 2nd class attendants in the Edinburgh Museum is nearly the same as that of the attendants at South Kensington, but the pay of the 1st class attendants is certainly lower. The qualification—if by this is meant the examination they have to pass before the Civil Service Commission—is identical.

Mr. Samuel Evans

The rates of pay have been fixed in consultation with the Treasury on a consideration of the duties and responsibilities of the men and of the scale of living, together with the general level of wages in the two capitals.

THE TEA ROOM TABLE.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he can give the House any information relating to the old table lately placed in the Tea Room?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): The table now placed in the Tea Room is the table of the House of Commons in use from the year 1706 until the fire of 1834. To meet the requirements of the Union between England and Scotland, in 1706, Sir Christopher Wren was employed to enlarge and re-construct the internal fittings and furniture by which St. Stephen's Chapel was adapted for the reception of the House of Commons, and Sir C. Wren's arrangement and fittings remained without material alteration until the burning of the Houses of Parliament. The table corresponds both in ornament and workmanship with the style which belongs to the commencement of the last century, and it can be identified with the table represented by the artist Hickel in his picture of Pitt addressing the House of Commons, presented to us by the Emperor of Austria. The table contains the recess in which the Mace was placed when the House went into Committee, and the brass sockets which receive the metal work which ran round the table where the Mace was deposited. And, to complete the authentication of the table, I may mention that one of the officials in attendance at the Office of Works assisted in dragging the table out of St. Stephen's Chapel whilst the fire of October, 1834, was proceeding. It was taken then to the Office of Works, where it remained until the other day, when I had it brought down to this House.

INTIMIDATION.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of intimidation tried under "The Conspiracy and Property Act, 1875," by Mr. Preston, Stipendiary Magistrate, at Birkenhead Police Court, on Friday, October 31st; whether the accused were arrested under warrant; whether it is true that Mr. Preston declined to hear more than two witnesses for the defence, although the case for the prosecution occupied nearly five hours; whether he is aware that the licensee of the hotel where the men were arrested stated in evidence that the men said to have been intimidated "came to the hotel by themselves, and could have left the place at any time if they had cared to do so;"

and whether, under these circumstances, he can see his way to a remission of the sentence?

*MR. MATTHEWS: The answer to the first two paragraphs is in the affirmative. The Magistrate did not decline to hear more witnesses, but intimated that to call more would be superfluous. Counsel complied with the suggestion, and thanked the Magistrate. The words quoted do not appear in the notes of evidence. It was a clear case, and I must decline to interfere.

MR. FENWICK: In consequence of the unsatisfactory nature of the answer I beg to give notice that I will call attention to the question on the Home Office Vote.

WORKING HOURS OF RAILWAY SERVANTS.

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has yet received any Returns from the Railway Companies under "The Regulation of Railways Act, 1889," as to the hours worked by persons in their employment; and what limit of hours has been fixed by the Board of Trade beyond which limit the Companies are obliged to make Returns of the hours worked?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): A Return in pursuance of The Regulation of Railways Act, 1890," of certain classes of railway servants who were, during the months of September, 1889, and March, 1890, on duty for more than 12 hours at a time, and who, after being on duty more than 12 hours, were allowed to resume work with less than eight hours' rest, is in an advanced stage of preparation, and will be laid upon the Table in the course of the next few days.

MR. PHILIPPS: What limit has been fixed by the Board of Trade beyond which the Companies are to be obliged to make Returns of the hours worked?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The Act of Parliament leaves it open to the Board of Trade to name any limit, and I have that matter under consideration now. What I should like to obtain is some kind of distinction between different cases in the same employment. It is perfectly obvious there is great distinction.

ARRANGEMENTS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he has yet matured his scheme for establishing communication between the House and the Libraries and Smoking Rooms?

MR. PLUNKET: There would be no difficulty in establishing communication between this Chamber and the Library and Smoking Rooms, as suggested by my hon. Friend, if it were quite clear that it was desired by a considerable majority of Members, and I do not forget that my hon. Friend presented me with a Memorial in support of his proposal numerously signed; but, on the other hand, I know that many Members are opposed to the plan, on the ground mainly, I think, that the House is already ill enough attended, and when a Motion was formally made on the 8th of April, 1889, on the subject it was negatived.

MR. COOKE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a proposed counter Memorial on the occasion in question failed for the absence of signatures?

MR. PLUNKET: No, Sir; I was not aware of that.

MR. COOKE: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will give directions for the National Standard to be hoisted on the flagstaff on the Victoria Tower of the Palace of Westminster during the Session of Parliament?

MR. PLUNKET: The Houses of Parliament are technically a Royal Palace, and, as my hon. Friend is no doubt aware, when Her Majesty opens Parliament her Royal Standard is displayed on the Victoria Tower, but I have no power in the matter at all. The Lord Great Chamberlain is the proper authority.

MR. COOKE: May I ask who is the Lord Great Chamberlain?

MR. PLUNKET: That is rather a difficult question to answer offhand. Perhaps the hon. Member will be good enough to give a longer notice of the question.

EDUCATION OF THE BLIND.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he proposes introducing a measure conferring the same educational advantages on the blind of England and Wales as are afforded by the Scotch Act of last Session?

SIR W. HART DYKE: It is the intention of the Government to introduce a measure dealing with the education of the blind in England later in the Session, so soon as the progress of public business will justify their doing so.

THE ROYAL ENGINEERS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with regard to the case of a retired officer of the Royal Engineers, who presented on or about 10th July last, through the Home Office, a Petition of Grace to Her Majesty the Queen, asking that £30 a year be granted by reason of his 31½ years' service and that of his father, a Major-General Royal, and for certain other detailed reasons set forth in the Petition, if he can explain why the Home Secretary did not lay that Petition before Her Majesty, but transmitted it to the War Office to be dealt with; whether such a course is constitutional and according to Statute; and whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a copy of this Petition?

MR. MATTHEWS: This Petition was laid before the Queen by the Secretary of State for War, to whom it was forwarded by the Home Office in the ordinary course, as relating to matters within his jurisdiction. Constitutionally, the functions of the Secretaries of State are interchangeable, and there was nothing irregular in the way this Petition was dealt with. I have no objection to laying it on the Table of the House.

PROMOTION IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any, and what, progress has been made regarding the promotion of Second Division clerks of the Civil Service under the Orders in Council and Treasury Minute alluded to by him in his statement of the 28th of last March; and whether he can state from what date such promotions will take effect?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I do not know that I clearly understand the question of the hon. Member. I have referred to my answer of the 20th March, and find that it lays down correctly the conditions under which clerks of the Second Division are selected for higher posts. As cases occur they receive our consideration, but there is no general progress on the subject, as I understand it, to report.

MR. COBB: Since the end of March has nothing been done to remedy the grievance complained of?

*MR. JACKSON: Oh, yes. As vacancies arise there are three ways of dealing with them; one is not to fill them up at all; the second is to fill them up by transfer; and, in the third place, they can be filled up by promotion.

THE COUNTY COUNCILS AND EDUCATION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON (Lancashire, Rossendale): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the fact that many of the County Councils of England are setting apart sums of money under "The Local Taxation Act, 1890," for important educational purposes, and that the Joint Committees of Wales are embodying the grants under this Act in their schemes for intermediate education, he can give an assurance that these grants are not about to be applied to some other purpose, but will continue to be available for intermediate, technical, and agricultural education?

MR. GOSCHEN: I do not consider that I am in a position to give any formal or official assurance, but I may say that there are no suggestions before me for applying these grants to some other purpose, and I may add, as my personal opinion, that if County Councils set themselves heartily to work, as in many places they appear to be doing, to utilise the grants for important educational purposes, it would probably be difficult for any Minister to persuade Parliament to divert them, even if he himself desired to do so.

CASE OF COLONEL MITCHELL.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received any complaint from the suppliant in "Mitchell v. Regina," that in consequence of not having received the balance of compensation on retirement from the War Office, and being thereby unable to pay a certain debt, he was arrested by the head bailiff of Salford Court, Manchester, lodged in Strangeways Prison, Manchester, placed in a cell on the criminal side of the prison, assaulted by a warder, kept for a whole day without proper food, and refused permission to see any doctor; whether, inasmuch as the complaint was investigated by the Home Office, and the statements found to be correct, and the warder officially and seriously admonished, he can explain why all compensation has been refused the officer; and whether the warder who assaulted the gallant officer is the one who was lately tried at the Liverpool Assizes for the murder of a prisoner in Strangeways Prison?

MR. MATTHEWS: The petitioner in the case quoted complained to me in July, 1888, that, being detained one day in Strangeways Prison, between the hours of 6 a.m. and 4.50 p.m., he was treated in a manner not in accordance with the rules. I inquired into these allegations, and, having reason to think that one of the warders had been rough in his manner and language, I caused him to be reprimanded and cautioned. I was not able to discover that there had been any breach of the Prison Rules, or that there was any ground for compensation. In September, 1888, the petitioner caused the Governor of the prison to be served with notice of action, but has not since proceeded with the action. The answer to the last paragraph is in the negative.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he will, in view of the decision in the Courts of Law in "Mitchell v. Regina," cancel the official letter to the Secretary of State for War, dated Treasury Chambers, 31st March, 1888, printed in the Army Appropriation Accounts, and the Report of the Auditor and Controller General, 1887-8, laid upon the Table of the House of Commons, stating that the Secretary of State for War's contention to be the sole interpreter of Royal Warrants is "unconstitutional, ultra vires, and contrary to the Statute?"

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The letter to which the hon. Member refers does not relate to Colonel Mitchell's case, and is not inconsistent with the decision of the Law Courts. The view of the Treasury is that—

"It would be ultra vires for a Royal Warrant to give to the Secretary of State such a power of interpretation as would prevent them (the Treasury) from forming and expressing their own judgment on the meaning of the Warrant in any points that can affect Treasury action."

THE PAY OF THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has sanctioned an improved scheme of pay for the Metropolitan Police; and, if so, what are the terms of the scheme?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; I have sanctioned an improved scheme of pay for the Metropolitan Police, but all the details are not finally settled. I shall have no objection to laying the Police Order, in which these details will appear, in due course upon the Table of the House.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has had under consideration the question of the pay and allowances of the Metropolitan Police Force, and particularly the question of lodgings for the married men stationed in the highly rented inner divisions; and if he has come to any decision on the subject?

MR. MATTHEWS: These questions have, during the Recess, been receiving the anxious consideration of myself and the Commissioner. I have already informed the House that I have sanctioned an improvement in the scale of pay, and I have every hope that the arrangements made will remove any ground of complaint that may have existed.

RAILWAY RATES.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will be good enough to state what is now the position of things as between the Board of Trade and the Railway Companies with respect to the carrying into effect of Section 24 of "The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888?"

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The Board of Trade have made to Parliament the Reports provided for by the section in cases of disagreement in respect to nine great Railway Companies. They are at present making further efforts to adjust the limited number of differences which still exist between traders on the one hand and the companies on the other, and I hope at an early date to be able to introduce Bills confirming Provisional Orders as regards those companies. The schedules of the other companies are still under consideration.

PRINTING OF FARES ON RAILWAY TICKETS.

MR. J. E. ELLIS: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, having regard to his answer on the subject on 17th April last, it may be taken that Section 6 of "The Regulation of Railways Act, 1889," providing for the fare being printed on every passenger ticket, will become universally operative on and after 1st January 1891?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Yes, Sir.

WEIGHING MINERALS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, inasmuch as the House of Lords has decided that the "Billy Fairplace" system of weighing minerals belonging to miners is illegal, he will take steps to have the instrument removed from the pit banks at Burnbank Colliery, Scotland?

MR. MATTHEWS: Before I can answer the question of the hon. Member I must have from the Inspector of the District a Report, for which I have asked, as to the nature of any instrument in use at Burnbank.

THE GAS STRIKE.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if Her Majesty's Government, during the month of October 1890, promised to supply the Gas Companies of London with labourers in the event of a strike, as was generally recommended at the time?

MR. MATTHEWS: In reply to an application from the Gas Light and Coke Company, Her Majesty's Government pointed out that they could not interfere in any way in disputes between employers and employed so long as both parties kept within the provisions of the law, and that the facts then before them did not require them to adopt any distinct course of action, but that they would think it right to take whatever action might be necessary to avert or minimise the grave public danger which would be involved in allowing London to be plunged into complete darkness for an indefinite period.

THE DYNAMITE PRISONERS.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, according to his promise made at the conclusion of the last Session of Parliament, he has made inquiries into the condition of certain prisoners confined in Chatham Prison, with a view to their removal to another prison; and, if so, with what result?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; I have inquired into this matter, and am satisfied that the prisoners referred to have not suffered any ill-treatment or been placed under any disadvantage on account of the complaints that they have made. Circumstances will, however, make it necessary before long to make a transfer of prisoners from Chatham to some other convict prison, and the prisoners referred to will be among those transferred, as soon as the requisite arrangements are completed.

"HEFFERNAN v. CARTER."

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has had brought under his notice the verdict in the case of "Heffernan v. Carter and Tuohy," in which the jury found that "The firing of the shot which killed Hefernan was not necessary for the self-defence of Carter and the police."

and whether the Law Officers of the Crown in Ireland will now institute proceedings against the officer who ordered the shot to be fired and the policeman who fired it?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): Proceedings were instituted on behalf of the Crown against District Inspector Carter and Constable Tuohy as long ago as the month of November, 1889. The Magistrates refused to return them for trial on the ground that they acted in discharge of their duty, and were justified in the course which they took in the circumstances in which they were placed. This decision is fully supported by the evidence in the civil action and by the findings of the jury in this action upon the issues with respect to which they were able in the first instance to agree. They found without any hesitation that it was the duty of District Inspector Carter and his police to disperse the crowd, and that the performance of this duty was attended by personal danger to the Inspector and the police. Having agreed on these issues, they came into Court and told the Presiding Judge that they were unable to agree on the remaining issues, namely, whether the firing of the shot was necessary for the self-defence of Carter and the police, and whether the plaintiff had a reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit from the continuance of the deceased's life, and they suggested to the Judge whether they might not return an answer to the former of those two issues conditional upon the answer to be returned to the second. On being informed by the Judge that such a verdict could not stand, they again retired, and ultimately returned with findings answering both these questions in the negative. This amounted to a verdict for the defendants. I have, of course, no information as to how a unanimous decision on the two last-mentioned issues was arrived at, but, having regard to the decision of the Magistrates, to the facts proved in evidence in the civil action, and to the verdict and action of the jury taken as a whole, I see no reason to direct any further proceedings in the case.

COUNTY COUNCILS.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, considering the difficulty in which the Councils of counties and burghs in Scotland are placed as respects the application of the sums which they are empowered to apply for the purposes of technical education under Section 2 of the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Act of last Session, owing to the uncertainty of the continuance of the fund whence such sums arise, he can hold out a prospect that in future legislative steps will be taken to provide some fund from which sums may be available for the above-mentioned purpose?

MR. GOSCHEN: I will refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I have already given to my noble Friend the Member for Rossendale (the Marquess of Hartington).

SENIOR COLONELS.

GENERAL FRASER (Lambeth, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, in view of the Royal Warrant which comes into force on the 1st January, 1891, whether a Senior Colonel, who fulfils the conditions of Clause 136 of the Royal Warrant of 1878, wherein it is stated "That a Lieutenant Colonel appointed as such before 1st November, 1871, if he shall have attained the rank of Colonel, shall retain his right to succeed in his turn to the Establishment of General Officers," is now assured of his promotion; and if, in justice to the Purchase Officers of the Army, he will take into consideration the recommendation of Lord Penzance's Royal Commission in 1876, that the Establishment of General Officers shall remain at 275, as fixed by the Royal Warrant of 27th December, 1870; and also these words in their Report—

"We do not think that we should be justified in recommending the application of compulsory retirement to the rank of Colonel?"

*MR. E. STANHOPE: There are not more than four of the present Colonels who were Lieutenant Colonels before the 1st of November, 1871; and, as they only held that rank in virtue of commanding companies in the Foot Guards, they were not qualifying for the rank of Colonel. As regards the number of General Officers, I may point out that the vacancies which have given promotion to Colonels since 1871 have, as a result of compulsory retirement for General Officers, been much more numerous than they would have been if the Establishment then subsisting had been retained without any such retirement. The result has been a considerable increase of charge.

THE ESTIMATES.

SIR JULIAN GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he has considered the proposal to refer the various Classes of Estimates to Grand Committees specially appointed to consider each Class, with a view to careful examination by such Committees, instead of the desultory discussion in Committee of the whole House?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I concur in the view of the hon. Baronet, which I understand to be implied by his question, that the working of the existing system of the consideration of Estimates by Committee of the whole House is unsatisfactory. There is an absence of all proportion in dealing with the questions involved in the Votes, and there can be little doubt that a remedy is very urgently called for; but I have not yet perceived any indication of a willingness on the part of the House to delegate this portion of its duties to a Standing Committee in such a fashion as to deprive Members in the House of the power of raising questions on every item of every Vote. It will be obvious to the hon. Baronet that no Government could with advantage propose a vital change in practice without a very general consensus of opinion on such an important matter, and any changes that may be made must secure that the authority and responsibility of the House of Commons with regard to the expenditure of public money shall remain unimpaired.

REGISTRATION.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if, having regard to the calculation that upwards of £300,000 is annually spent by Political Parties in registration matters, whereas in other countries the registration of persons having the public right to vote for representation in Imperial or Municipal Government is a matter of public concern, Her Majesty's Government will consider whether it will be possible to deal with the matter before the next General Election?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government are not at present prepared to deal with this question.

ASSISTED EDUCATION.

MR. MUNDELLA: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in consideration of the great interest which is felt throughout the country as to the Government measure relating to assisted education, he will arrange for the introduction of the Bill before the Adjournment for the Christmas holidays, so as to afford time for its consideration by the country?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government are not prepared to introduce the measure relating to assisted education before Christmas.

MR. MUNDELLA: Will the right hon. Gentleman give ample time, so that the intense interest taken in the subject by all sections of the community may be satisfied?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Undoubtedly it is a question upon which ample time should be afforded to the House and the country to consider the proposals of the Government before they are sanctioned.

PRISON CLERKS.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can state why it is impossible to include the clerks employed in Her Majesty's prisons in the new Second Division scheme, as recommended by the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments, and adopted by the Treasury Minute?

MR. W. H. SMITH: No new scheme for the prisons clerks has as yet, so far as I can understand, been promulgated, and I cannot, therefore, undertake to answer the hon. Gentleman's question.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. BRYCE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when it is proposed to take the Second Reading of the Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): May I ask when the Government will take the Second Reading of the Irish Land Bill, No. 2?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill is down for Second Reading to-night, and I am in hopes it may be reached, but it will not be possible to proceed with it unless with the consent of the House.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): We all understood that it was not to be taken now?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I agree that it shall not be taken if there is any general objection.

MR. J. MORLEY: Was it not understood we should adjourn after certain Bills were disposed of?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Certainly; and we should not think of keeping the House sitting for this Bill.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I have not received a reply to my question.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Second Reading will be on Monday.

THE TITHES COMMISSION.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can state the terms of the Reference to the Royal Commission on the Redemption of Tithes, or if it is intended to allow the Commissioners to inquire into cases of tithe rent-charge which are at present admitted to be excessive?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am not prepared to state the precise terms of Reference to the Royal Commission on the question of the Redemption of Tithe. The question of the incidence of tithe rent-charge in certain parts of the country must come before the Commission.

MR. H. GARDNER: Will the Commission inquire into the revision of tithe?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I shall be very sorry if my answer has led hon. Members to think so.

CLARE SLOB LANDS.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government, in carrying out their proposed Irrigation Scheme, contemplates the allotment of the lands known as the Clare Slob Lands, containing 1,200 acres, at present in the possession of the Irish Board of Works, to small holders; and, if not, to what use it is intended to devote this valuable property?

*MR. JACKSON: I do not quite understand the hon. Gentleman's reference to the "proposed Irrigation Scheme," or how it can be connected with the Clare Slob Lands.

MR. COX: It should be "emigration," and not "irrigation."

*MR. JACKSON: I can only answer the question as it appears on the Paper. Petitions have been presented to the Landed Estates Court, and if nothing unforeseen occurs the property may be put up to public tender in January.

LIGHT RAILWAY BETWEEN ENNIS AND SCARRIFF.

MR. COX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a large and influentially signed Memorial in favour of the construction of a line of light railway between Ennis and Scarriff; and, if so, whether the Government intend to agree to the request of the Memorial?

MR. MADDEN: I am informed that the Memorial was received on Saturday last. No decision has yet been arrived at.

SEED POTATOES IN IRELAND.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the provision he is making for a change of potato seed in Ireland, in sufficient time to permit of arrangements being made for the purchase and distribution of seed, without the hurry and confusion of 1880?

MR. MADDEN: My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary is pledged to bring in a Bill, and he proposes to introduce it to-night.

WRECK OF THE HAROLD.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware of the danger to fishing boats caused by the wreck of the Ss. Harold, which is lying submerged off the North Rock, Portavogie, County Down; and whether, considering the frequent complaints made by the fishermen as to the danger to life and property caused thereby, he will consider the desirability of having the wreck removed?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The Commissioners of Irish Lights, in the interests of general navigation, placed in May last a buoy to mark the position of the wreck of the Harold, and issued a notice to mariners to that effect. Under the Removal of Wrecks Act, the Commissioners and not the Board of Trade would be the authority to act if they thought the wreck to be an obstruction or danger to navigation, and by their action in May it is to be assumed that removal is not, in their opinion, necessary. I am now in communication with the Commissioners in the matter.

SUNDAY DELIVERY OF LETTERS.

MR. M'CARTAN: I had intended to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that, during the present year, a written request for a Sunday delivery of letters from Millisle to Carrowdore was made to the Secretary of the General Post Office, Dublin, by a large and influential number of the inhabitants of the district of Carrowdore, Donaghadee; and whether, considering the general complaints made by the people as to the serious inconvenience which non delivery of letters there on Sundays causes to the residents of the district, he will consider the advisability of instituting a Sunday delivery of these letters? At the request of the right hon. Gentleman I beg to postpone the Question until tomorrow.

FAIR RENT APPEALS.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state the number of fair rent appeals heard and decided by the Chief Land Commission during its last sitting at Belfast; in how many cases were the fair rents reduced and increased respectively; what number of appeals were dismissed; how many appeals were listed from the Union of Downpatrick, in the County of Down; why the farmers and their witnesses were put to the expense and inconvenience of travelling such a considerable distance, from Downpatrick, which is an Assize town, to Belfast, to attend the hearing there, and why the Land

Mr. M'Cartan

Commission did not hold a sitting at Downpatrick; whether the gentleman who is Court Valuer for the Land Commission in County Down was formerly a Sub-Commissioner in Down; and why the rents fixed by three Sub-Commissioners in County Down were increased at this sitting on the Report of one ex-Sub-Commissioner?

MR. MADDEN: The Land Commissioners report that during their last sitting at Belfast 83 fair rent appeal cases were heard, with the following results:—Rents reduced, 5; increased, 27; decisions of Sub-Commissioners affirmed, 39; originating notices dismissed on law points, 6; judgment reserved, 6. From Downpatrick Union 54 cases were listed for hearing. Of these 45 appeared before the Court. The Commissioners state that it has been their practice to hear appeals from Downpatrick Union at Belfast, except on one occasion when the Appeal Court sat at Downpatrick for that purpose. Mr. Bomford, the valuer, has not acted as an Assistant Commissioner in Down since upwards of four years ago. He did not act as Assistant Commissioner in any of the cases listed at Belfast. The Commissioners, in arriving at their decisions, had before them not only the Reports of their Court Valuer, but also the evidence produced before them, both on behalf of the landlords and the tenants.

MR. M'CARTAN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the only additional evidence was that of the Court Valuer, who was, to some extent, the representative of the landlords?

MR. MADDEN: I have given the hon. Gentleman all the information I have.

MR. M'CARTAN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that some of these poor tenants had to travel a distance of more than 40 miles, and to pay their own expenses?

MR. MADDEN: I will call the attention of the Commission to the fact.

DRAINAGE OF THE RIVER SCARRIFF.

MR. COX: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that in 1879 it was proposed to borrow £32,000 from the Board of Works, under the Relief of Distress Act of that year, for the purpose of the drainage of the River Scarriff, and that advance of said sum was agreed to by the Board of Works; whether he has received a resolution, adopted by a large and influential public meeting of landlords and tenants, and others interested, recently held in Scarriff, urging on the Government the necessity of going on with this work; whether a resolution was also adopted, asking that the Drainage Acts might be so amended as to enable tenant farmers, holding judicial leases, to become proprietors within the meaning of the Act; and what action the Government intend taking in the matter?

*MR. JACKSON: The statements in paragraph 1 of the hon. Member's question are correct. I understand that the scheme for the Scarriff Drainage fell through, as no action was taken within the time allowed by the Provisional Order, and extended by the Board of Works to the 1st March, 1887. I have received the resolutions referred to. As to the last paragraph, I should be glad if the hon. Member would address his inquiry to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary.

MR. COX: In view of the distress prevailing, do the Government propose to take any action in the matter?

*MR. JACKSON: It is not in my power to say. The hon. Gentleman had better give notice of a question to the Chief Secretary.

THE LAND COMMISSION.

MR. COX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a copy of a resolution, adopted by the Ennistymon Board of Guardians, complaining of some recent decisions in that Union of the Land Sub-Commissioners (Messrs. James Greene, Chairman, J. Martin, and J. J. Ginny), as being in excess of the reductions the landlords offered beforehand, and entirely beyond the paying capabilities of the tenants; and whether he will direct the attention of the Land Commission to these facts?

MR. MADDEN: Any person aggrieved by a decision of a Sub-Commission can appeal. The Government cannot interfere.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

THE CASE OF WALTER HARGAN.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I beg to give notice that upon the earliest available day I will call attention to the grave miscarriage of justice which has taken place in the case of Walter Hargan, who has been sentenced to a long term of penal servitude for having protected his own life, and I will move for an Address to the Crown for a free pardon.

CLASS VII.—MISCELLANEOUS.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATE.

£5,000, Supplementary, Relief of Distress (Ireland).

(4.21.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Mr. Courtney, as the Committee will see, the sum which I now ask them to vote is relatively a trifling one, but I think that this will be the most convenient opportunity for me to explain on behalf of the Government our views as to the character of Irish distress, and the methods by which we propose to deal with that distress. I am afraid that in dealing with that subject I shall have to trouble the Committee at length, although I will make my observations as brief as I can. I propose to lay upon the Table of the House Reports which will show the character of the failure of the potato crop in various districts in Ireland; but for the purposes of the present Debate I may take it as a matter of notoriety and of common knowledge, requiring no special proof and not requiring the production of documents, that in a considerable portion—the larger portion—of the western seaboard in Ireland the failure of the potato crop has been a very serious one. The amount of the failure of the crop varies in the different districts in which it has failed from half the average crop to a quarter, or even to less, and of this half or quarter crop a large proportion are immature, when not diseased, and although I will not go the length of saying that they are unfit for human food, they have certainly not the sustaining qualities which the average potato in ordinary years possesses. Now, the question that we have to determine is what amount of distress this admitted failure in the potato crop involves in these districts, and how that distress ought most properly to be met. I think it will fix the idea of the Committee upon the subject if I attempt to lay before them a concrete case which will show how this failure affects the life and mode of existence of an ordinary small occupier in the distressed districts, but of course no single statement will be applicable to all these districts. The following will be a not unfair example of what will happen in one of the worst parts of these districts. Under ordinary circumstances the occupier's crop of potatoes would supply him in each year with two meals a day from the 15th of August to the 15th of February, and with one meal a day from the 15th of February to the 15th of April, and after that date he has to depend largely upon other food bought upon credit from the local shopkeeper. This year I am told that, instead of having sufficient potatoes for two of his meals per day from the 15th of August to the 15th of February, he will only have them at one of his meals per day to the 15th of December, and that after the 15th of December he will probably have no potatoes at all. The result will be that, instead of being dependent upon other food stuffs bought chiefly upon credit from the 15th of April to the 15th of August only, he will have to depend upon those other supplies for about 17 weeks more, and the House will readily understand that although the local shopkeepers might be prepared to give credit—as is unfortunately the custom in Ireland—from the 15th of April to the 15th of August, they may by no means be prepared to extend that credit from the 15th of December to the 15th of August. It must be recollected that in other large parts of Ireland, as in the north and east, the crops are distinctly good this year, as I am glad to say they are where the crop has not failed, and the occupiers have other crops which they can fall back upon to meet the pinch of distress; but in these poor districts in the West of Ireland the occupier has but a very small margin upon which to economise; in fact, he has, I am afraid, no margin at all. No doubt in many instances it will be found that these small occupiers have a considerable amount of stock upon paper, but that stock is of very poor quality, and if brought to market it would certainly not fill up the gap caused by the failure of the potato crop, while to draw upon it would diminish in future years the power of the man to meet the difficulties of his situation. For example, in some of the poorer districts of Donegal

I find, from inquiries I have made, that a number of these sheep, if taken to market, would not realise more than 18s. each, and the better opinion is that they would not fetch more than 15s. each. Thus to say that a man had 10 sheep without giving their market value would convey a very misleading idea of his real position. I do not think that I need labour further the point of the degree and character of the distress caused by the failure of the potato crop. The first consequence of that failure is that there will be no seed for the next year's crop; and the second consequence is the actual want which may be apprehended this year, and for the relief of which we must provide at once. I will deal with these two consequences in their order. It was brought to my knowledge about the middle of August that the failure of the potato crop was so serious that some steps will have to be taken to provide seed for next year. I was acquainted with the difficulties and also the great abuses which attended the administration of the Act of 1880. I at first entertained the idea that it was possible the best plan would be for the Government itself to take advantage of the market, and privately to obtain the requisite amount of seed supply, and then to give it out on such conditions as Parliament thought fit to the localities where it was required. I made considerable investigation into both the amount and quality of the potato crop in England, Scotland, and the North of Ireland; and I believe the potatoes of the North of Ireland are every bit as suitable for the South-West of Ireland as any grown in England or Scotland. I consulted experts upon the subject of seed potatoes, and I thought at one time I saw my way to ordering, in the hope of obtaining subsequent Parliamentary sanction, a sufficient number to meet the necessities of the case; but this problem soon presented itself to my mind—what kind of potato ought to be planted? Those who have followed the question closely are probably aware that, consequent upon the distress of 1879-80, the Champion potato was almost universally planted along the west coast of Ireland; and the Champion potato is still the popular potato in Mayo, Galway, Cork, and other counties. Curiously enough, the Champion potato is not popular in Donegal. The farmers of

Donegal are not of opinion that it is the most disease-resisting potato; they have by no means made up their minds as to what potato they ought to have; but they have come to the conclusion that the Champion potato has many defects. I myself am disposed to think that it has not the disease-resisting qualities it had at one time; and experiments that I caused to be made last year have confirmed me in that opinion. Long before anyone could have suspected that there would be a failure in the potato crop this year I had £500 or £600 worth of Champion potatoes brought from Scotland and planted in Donegal. I have reason to believe they were excellent seed potatoes; I have no reason for believing they were planted under worse conditions than ordinarily obtain on the west coast of Ireland; and the failure is, I am informed, as complete as that of any seed which has been planted during the last 10 years in that district. The result of that experiment, the discovery I made of the views of the Donegal farmers, and other circumstances brought to my notice, showed that the Government would take upon themselves a great responsibility if they selected the kind of seed that was to be used by the people. Although I am only too painfully aware of the defects that will attend the administration of the Poor Law Unions in this matter, I was reluctantly driven to the conclusion that we had to fall back upon the machinery of 1880, or some machinery like it. I do not see in his place the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan), who has brought in a Bill framed very much on the lines of the Act of 1880. The Bill I have just asked leave to introduce does not differ very materially from the Bill of the hon. and gallant Member. I have no desire to compete with him; he is entitled to credit for his action 10 years ago and now. My Bill differs from his in small details and in two important points, which I will mention. In the Act of 1880, and in the Bill of the hon. and gallant Member, the loan was and is a loan without interest, and, therefore, it amounted to a free gift of the interest during the continuance of the loan. The loan of 1880 was within a few thousands of £600,000; it was £590,000; and the interest on that at 3 per cent. was a gift from the British taxpayer to the Irish farmer of several thousand pounds. It may be said I am proposing to give a great deal too much from the British taxpayer; but I do not think this free interest on the money lent should be paid out of the Imperial funds. This part of the contribution, I think, should be paid out of the Church surplus, and in the Bill the Church Surplus Fund will be required to pay the interest on this money. In the Bill of the hon. and gallant Member it is assumed that nobody who takes advantage of this loan can pay ready money; but I should hope that in these districts there are some small occupiers who can pay, and I think they should be encouraged to do so. Very few Englishmen, and no Irishmen, would pay ready money when they could get a thing on credit. That will not be interpreted by any Irishman present as an attack on his country. [An hon. MEMBER: Scotland.] Certainly, no Scotchman would do it. If the tenant buys on credit, the interest is lost for two, three, or four years; and if we simply say, "You may pay ready money if you like, but if you do not like you shall have the loan without," of course the tenant will not pay ready money. I propose that if any man chooses to pay ready money he shall obtain the article at 20 per cent. discount. It will be seen that this is not in the nature of a gift, because you save to the Church Surplus Fund the interest that would otherwise be lost, and you save the cost of collection and insurance. There is, therefore, a financial as well as a moral gain in giving some privilege to those who are prepared to pay ready money. I shall further make an endeavour to provide, as far as regulation and inspection can do it, that the abuses which prevailed in 1880 shall not prevail again. The Committee may like to be reminded of some of the malpractices which went on. In many cases no record was kept by the Guardians of the amounts sent to various depôts; no means were devised to check distribution; in many cases the money obtained by Guardians was not distributed; some persons were charged with more than they had received; some who received were not charged at all; there were cases of gross fraud on the part of both Guardians and contractors; and in some cases loans were corruptly used to secure the election of Poor Law Guardians. These are monstrous scandals, and I hope and believe that by the regulations we shall lay down they will be prevented on the present occasion. We have, at all events, this in our favour: that whereas in 1880 the Act was administered under the shadow of an election which was known to be approaching within a month or a few weeks, causing extravagant promises to be made by candidates, and all sorts of extravagant hopes to be entertained by the people, there is no such perturbing cause on the present occasion, and I hope that the experience which has been gained will operate as a salutary preventive against the course of extravagance, and worse than extravagance, which prevailed 10 years ago. I have had prepared by the Irish Agricultural Department, whose services to the Government on this matter have been absolutely invaluable, a Circular on the subject, embodying all the knowledge of that Department with regard to the proper seeds to be used. Without in any way fettering the discretion which Boards of Guardians must exercise for themselves, the Circular will put them in possession of all the facts that experts are acquainted with. I pass to the consideration of a more vital question—how we are to meet the impending distress. I would begin by reminding the Committee, and I hope the Irish public, that I do not propose in any way to interfere with the operation of the ordinary Poor Law. The ordinary Poor Law is still in force, and it is undoubtedly capable of meeting, I will not say all, but a great deal of the distress which is now impending. The latest Returns show that the pressure upon the Poor Law Authorities is not greater than it was this time last year. The outdoor relief, taking Ireland as a whole, or taking even COUNAUGHT, has been slightly increased, and the indoor relief has, in some cases, actually diminished. I have heard by telegram to-day that in certain of the more distressed unions the pressure upon the Poor Law is increasing, and I have not the slightest doubt that as the winter advances, and as the people come to take in their stock of potatoes, not only will there be an increased pressure upon the Local Authorities, but the Poor Law Authorities, unaided, will not be able to meet the distress with which we have to deal. What additional means ought this Committee and the House to provide against the distress with which the ordinary Poor Law cannot cope? We have a not inconsiderable body of experience on this subject—experience which, I am afraid, in many cases is fruitful rather in telling us what we ought to avoid than in telling us what we ought to do. In 1879-80, which is an example of the most considerable distress that has occurred in Ireland since the great famine, exclusive of charity, which was largely distributed at that time, the chief means of dealing with the distress was as follow:—There were loans to landlords at very low interest—namely, 1 per cent, which was not to begin until the loan had been running two years. Over £900,000 was advanced in that manner. There were loans to Sanitary Authorities upon the same easy terms, and I believe about £38,000 was advanced in that way. There were loans to the various baronies for baronial improvements on similar terms, and these loans amounted to £270,787. And there was the gift of £45,000 for the construction of piers and harbours. In 1886, again, there was a sum of £20,000 given, also to small piers and harbours. Both in 1879-80 and in 1886 there were some loans and gifts to various Boards of Guardians, and, above all, in both years the rules which normally govern relief in Ireland were relaxed and out-door relief was permitted in Unions in the cases of occupiers of land of more than a quarter of an acre. That being a brief enumeration of the means of relief previously applied, what judgment ought we to pass upon the success which has respectively attended them? The £900,000 advanced in 1879 is, I think, an example which ought not to be followed on this occasion, for two quite separate reasons. First, I do not believe that now, since the Act of 1885, the landlords have been prepared to borrow money at all. Before that Act, which so materially altered the status of the landlords, they were no doubt prepared to borrow money in many cases upon these terms, and thereby to afford a great deal of what was, no doubt, valuable assistance to the population. I do not think they would—I am sure they would not—do it now, but even if they were prepared to do it, I do not think that is a convenient method of attempting to supply relief, because the relief does not solely depend upon the degree in which it is required, but depends also upon the willingness and ability of particular landlords to borrow large sums of money, and there is no ground for supposing that the ability and willingness of the landlords to borrow money would be in any direct relation to the amount of distress existing in their districts. I therefore reject that method as not only impossible, but inexpedient. It is, no doubt, possible that loans to baronies might not be open to objections of a similar kind, but they have objections peculiar to themselves. In looking back upon the manner in which the money lent to baronies in 1880 was expended, I find that it too often happened that the persons who benefited by that money were not the poor, not the inexperienced poor who were really in need of employment, but rather small local contractors accustomed to make roads under the county surveyors and under the Grand Juries, and that these small contractors naturally enough gave the money with which they were supplied, not to the able-bodied poor who desired employment, but to their own particular friends and relations. I think that argument is conclusive against employing Baronial Authorities as organs for relieving distress. The loans to Sanitary Authorities—the money spent upon piers and the money spent upon harbours and boat-slips—are open to another objection. That such piers and boat-slips can be, with advantage, constructed in various parts of Ireland I am not prepared to deny—far from it, although an immense amount has already been done in that direction. The objection, I think, is not that these piers and boat-slips are useless, but that they do not employ unskilled labour. The amount of unskilled labour proportionate to the expenditure which can be used upon works of that kind is very trifling, and these works, however useful and expedient they may be, are not fitted to be our mainstay in dealing with impending distress. The only other expedient which I have enumerated, and which has been employed, is a relaxation of the rules governing out-door relief in Ireland, combined with loans and gifts to various Unions; and I say, if experience has proved anything, it has proved absolutely and conclusively that you cannot trust Boards of Guardians in Ireland, under the stress of a calamity of this kind, to administer out-door relief and gifts and loans from this House without gross extravagance, amounting in many cases to scandalous fraud. The experience of 1880 and of 1886 taught one lesson. I do not wish to introduce any controversial element into this speech, and I am very far from desiring to attack the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. J. Morley); but he, of course, is as well aware as I am that the manner in which the five or six Unions distributed the £20,000 free gift of this House in 1886 was perfectly iniquitous, and that in one case there were more persons upon the list for relief than the total number of inhabitants of the Union. I say that that instance alone should warn this House, and warn this Committee, against endeavouring for the third time to repeat this most disastrous experiment, and should induce them to adopt any expedient, however costly to the community, rather than increase the demoralisation which has been produced by this unfortunate measure on previous occasions. I have explained to the Committee what it is I do not mean to do, and why I do not wish to do it. Let me now tell the Committee what it is I hope to do, with their sanction, and how I think it will meet the present crisis. After the Poor Law I rely principally upon the railway works which are about to be constructed. In County Cork there is a line to be constructed from Skibbereen to Baltimore, seven and a half miles, and the Bantry extension, a mile and a half, a short though costly work; in the County of Kerry there are the Headfort to Kenmare, and the Killorglin to Valentia Island lines, respectively 19 miles and 25 miles; in County Galway the Galway to Clifden line, 49 miles; in County Mayo the Westport to Mulrany line, 18 miles, with an extension to Achill of 8 miles; the Ballina to Killala line, eight miles; and works are to be begun on the Coolgreany and Claremorris line, which, if completed, would amount to 48 miles; in Donegal the Donegal and Killybegs line, 18 miles, and the Stranorlar to Glenties line, 24 miles. In addition to the above, which are either constructed under the Act of 1889, or have been begun by the authority of the Government independently of any Act, there are three lines to be constructed, respectively in Clare, Mayo, and Galway and Cork, under the Act of 1883, passed by the right hon. Member for Bridgeton (Sir G. Trevelyan). There is the South Clare line, 26 miles; the Tuam and Claremorris line, 16 miles; and the Donoughmore line, County Cork, eight miles. The total mileage of the lines I have enumerated is no less than 284 miles authorised and about to be begun. But the Committee will ask me, how soon will these lines be available to meet the distress? Unfortunately, I cannot give a perfectly complete answer to that question, but I may say that the Skibbereen and Baltimore line was begun on November 24, and that 300 men are now employed upon it; the Bantry extension will be begun on December 15; the Galway and Clifden line was begun on December 2; the Westport and Mulrany line on December 3; the Achill extension I hope to have in full operation by December 15; the Ballina and Killala on the 8th, and the Claremorris on the 15th of December. With regard to the Donegal and Killybegs line tenders for the earthworks have actually been opened and begun, and the Glenties line contractor informs me that he is ready to commence work at a week's notice. Therefore, there only remains uncertain in the first class of railways I have enumerated the two Kerry lines. With regard to the two Kerry lines, I had the honour of an interview with the Chairman of the Great Southern and Western Railway before I left Ireland. They labour under a technical difficulty which will be removed when the House passes the Bill now before it; but I distinctly understood that, in spite of these technical difficulties, they were prepared to begin the work instantly if the Government were prepared to indemnify them for any loss they might sustain in consequence of not being in a legal position to draw up formal contracts. I thought that the House would sanction any such action on my part, and I certainly understood that with that promise of indemnity they would begin at once. Why they have not done so I cannot say; but the assurances given me by the chairman were such that I have not the slightest doubt that in a very few days work will be begun on these two lines also. It will be seen, therefore, that these 284 miles of railway will be in full operation in a very short period. This, I think, reflects credit on all concerned. I will not dwell upon the exertions of the Government; but it is only fair that I should say that the authorities of these great Railway Companies of Ireland have shown themselves fully alive to the exigencies of the situation. They have felt that they owed something to the community from which they draw their profits; they have done their best to second the efforts of the Government; and though I do not think that any of their officials or shareholders will for a moment suggest that the terms offered by the Government are not such as to secure them from all loss, still no one will be prepared to deny that that depreciates very little, if at all, the credit which they deserve for the energy and public spirit they have shown on this occasion. The criticism which has been passed on these great works as means of relief usually resolves itself into this. Everybody I have talked to in Ireland admits that if people can get work on the railways, it is by far the best way of relief. Everybody, of whatever shade of politics, of whatever profession or religious belief, priest or occupier, agrees that the distribution of charity in 1879 and 1880, and the reckless administration of outdoor relief in 1886, produced a demoralisation, not only in those years themselves, but more or less lasting in its character, and with one consent they all implored me, while asking me to find some method for the relief of the distress, to adopt means which would not demoralise the population concerned. And though all agreed that no method can be chosen less open to such objection than work on the railways, it was said that work on the railways would only be of use to the relatively small portion of the population who live close to the railways. They put it in this way: The man who goes far from home to work on railways would have to pay for lodging and food; and if he gets in wages 12s. or 14s. a week—which, I take it, is the rate that will prevail—he will probably not be able to send back to his family more than 4s. or 5s. a week, if so much. I think that is a valid argument, and I think that these railway works will not produce the benefit which I anticipate, unless provision can be made for lodging the people in the neighbourhood of the works in a manner which will enable them to send home at least 7s. a week. In order to carry out that object, I have corresponded with and seen personally those who will be concerned in the carrying out of the works. I had a long conversation with Mr. Worthington, the well-known Irish contractor, and with an hon. Member of this House, the Member for one of the Divisions of Dublin, who is also a large contractor. I laid before them the views of the Government with regard to feeding and lodging the men, and these and all the other contractors have equally expressed their readiness to come forward and make all the provision that may be required to render these works as useful as possible to the maintenance of the poor population. Therefore, I look forward with some confidence not only to the employment of people in the immediate neighbourhood of the railways, but to the employment of people living at considerable distances. Labourers may be expected to travel at least 10 or 20 miles if at the end of the journey they can be adequately lodged and can send home to their families sufficient to keep them. So much for the main part of my scheme, which depends upon the construction of railways.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman state whether the contractors have been put under any condition as to the employment of the people in the districts?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am glad my hon. Friend has asked me that. I have made very particular inquiries in this connection, and I find that not only will the contractors employ the people in the district, but that it is their interest to do so. The arrangements made with the Railway Companies insure that the work which is to be first begun is work on which unskilled labour can be profitably employed, such as embankments and earthworks of different kinds. It has further been arranged that the work shall be begun at a large number of points along the various railways at once, so as to afford the greatest amount of employment to unskilled labour living in the neighbourhood of the lines. But though I look forward with great confidence to these railway works meeting the great bulk of the demand for employment which the failure of potatoes will produce in Ireland, I am perfectly conscious that there are districts and localities where, for various reasons, but chiefly on account of distance, some other mode of dealing with the difficulties is required. I have told the House that the only method by which the railway works can be supplemented is by other relief works; and I have already said that I do not mean to employ Boards of Guardians or baronies, or any County or Local Authorities whatever, in these relief works. If we are to be in any way responsible for meeting this distress, I do not think that it is fair to us or to anyone else that the responsibility should be shared by bodies over which we have no control. I am convinced that money spent through the medium of Local Authorities would not be money spent to the best advantage of the particular population concerned. I have obtained the services of two eminent engineer officers, and I have sent them over those parts of Ireland where I think it possible that relief works may be required. They have made a careful survey under my instructions of what works may, if they be required, be beneficially undertaken. When works are required and are undertaken, I propose that the persons responsible for them shall be those engineers, and under them, possibly, the County Surveyors, not acting as servants of the Grand Jury, but acting as servants of the Government, and I propose that the works shall be attended by members of the corps of Royal Engineers. Under these circumstances, I think we shall be able to absolutely stop anything in the nature of local jobbery and to insure that any expenditure on public works goes to the employment of the unskilled labour that we wish to relieve. I believe that all the evils which have been incident to previous forms of public relief will be by this means avoided. Of course the amount given in wages, either in money or in kind, will be entirely under the control of Government, and, of course, I shall take care that under no circumstances does any relief work interfere with railway work. I shall not allow works to be undertaken where

I think that railways will serve the purpose, and I shall stop any relief works which are begun before the railway. I shall also take care that the wages are such that it will be to the labourers' interest to work under the railway contractor rather than on the relief works which may have been started. The Committee will naturally ask what kind of relief works I propose. Any one who has travelled, as I have, and seen, or who has read about the condition of the West of Ireland, is well aware that roads have been constantly undertaken for this and similar purposes. They have not, however, been undertaken, I regret to say, with much judgment. You will constantly see a road leading from nowhere to nowhere, or to some inhospitable bog. These are the memorials and relics of some previous famine, and the memorials also, I am afraid, of the incompetence of some authority which was responsible for the construction of the road. At the same time, though very useless roads have been constructed, road-making does present certain advantages over other forms of relief works, and I have instructed the officers of whom I have spoken to put roads in the very first rank, subject to this condition: that no road should, under any circumstances, be made which a prudent County Authority would not readily vote money to keep up. There is another kind of work which I think in some places might with advantage be adopted even before roads. There are certain districts in Ireland where you see holdings along the lower slopes of mountains or along some line of bog, all of which could be greatly improved by improving the general system of drainage. A common system of drainage is required I believe, and that, I take it, will not only afford labour for which the people are particularly qualified, but, as it will permanently improve the holdings, it will diminish the possibility of a recurrence of famine. There was a form of relief, very like this, which was much pressed upon me when I was in Ireland. I was recommended to pay the occupiers wages for improving their holdings; but I cannot recommend this course to the Committee. One of the most melancholy facts which strike anyone who looks at these holdings in the West of Ireland is that the occupiers have ample leisure in the winter to carry out improvements of the most obvious kind; but year after year elapses, and the improvements are not made. To come forward in years of distress, and say, "I will pay you to do that which you ought to have done years ago," is the worst lesson which you can possibly teach. So much for the roads and main drains, which will form the staple of such relief works as may be required. There are two other forms of relief work which I think may be attempted in a tentative fashion—I mean the reclamation of land and afforesting. I need hardly say that I do not believe there are huge tracts in Ireland which only require large sums to be spent upon them in order to become extremely profitable investments. I am sceptical about that, but I think that where there are in the immediate neighbourhood of existing holdings tracts of bog precisely of the character of the soil out of which these holdings were originally carved it might be advantageous as an experiment to carry out the drainage, sub-soiling, and other operations which are necessary as a preliminary to cultivating the soil. What should be done with the land so obtained is a difficult question, but my own impression is that it should be handed over to the Congested Districts Board, which I hope is to be constituted by the Bill now before the House; and it is worth considering how far it might not be worth while for that Board to let out the land so reclaimed on short leases to the occupiers of existing holdings under the most stringent conditions of cultivation. I admit that the experiment is a rash one. I think it is possible, if those occupiers were allowed to use this land under conditions of cultivation which would oblige them to see by experiment how very badly they now cultivate their holdings, something might be done in a practical manner to improve the condition of these people. I admit that the matter is one of great difficulty, and I am not at all competent to decide it; but it is a matter which I think the Congested Districts Board would be eminently qualified to deal with. With regard to forests, it is a matter of universal complaint that the result of recent events in Ireland has been to denude it of timber. There are two distinct sets of causes tending in the same direction. One is that the landlords, to whom residence is not always made agreeable in Ireland, are anxious to turn into money that timber which they are perfectly prepared in more fortunate circumstances to leave on the land. The other is that the new purchasers under the Ashbourne Act, and, I fear, under the Bill now before the House, always set to work to cut down timber on the holdings as soon as the control of the landlord is removed. I believe there are tracts of Ireland well suited, but almost useless now, for afforesting. At all events, all the preliminary operations of afforesting—such as draining, and turf fencing, and so forth—are operations with which the Irish peasant is very familiar, and which apply just as much to the class of operation most suited for relief works. I hope I have explained adequately to the House the general line I propose to take. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle asks me who will direct the reclamations. I ought to repeat and supplement the observations which I have already made on the method which I propose for the control of the works. Practically, what I have done is to create a small department for dealing with those reclamation works. The person responsible to the House and otherwise will be myself, but the engineer officers will be under me. They will have the expert assistance of members of the Land Commission wherever required, and they will have such clerical assistance as the occasion warrants. They will carry out all the relief works which I think are required. I am conscious that this statement of mine will bring down upon my head from every part of Ireland loud and persistent demands for works to be started. But all I can say is, that I shall do my best not to start any relief work where it is not required. I shall do my best to sift all those stories of misery and distress which are too easily fabricated on the spot and too easily believed outside. I must ask the House to support me as well as they can both in carrying out the works which I have undertaken and in not carrying out the works for which I do not believe adequate necessity exists. I shall possibly be asked by some gentlemen below the Gangway, and perhaps above it, why it is that the Government propose to do for the West of Ireland what they never have done as yet, and what certainly they would decline to do, as far as I know, for any other part, broadly speaking, of the United Kingdom. The first answer I have to make is that, though the congested districts have never been treated precisely in this way, they have already been treated on many occasions in an exceptional way, and I maintain that the exceptional method of treatment which I now recommend is less open to criticism here and to abuse in Ireland than any of the various exceptional experiments which have preceded it. But I think there is something more to be said. If I am asked why I am prepared to recommend relief works in Ireland when I am not prepared to recommend relief works in London, I say that not merely has Ireland been always treated exceptionally, but, as a matter of fact, its condition is exceptional. The Poor Law in London always has been, and I trust always may be, adequate to the necessities of London; but nobody who knows anything about these western districts can say or pretend that the resources of the Poor Law in Ireland are adequate to meet a crisis like the present. There is no rich population in these electoral divisions. The population of these electoral divisions which bear the main weight of the Poor Law taxation consist wholly and solely of the small occupiers whom we have to relieve, and to ask them to come forward and pay out of their own pockets the means for relieving their own exceptional distress is obviously impossible. But there is another and even a deeper reason. My own firm conviction is that to meet any temporary need which unskilled labour in London might have for employment by starting Government relief works would be found to permanently aggravate the evil which it is intended to meet. Such temporary want of employment results from the discrepancy between the supply and the demand of labour; and I believe the relations between the demand and supply of labour would be still further dislocated if on such an occasion the Government were to step in and provide relief works for London, and London would be not more but far less capable of meeting the stress that was laid upon it if the Government were to adopt any policy of that kind. That is not the case, I believe, in the congested districts. I believe the large amounts, either in the form of railway or other works, which this House will be asked to give for the aid of the congested districts will render those districts not more but less liable to a recurrence of the same class of distress. I believe that the making of those railways and roads, especially railways, will do much to act as a permanent remedy against the evil which we have to deal with to-day. If you were to make large contributions for relief works in London you would demoralise the district; in Ireland if you do not have relief works what do you do? You throw a burden on the locality which it cannot bear. You lend it money which it cannot pay back; and it will sink deeper and deeper in the demoralising slough of insolvency which already has almost destroyed the powers of self-help in the poorer and congested parts of the country. I cannot conclude without, as far as in me lies, imploring every man who hears me and who has anything to do with Ireland to face the real difficulties of this problem. It is too much the habit of those living in the West of Ireland to say, "Get us over this year's distress, and perhaps all will be well." All will not be well if that habit of mind continues to prevail. This House has been asked to make an immense effort for those congested districts; they must make an effort for themselves. The priests and the leaders of the people must put their shoulder to the wheel. They must recognise that if when the next time of distress comes—as most infallibly it will come—they come to this House and say, "Four or five years ago you helped us, and we have done nothing in the meanwhile to help ourselves; the population has not diminished; it has, perhaps, somewhat increased; the fishing is very much where it was; the mode of cultivation of the holdings is such as has prevailed for the last 100 years," Parliament will begin to feel that the condition of those districts is not merely deplorable, but almost hopeless. I think that the people of Ireland are capable of learning a lesson. The years 1880 and 1886 have already taught priests and people alike the demoralising effect of lavish expenditure, either in the way of charity or outdoor relief. Let them learn the further lesson that the population which remains in these districts can only be prosperous if they cultivate the land better, if they fish better, if they use to the best of their ability such resources as are placed at their disposal, and that there are districts for which no mere improvements in the methods of agriculture, no better system of fishing can be sufficient, and which can only be dealt with adequately by emigration and migration. If they set themselves to deal with each district as the circumstances of the district require, by attempting to collect the fishing population around the good harbours and the best fishing grounds, to help them to improved methods of agriculture, and lead them to see that it is impossible they should prosper if crowded on the soil; if they will do that, I am convinced this House will never regret the money which I am asking it to spend as a beginning. A substantial and important beginning may at last be made to take these people out of this hopeless slough of insolvency; and, if that be so, we may feel that this period of distress, this year 1890, may be the beginning of a period in which the people may march steadily forward to that condition of prosperity, and, above all, of independence, which every true well-wisher of Ireland desires to see them attain.

(5.33.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman in wishing to eliminate from the very few observations with which I shall trouble the Committee anything of a controversial character. The right hon. Gentleman has avoided that tone, and I am sure that everyone who considers the deplorable state of these districts will feel we are bound to lay aside every trace of Party spirit. So far as regards the remark of the right hon. Gentleman that experience has taught us the hopelessness of the methods hitherto resorted to, everybody who has studied the history of these districts and of the Relief Act of 1886 must agree as to the incapacity shown by the Boards of Guardians in administering the relief funds. But I may say, as the Minister responsible for that Act, that there did not appear at the time any particular reason for setting aside the machinery of local administration, and I was advised that it would be too serious a step to take if I were to supersede it. We have had that painful lesson, the advantage of which the right hon. Gentleman now possesses. Therefore I am bound to say, reluctant as I am on any occasion, or under any circumstances, to set aside the functions of an Elective Local Body, that the right hon. Gentleman has adopted the right course on the present occasion in taking the administration of these works into his own hands. I understand from the right hon. Gentleman that the works are not to be carried out under the supervision of the Board of Works, but under his own control. [MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes.] The right hon. Gentleman has not told us what is to be the total expenditure, and I think it is only fair before giving him the £5,000 he asks for to-night that we should know what is to be the total expenditure on all these various and, I should think, very costly operations which he has outlined.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I deliberately asked for the nominal sum of £5,000, because it is really impossible at this stage of the matter to make any forecast. It is difficult—I am afraid in the case of the railways it is impossible—at this moment to make a forecast; but I shall in January, when I shall ask for the necessary funds, be in a far better position to tell how the matter stands. I would venture to point out to the Committee that if I were to name a sum now I should be more than ever a prey to that kind of begging which Public Bodies resort to. I hope, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman will not press me to give any amount.

MR. J. MORLEY: Of course, after what he has said I will not press the right hon. Gentleman, but I am bound to point out in passing that his policy is committing Parliament to what may prove a very serious expenditure. I will say frankly that I agree with much that fell from the right hon. Gentleman in the latter part of his observations as to the duty we owe those districts and as to the exceptional and deplorable state in which they are sunk, and as to the obligation which lies on this House to make what I may call a dead lift to get them out of their degraded position. But Parliament ought to be prepared for facing a very large expenditure, and, though I would not grudge it, I should not be surprised if the right hon. Gentleman hears, when the country sees how much will be wanted, a good deal of murmuring from a good many quarters, and not merely on this side of the House. As to his railway policy, the right hon. Gentleman seems to pay some rather undeserved compliments to the public spirit of the Railway Companies. This is not the occasion on which to go into the terms of the transactions made by the Government with the companies; but when that occasion comes, I think it will be found that the Great Southern and Western and the Midland Great Western Companies have made no bad bargains for themselves, but very good bargains. I gather from the remarks addressed by the Chairman of the Midland Great Western Railway, a couple of months ago, to his shareholders, that he congratulated the shareholders on the terms he had succeeded, in their interest, in extracting from the Government. I, therefore, demur to the compliments which the right hon. Gentleman paid to the Railway Companies. I regard the transaction between the Government and the companies as a purely business one, and I am not sure that the Government have not paid a very heavy price for the advantages they have gained. That, however, we shall have an opportunity of examining later on. As to the immediate relief of the distress, the right hon. Gentleman, in answer to an objection that the railway works would not go through the most distressed districts, though they would go through districts where there was a great deal of distress, said that it would be the interest of the contractors to employ the labour of the districts. I was in the districts before the right hon. Gentleman himself, and I heard experts doubt that proposition. They said that it would be the interest of the contractors to get very powerful navvies from other places, and even from England and Scotland, because the population on the spot would not be efficient enough to carry out the heavy work of railway construction. The right hon. Gentleman is no doubt aware that this is a danger which might thwart his object.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Actual experience is on my side. There have been railways constructed in such districts, and I am informed that the contractors have employed local labour.

MR. J. MORLEY: I hope sincerely that that will be so. There is another point as to the construction of railways as a method of relieving distress. Of course, there is, as the right hon. Gentleman says, a great difference of opinion as to the route to be taken by some of the railways. For example, in the case of the railway from Clifden to Galway it is a matter of great controversy whether it would not be much better, from the point of view of distress at all events, to take the line by the coast. The other plans which the right hon. Gentleman resorts to are road making, drainage, reclamation, and afforesting. With regard to road-making, I agree with the right hon. Gentleman. Everybody with the most superficial acquaintance with Ireland must be aware that there were numbers of roads started in the famine times and in 1880 which began nowhere in particular and led nowhere. In 1886 there were some very good roads made, and I believe we got value for our money. But there is no form of relief which leads to so much make-belief work. A man may pretend to be making a road, and, in fact, be only pleasantly idle. Experience proves that to be the case, and, therefore, I am not at all sure there may not be in this road-making, if not carefully and vigilantly supervised, as much fraud and corruption as there was under some of the provisions of the Act of 1886. As to reclamation and afforesting, I thoroughly applaud the right hon. Gentleman for being willing to try the experiment. I am not going into controversy, but we should have more hope from this experiment if undertaken and carried on by a Local Body. I do not mean Boards of Guardians or such Boards, but a Local Government Body, an Irish body. The right hon. Gentlemen referred to the importance of enlisting on his side in the administration of his Act the priests and the leaders of the people. I would rather that the priests and leaders of the people, politicians, everybody of authority and with a large and perfect knowledge of the district, should indicate the line of the experiment, than that it should come, as I presume it will, partly from the right hon. Gentleman's own ingenuity, and partly also from the Boards in Dublin Castle. There is less chance of flexibility and originality in the way of making experiments when conducted by the right hon. Gentleman than if you had a Congested District Board which would be really representative and had on its side the whole local interest, and the whole of the local sympathy. I only want to make one proviso with reference to these experiments. From my own study of this question I doubt very much whether reclamation taken in hand by the Government on a large scale can be a remunerative experiment. I think you will sink a great deal of money, and in the end get a very small return for it. The great instance of reclamation, of course, is Kylemore, but even in that case it has been doubted whether the reclamations have not involved a heavy money loss. It is said also that some of that reclaimed land is going back, that rushes are appearing, and so forth. The lesson to be learnt, I take it, is that reclamation to be carried out remuneratively and safely should be undertaken by the small men themselves. I understand that the Government are to hand over these reclaimed lands on short leases to the people already occupying them. My own notion of reclamation would rather be to give to a small man a piece of bog land to reclaim. He would be more likely to do the work cheaply and effectively. I fear that the experience we have of reclamation on a large scale shows it to be a very losing enterprise. I wish to make one bargain with the right hon. Gentleman, that if he begins these experiments they shall be finished. The curse of Irish experiments is too often this; an experiment is begun to tide over some temporary distress, and as soon as the distress has passed, or the Minister initiating the experiment goes out of office, it is dropped and the money spent upon it is absolutely lost and wasted. I hope to get from the right hon. Gentleman an undertaking that so far as in him lies these experiments of reclamation and afforesting shall not be taken up simply to enable us to get out of the difficulties of to-day, but that they shall be serious works undertaken with a serious view of doing permanent good to the unfortunate people in these poor districts. [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!] With respect to the railway policy of the right hon. Gentleman I reserve the right of criticising its details. As for the seed provisions, I think the right hon. Gentleman is again on the right line. The provision for 20 per cent. discount on ready money transactions is a most sensible provision. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman most cordially in thinking that the great thing is to teach the people of these districts that they must depend upon themselves. But when the right hon. Gentleman was speaking in that sense I asked myself—Has not every Minister who has brought in a Relief Bill for Ireland said exactly the same thing? I am sure I need not make an exception. I am sure that I did myself, and I doubt whether any one Chief Secretary has ever made a proposal to give money to Ireland for the congested districts or elsewhere without speaking in the sense in which the right hon. Gentleman has spoken. I fail to see what element there is in the project of the right hon. Gentleman that is likely to make these people more self-reliant. Everything is done for them. The only lesson they can learn—and I admit it was also so in regard to my Bill of 1881—is that when they get into trouble, whether in consequence of their own improvidence or not—although one does not like to speak of improvidence in the case of men who live under such conditions as those in the West of Ireland—this Parliament is sure to come to their relief. I would give much to get that notion extirpated from the minds of the Irish peasantry. But to accomplish this you would have to adopt far wider measures; you would have to put the responsibility of dealing with this intricate, this inveterate problem upon Irishmen themselves, and without official supervision. Whatever we may think as to the sources of the difficulties in the congested districts, we must all recognise that a state of things that has grown up in 200 years cannot certainly be cured at once. You will want 30, 40, or 50 years before you can make even an impression upon this difficult problem, and although we must accept the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman as a means of tiding over a pressing emergency, I hope he will not allow himself to be led into the belief that anything can make a real impression upon these districts except a long, persistent, continuous course of action on the part of a Congested District Board, or similar organisation, having enlisted on its side the whole local feeling of a district, and commanding, in the performance of its work, the co-operation of the best brains in the district.

(5.54.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): The advice given by the right hon. Gentleman is extremely good. I hope we shall have self-reliance in the West of Ireland, and that the people of the districts will be assisted by the men of brains, but just at present it is not so much a theoretic virtue that is wanted as a little practical help. Whenever I hear this talk of self-reliance I cannot help thinking that if you would give us the produce of the Licence Duties and let us cultivate our own tobacco, we should be able to help ourselves. I am very sorry to say that I was engaged in much more disagreeable work upstairs when the Chief Secretary was speaking, and therefore I was unable to hear all the right hon. Gentleman's remarks. I believe he has said the provisions of the Bill will include all the West of Ireland, and I believe the measure will be a great success. It is, in my opinion, perfectly fair to pay interest on the money out of the Church Fund. On the last occasion when a scheme of this kind was carried out, we were able to say that we paid all the money back, and in the present case we shall be able to say the same thing. I think we may congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on having done a great deal to tide over the time of distress.

*(5.56.) SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): All must acknowledge the admirable tone adopted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle in his speech, and I myself noticed with regret that the Nationalist Party were not present to hear the exposition of the Chief Secretary of the scheme, and that they are not here now to take part in the discussion. I do not share the apprehensions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) with regard to the absolute certainty, as he regarded it, that the local populations will not be employed in the construction of these works. That may be the case in some districts, but I do not think it will be universally so. I believe the very fact that so many lines of railway will be constructed simultaneously by contractors will prove that there is not a sufficient number of ordinary navvies available to do all the work. It will be more economical to employ the local population in the preliminary labour on the lines. It is satisfactory to find the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle accepting the plan of my right hon. Friend with regard to taking these exceptional matters of relief out of the hands of the Board of Guardians. In the absence of the Nationalist Party I should like to say that, according to the evidence placed in our hands by the Colonisation Committee, I think we may claim that the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) himself will approve of the action of the Chief Secretary in not trusting Boards of Guardians in this matter. Speaking in regard to the relief of the congested districts by emigration and migration, I find the following passage in the evidence of the hon. Member for Cork (Question No. 5656 in the Report of the Colonisation Committee):—

"Q. Then I understand you would not take the opinion of Boards of Guardians as indicating local opinion in Ireland?—A. Certainly not."

Therefore, I think we are all united in approving of contributions from the Exchequer towards relief by means of work other than railways directly through a Government Department. Just one more matter I should like to mention. One of the dangers in the congested districts and throughout Ireland is the habit that tenants are universally getting into of cutting down the timber and shelter on their farms. I can go further than the Chief Secretary. He says that tenants who have purchased do this, but I can answer from my own observation that one of the effects of the Act of 1881 in districts bordering on the Atlantic is that the tenants imagine that other changes beside alteration of rents have flowed from that Act, and the destruction of timber and even of hedges is remarkable, and has already produced evil consequences, and will have disastrous consequences on agricultural prospects in the future. I would say, therefore, in regard to experiments in reforestation, that they should be gradually undertaken, and not pushed too far. The Chief Secretary has paid a great compliment to the Grand Trunk Line Railway Companies in Ireland, but knowing something of the work done by others, I think it my duty on behalf of the inhabitants of a remote district of Kerry, as the representative of that district is not present, to say that we in that district appreciate the unsparing exertions of the Chief Secretary himself and of the Secretary to the Treasury. I had the opportunity of knowing that while we were taking our holidays the Chief Secretary and the Secretary to the Treasury sacrificed their holidays to this object. I can say that the Secretary to the Treasury from first to last spared no personal exertions to get this work thoroughly and quickly done. I think it only right to say this, and I think I may say it for the poor people of the district not now represented here. We cordially thank both these right hon. Gentlemen for their personal exertions to carry through these railway schemes.

(6.3.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I listened with close attention to the speech of the Chief Secretary, and I am sure the Committee agree with me that the right hon. Gentleman, having a most difficult task to undertake, has devoted himself to it with an enormous amount of application; and if I venture, as I shall venture, to offer one or two words before I sit down that may not seem to be quite words of gratitude, he must not think that I at all undervalue the difficulties of the work he has undertaken and the troubles he has had to contend with. He has not only had the difficulties of what he has told us, but he has the difficulty of the long habits of the people, which he has to some extent to endeavour to change, if he can, if any permanent good is to be produced. I wish it had been possible, though I agree it would be difficult, for the Chief Secretary to have told the Committee some amount beyond which Parliament was not being committed by the Vote the Committee is asked to give on this Estimate, because, although the Estimate is only for a very trifling sum, the Chief Secretary does not disguise that he is asking the sanction of Parliament, through this Committee, to the whole of the scheme he is putting forward; therefore the decision, whatever it may be, is a decision of the very gravest character. I am not sure whether for the moment it was wise, although I am quite sure that for the future it was frank, for the Chief Secretary to say that he might subject himself to the criticisms of those who have in view distress in other parts of the United Kingdom, who might ask the Government, "Why do you not deal with all instances as you are proposing to deal with this?" To that, I admit, it is difficult to give an answer, but the answer the right hon. Gentleman gave hardly, I think, did credit to the rest of his speech. All the answer he made was that the circumstances were exceptional. [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR expressed dissent.] I am sure on this question I have no wish to strain one word used by the right hon. Gentleman beyond the meaning that may fairly be attached to it. I listened attentively and with intense pleasure to the speech as an effort to do some good to the unfortunate country without reference to political divisions.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am quite sure the hon. Member does not mean to misrepresent what I said. It is true I stated that the circumstances in Ireland being exceptional are treated in an exceptional manner, but I also dwelt at some length on the fact that, whilst the treatment we are giving to Ireland would, as applied to London, aggravate the evils in London, in Ireland it would have the effect of preventing a recurrence of those evils.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I was coming to that portion of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. I would put it to him whether he himself did not rather cut the ground from under his own feet? He showed that effort after effort had been repeated in Ireland, each provocative of demoralisation there rather than tending to encourage self-reliance. ["No."] The hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Nolan) disagrees, but I am only repeating what the Chief Secretary said, not expressing my own opinion, as now I am going to do, nor do I expect him to agree in what I am going to urge. What are the grounds for supposing that this scheme will be more effectual in developing self-reliance than any other to which Parliament has consented? I frankly concede that my opposition to the right hon. Gentleman is weighted with the same difficulty which attended his speech. It is clear there is distress continuous course of action on the part of a Congested District Board, or similar organisation, having enlisted on its side the whole local feeling of a district, and commanding, in the performance of its work, the co-operation of the best brains in the district.

(5.54.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): The advice given by the right hon. Gentleman is extremely good. Gentleman, having a most difficult task to undertake, has devoted himself to it with an enormous amount of application; and if I venture, as I shall venture, to offer one or two words before I sit down that may not seem to be quite words of gratitude, he must not think that I at all undervalue the difficulties of the work he has undertaken and the troubles he has had to contend with. He has not only had the difficulties of what he has told us, but he has the difficulty of the long habits of the people, which he has to some extent to endeavour to change, if he can, if any permanent good is to be produced. I wish it had been possible, though I agree it would be difficult, for the Chief Secretary to have told the Committee some amount beyond which Parliament was not being committed by the Vote the Committee is asked to give on this Estimate, because, although the Estimate is only for a very trifling sum, the Chief Secretary does not disguise that he is asking the sanction of Parliament, through this Committee, to the whole of the scheme he is putting forward; therefore the decision, whatever it may be, is a decision of the very gravest character. I am not sure whether for the moment it was wise, although I am quite sure that for the future it was frank, for the Chief Secretary to say that he might subject himself to the criticisms of those who have in view distress in other parts of the United Kingdom, who might ask the Government, "Why do you not deal with all instances as you are proposing to deal with this?" To that, I admit, it is difficult to give an answer, but the answer the right hon. Gentleman gave hardly, I think, did credit to the rest of his speech. All the answer he made was that the circumstances were exceptional. [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR expressed dissent.] I am sure on this question I have no wish to strain one word used by the right hon. Gentleman beyond the meaning that may fairly be attached to it. I listened attentively and with intense pleasure to the speech as an effort to do some good to the unfortunate country without reference to political divisions.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am quite sure the hon. Member does not mean to misrepresent what I said. It is true I stated that the circumstances in Ireland being exceptional are treated in an exceptional manner, but I also dwelt at some length on the fact that, whilst the treatment we are giving to Ireland would, as applied to London, aggravate the evils in London, in Ireland it would have the effect of preventing a recurrence of those evils.

MR. BRADLAUGH:* I was coming to that portion of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. I would put it to him whether he himself did not rather cut the ground from under his own feet? He showed that effort after effort had been repeated in Ireland, each provocative of demoralisation there rather than tending to encourage self-reliance. ["No."] The hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Nolan) disagrees, but I am only repeating what the Chief Secretary said, not expressing my own opinion, as now I am going to do, nor do I expect him to agree in what I am going to urge. What are the grounds for supposing that this scheme will be more effectual in developing self-reliance than any other to which Parliament has consented? I frankly concede that my opposition to the right hon. Gentleman is weighted with the same difficulty which attended his speech. It is clear there is distress which ought not to be ignored, and, therefore, in dealing with the subject now, one cannot argue from any theory; but we must deal with the existing state of things as best we can. In some of the right hon. Gentleman's proposals I feel great interest, and particularly I followed that part of his speech in which he spoke of dealing with waste lands, because on more than one occasion I have ineffectually submitted propositions to the House on the subject. I gathered, though the explanation was incomplete, that the Government propose to acquire the lands and reclaim them. Does not this at the very onset make a difficulty which I will try to put to the right hon. Gentleman? It is not the encouragement of individual effort assisted by the State, even, perhaps, with great risk of loss, or even certainly of loss, but still with an incentive to the individual to do his best with gain to his interests if he succeeds and responsibility if he fails, if the experiment is to be confined to giving employment for some 12s. or 14s. a week, with nothing to tempt him to put in more than make-believe exertions sufficient to secure subsistence for the moment. It does seem to me, however, that reclamation efforts might tend, as I believe they would tend, to find some employment which should develop the individual effort, but if the Government is to acquire the land, the thing is upside down, so far as that is concerned, and it is simply a relief measure from which all incentive to special action is entirely eliminated. I would urge on the right hon. Gentleman that, as this is only put forward as an experiment, the experiment should be made as far as possible for the encouragement of individual effort. The Chief Secretary says the Irish are capable people, and I think they are. I think that, taken out of the conditions of life which hamper them, and habits which hinder them, they have in different parts of the world given evidence of capability. I admit it would not be possible to press the individual to make such great exertions, surrounded as he would be by conditions which incapacitate him at home; still if the effort is to be made at all, I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to make it in some such fashion if he can as will give reward to the individual who strives best. I am without information on the subject. I disagree with the right hon. Gentleman, and think that the evidence given before the Duke of Richmond's Commission shows large quantities of land, large tracts here and there, and small tracts here and there—I do not wish to take the most exaggerated statements of witnesses—large quantities of land capable of reclamation, on which efforts at successful reclamation have been made, and have only broken down because the persons trying to reclaim the land found that the landlord exacted higher rent for the improved quality given to the land. Now, is it possible, instead of the Government buying the land, or of the Government acquiring it, is it possible to let the individual on to it in connection with the work of reclamation on such terms as will hold out expectation of his becoming the proprietor of the land reclaimed? I do not know whether it is possible. I admit the great responsibility upon a Member who meets with objection what was throughout a careful presentment without some better means of information, but it is scarcely my fault. This Supplementary Estimate—I do not blame the Government for it—comes upon us by surprise, and I must plead that as an excuse for the non-efficiency of fact to support the case I am submitting. I fear that a great deal of the argument used by the right hon. Gentleman to-night will come against the Government of which he is a Member during the coming Session in different forms; and unless he can separate his measure from being one of pure relief and charity, unless he imports into it something of the development of self-reliance of which he has spoken, he will lay himself and his Government open to attacks difficult to answer. If the circumstances of the Irish people are exceptional, so are those of the people of this vast Metropolis, so are the aggravations of the evils in connection with congestion of population such as exist in other parts of the country, exceptional. It is a matter upon which I look with considerable apprehension, not wishing in any way to hamper the Government in the experiment they are making. If an error is committed, at least it is pacific in character; I do not in any way desire to hinder the experiment, and am willing to assist in making it successful, but I listened throughout to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, and I see no reason why in 1895 or 1896 a Minister should not come to the House of Commons, and present a case again, showing quite the same features, making quite the same claim upon the country.

*(6.20.) Mr. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I am not going to enter into the question whether these unfortunate people in the West of Ireland are to be made more self-reliant. Homilies are all very well in their way, but they are not very useful to hungry people. The Committee are face to face with the fact that a large area of Western Ireland is in danger of destitution and want. After journeying from Skibbereen to Gweedore last month I am convinced that in many districts through which I passed the inhabitants will not have a potato left on New Year's Day. It is of very little use talking about the people being more self-reliant. It is of no use saying they should develop their fisheries when they are without the means of providing nets and boats, and have no railway to send their fish to market when caught. In the present condition of things homilies on self-reliance is not the treatment we expect from the Government and the Committee. I greatly regret that the statement of the Chief Secretary has been made in the absence of so many of the Representatives of Ireland. It is a more important statement than any that have been made in recent Sessions of Parliament. Upon that statement I wish to ask one or two questions. I entirely approve of the proposal as to seed potatoes. I think this is the most valuable help that can be given to the people. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman over what area the relief is to be spread, and whether he proposes to schedule special districts. I think the area ought to be well considered, and resolutely adhered to. He will probably be pressed for a larger area of population than he has in his mind. With regard to the districts affected by the railways my mind is quite easy. I have travelled through those districts, and only wish that my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland had been with me. That hon. Gentleman did his best last Session to prevent the passing of the Light Railways Bill; but I found the people in the districts blessing the House of Commons for having frustrated the designs of the hon. Member. I am quite easy in my mind, so far as the districts are concerned in which railway operations will be carried on, but I am not quite at ease in regard to other districts. So far as the districts of Westport and Ballina are concerned I apprehend no danger, for railway work will be carried on there. But does the Chief Secretary know the districts of Swinford and Foxford—

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Perhaps my hon. Friend will allow me to say that I stated, though it was in the middle of a catalogue of railways, and thus, perhaps, escaped his notice, that we have, without the powers conferred under the Act, promoted a railway to the North, and work will be started at once through the district he is alluding to.

*Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: I am glad to hear that; it escaped my notice. Above all others the Swinford district needs relief. The contractors for the railway should be called upon to erect huts for labourers. If that were done I do not see why men who migrate in large numbers every year to Great Britain for the harvest should not go 20 miles for railway work. A man who will not do that will not require much sympathy from the House of Commons. There are several other points I should like to mention. Unfortunately there are a very large number of old people in these western districts. The young people have left the country, leaving the old people behind, people who are not fit for work on a railway, many of them not fit for work at all. The Chief Secretary has said to-night that he has made up his mind not to allow the Poor Law Rules to be relaxed. I know the danger that follows such relaxation, how it is open to abuse, but from what I have seen of the old people in the Island of Achill and elsewhere I do not believe that two months hence the right hon. Gentleman will be able to maintain his determination. There are parts of the country near which no line of railway is to go. Judging from the strip of the country through which I passed in the County of Leitrim the potatoes are worse there than in any other part, except, perhaps, in West Cork, but no railway is to go near Leitrim. What does the Chief Secretary propose with regard to such districts? I doubt if any railway is to go through the part of Sligo which will feel the pinch of the potato failure. What does the Chief Secretary propose? His first idea is the making of roads. Now, if there is one form of relief I distrust, and that I think has lamentably failed every time it has been put into operation, it is the making of roads. What is the use of making roads if, when they are made, the county is not to maintain them? I passed over miles of such roads, and continually had to take to the bog because the roads were impassable. They had been made during previous periods of distress, they led nowhere, they started from nowhere, and nobody took the slightest care of them when made—nobody supplied a barrowful of stones to repair them; the money spent on the construction was wasted. Now these roads were all made under supervision.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Whose?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I suppose under the supervision of previous Chief Secretaries.

An hon. MEMBER: The Board of Works.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Well, I do not know. But no money should be expended on making roads without careful supervision being exercised. One part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman I heard with regret. I had some hope, when he came to the question of drainage, he would touch upon a point I heard a great deal about in the West of Ireland, and upon which I think money might be judiciously spent. Instead of road-making, and even main drainage, I should have preferred an extension of the Loans Clauses of the Act of 1881, under which tenants can borrow money for the improvement of their holdings. I should have preferred that small holders under £10 or £12 valuation should have been allowed loans at a low rate of interest for draining operations. These are a necessity. In many places you may take a handful of earth and almost wring the water out of it. This would be a good substitute for road-making. By this means the people would be kept from want, the land would be improved, and the Government would get the money back. I offer these criticisms in no hostile spirit to the proposals of the Chief Secretary. In the main, I think them of the greatest value, and they will be received in Ireland with the greatest pleasure. Everything depends on supervision, and if the plans are worked out with spirit and care they will meet the present crisis and be permanently useful in the future.

(6.28.) MR. COX (Clare, E.): I am very glad to say that for once in my life I find myself thoroughly in accord with the hon. Member for South Tyrone. I regret that with other Irish Members I was not here to listen to what I am informed was a very liberal and able statement of the Chief Secretary upon the distress in Ireland. I regret it the more for my own part because the right hon. Gentleman touched upon subjects in which I am particularly interested. I rise now rather to ask a question or two for the sake of information than to criticise the details of the scheme laid before the Committee by the right hon. Gentleman, but with which I am but imperfectly acquainted. I join with the hon. Member for South Tyrone in asking the Chief Secretary to give us some definition of the proposed scheduled areas; this is information in which my own constituents have an interest. I deprecate the road-making proposal. I have had practical experience of the working of Relief Acts in Ireland. In 1879 I was Secretary to a Baronial Committee for the purpose of carrying out works under the Relief Act of that year, but the Committee were greatly hampered in their operations. We had practically nothing to do but to make roads and embankments to the roads. I agree with the hon. Member for South Tyrone that many of the roads lead to no place, and are of no use to the people now they are completed. Within a couple of months of their construction grass was growing over the roads. To give the people employment and keep them from starvation we had to construct roads, because, by Act of Parliament, we were prevented from engaging in more useful works. I appeal to the Chief Secretary to abandon the idea of making roads, at least to some extent, and do something in the way of drainage.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Member would have been at greater advantage if he had heard my speech. He is making recommendations which I think he would not have made if he had heard what I said.

MR. COX: I put a question to-day to the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) with reference to the Scarriff River, County Clare. In 1879 it was proposed to drain the river, and the sum of £32,000 was voted for the purpose. All the preliminary surveys were approved by the Board of Works, but it was necessary to form a Drainage Board. For one reason or another the people refused to form the Board. Thousands of acres of land are flooded every year and rendered good for nothing. I am happy to say that in the Recess I was able to gather in Scarriff all the representative men in the district—priests, landlords, land agents, occupiers, and nationalists. We had a most harmonious meeting, and adopted resolutions copies of which were sent to the Chief Secretary. I have now to ask the right hon. Gentleman to give careful consideration to the unanimous request made by the people, of all shades of opinion, in that particular part of the country; that request is, that a Drainage Board will be constituted and an enormous drainage scheme at once commenced. I understand that Colonel Turner, Resident Magistrate, is now making inquiries in Clare as to the advisability of reproductive works. I ask that he be instructed to inquire into the need of the drainage of the Scarriff River. The people do not ask for charity, but that they may be permitted to borrow money from the Board of Works or the Treasury—of course at a small rate of interest—so that they can proceed with this work, which will be useful, permanent, and reproductive.

*(6.34.) MR. MACARTNEY: I recognise that this is not a very convenient time to criticise at any length the extremely able statement made by the Chief Secretary, but there are one or two points in regard to which I desire to say a word or two. In respect of the method of distributing seed, I understand it only differs from previous methods in that it offers as an inducement to a part of the population to purchase seed for cash payments at a reduction of 20 per cent. It is upon that method I find my opinion somewhat at variance with the view of the Government. I admit that my experience of the congested portion of Ireland is confined to Donegal, but in that county I find the opinion of all classes of the people is absolutely opposed to the distribution of seed potatoes upon the methods that have previously been adopted. One farmer, who has had a great deal to do with the distribution of seed in his Poor Law Division, has told me it would be far better not to distribute a single seed potato than to employ the method adopted in previous years. Great difficulty surrounds the question, and I by no means wish to say my opinion or the opinion of the people in Donegal is absolutely right and ought to be adopted universally, but the Donegal people express their view so strongly that I am perfectly convinced that if the distribution of seed potatoes takes place upon any other system than that of cash payments on the spot, the idea of educating the people of the congested districts out of their dependence on public charity will not be realised. It may be said there are portions of the population in congested districts who are utterly unable to make a cash payment. I quite admit that that is so, but I meet it by saying that such cases represent—certainly in County Donegal—an infinitesimal proportion of those who require seed for next year, and that it will be perfectly easy to pick out the cases in which it would be preferable to give an absolutely free distribution of seed potatoes from those in which payment ought to be demanded. Then I desire to know whether any conditions have been placed on the contractors with regard to the employment of the local labour in the congested districts? The Chief Secretary said that no absolute condition has been imposed, but that in some recent experiment the contractor has employed local labour. I do not think it would be right for the House, and I certainly do not think it would be safe for the Irish Government, to leave this matter absolutely free to the good intentions of a railway contractor. It is possible that in one district the advantages of employing almost entirely local labour may be so great that a contractor will be forced to do so; but I doubt very much, especially in County Donegal, whether contractors will employ a certain proportion of local labour unless they are placed under stringent conditions to do so. They may find it better for them to employ labour which has always been employed on light railways in Ireland—that is, skilled labour, as against labour that has never been employed on railway works. I feel so strongly on this point that when the proper time comes I shall invite the House to insert some provision in the Bill which will preclude a contractor from making such excuses as will enable him to avoid the employment of a due proportion of local labour. I understand certain people imagine that local labour ought only to be employed upon the preliminary work. I know of no reason why local labour, if it is employed on the preliminary work, should not be employed throughout the whole undertaking. It is necessary, no doubt, that some of the men employed should be skilled labourers, but contractors ought not to be allowed to suppose that they can employ the people in the locality for the first few weeks, and then cast them adrift. On the question of road-making, I find myself entirely in accord with the views expressed on the opposite side of the House. I have the greatest possible objection to the making of a single new road in Ireland. Under the Relief Act of 1886 money was expended in Donegal in making new roads, but no one used the roads. Their construction was a very interesting means of employing the engineering talent, but they are white elephants for the county. No money was taken from the cesspayers in respect to the making of the roads, but now the cesspayers have to keep them in repair. I shall certainly invite the House on this point also to insert a provision in the Bill preventing a single farthing being expended on making new roads. But, while I am of this opinion, I think a great deal of the money might be expended on improving the existing roads, especially those in the West of Ireland, which will connect the light railways with each other, and which are now in a deplorable condition. I do not deny that the reclamation of land is a very difficult question, but I believe that if the Government will really complete the experiment they will do considerable service. Many of the small holders are bad agriculturists, and it will be of the utmost value to them if a model farm can be established and they can see with their own eyes the best means for cropping the land in their neighbourhood.

Mr. Macartney

There is a most extraordinary prejudice in one portion of Donegal against the Champion potato. I have been informed by men who have had to do with the distribution of seed potatoes that the people in the Glenties Union are prejudiced against the Champion potato, because they have never seen it grow in the ground. The experiment made by the Chief Secretary last year has not proved successful, because all sorts of rumours were set afloat in respect to the Champion potato. Many people were told that the seeds were diseased and imported by the right hon. Gentleman for the purpose of 'devastating the country. As to the advantages of afforesting, I do not believe there are two opinions in Ireland. Any one who knows anything of the country knows that one of its greatest misfortunes is that it is absolutely deficient in the quantity of the necessary timber to counteract the atmospherical causes. Timber has been gradually disappearing from the holdings, but I am not sure that the view of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley)—namely, that afforesting should be entirely given over to Local Authorities—would be successful. The right hon. Gentleman will admit that in the two European countries in which tree culture has been brought to high perfection—France and Germany—the absolute control is not vested in the Local Authorities, certainly it is not in most parts of Germany, and I do not think it is in France. I believe that if afforesting is to be carried out successfully, it must be conducted by a Government Department possessing the very best scientific advice, and free from all local influences.

MR. J. MORLEY: I did not mean my remarks to apply to afforesting.

*MR. MACARTNEY: I am of opinion that if the Local Authority, whether the Board of Guardians or County Council, or whatever Local Authority may be hereafter created, are given considerable pecuniary interest in the result of afforesting, the experiment will prove a complete success. I do not wish to detain the Committee longer; but on the points I have raised I feel very strongly, and when the proper time arrives I shall endeavour to give effect to them.

* (6.40.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I am inclined to think that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. A. J. Balfour) would have convinced anyone who has not had the long and serious experience I have had of the difficulty of dealing with these questions of famine. But I must say also I could not help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman was a great deal too sanguine, and I could not but dwell on the long catalogue of failures and frauds he recited. His speech led me to wish that it was not necessary for us to do with this matter. I was one of those who went in for Home Rule for Ireland with a great deal of hesitation and some misgiving; but a speech like that of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, showing the enormous difficulties Englishmen must overcome in dealing with such a question in regard to Ireland, makes me very much wish that we could wash our hands of such subjects, and let somebody else be responsible for them. As to the amount of distress likely to occur, I admit I have not visited the districts in which the distress is anticipated; but I can give this negative evidence, that I have this season visited parts of Ireland where there is no distress, and where, on the contrary, the crops are excellent. I am inclined to think that perhaps too much has been made of the partial failure of potatoes in a limited portion of Ireland, and I am inclined to hope that it is not such a big thing as the Chief Secretary imagines. We are likely to experience, on the present occasion, very much what I have experienced on other occasions, namely, that people want to get all kinds of things done under the cry of famine that they would not get done under other circumstances. Though I give the Chief Secretary full credit for the utmost desire to do what he can for Ireland, I cannot help thinking that he is assuming that which has been called the "stick and pudding" policy. I am afraid the right hon. Gentleman has been somewhat too ready to persuade himself that this large sum of money will be spent with advantage in Ireland, and that he has taken too sanguine a view of the situation. The late Chief Secretary (Mr. J. Morley), who admitted that he himself had made a failure, said the Chief Secretary is trying the same experiments as have been tried by many Chief Secretaries before him, and that he is likely to meet with the same difficulties and perhaps the same results. We must be very careful in this matter not to listen too readily to the demands that come from Ireland. Although our hearts may be very willing to accede to the demands of people who are said to be suffering from poverty, we must take care that that feeling does not carry us too far. Care must be taken with regard to the relief works, so that we do not have roads constructed, as they have been in the past, that are of no use. You must also take care that you really do employ the poor people of the district. I know very well how very incompetent and unpaying pauper labour is, and I know that if you leave it to the Railway Directors they will employ the labour that pays them best. There is no labour so unprofitable as that rendered by people who think you are giving them work out of charity. I view with great distrust these drainage and reclamation schemes. Last year and the year before I think we succeeded in defeating some great drainage schemes of this kind.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is quite mistaken; the drainage schemes he refers to are of a very different character from that now before the House. The only point of resemblance is that the word "drainage" is used.

* SIR G. CAMPBELL: I quite admit that, but the principle is the same. The principle is that of spending British money in improving the character of the land in Ireland. I should like to ask this one question: When these drainage works are carried out, who is to receive the profit? Are the landlords at the next revision of rents to get the profit due to the expenditure of British money? Some means of preventing that were embodied in a scheme brought before the House by a former Chief Secretary, and I hope that a similar course will be adopted in the present instance. Of course, if we vote the £5,000 needed for making the inquiry, we do not pledge ourselves to the schemes themselves, and when the estimates for the schemes come before us we shall not be bound to sanction them. I wish to say one word on a subject which has already been referred to, namely, the position of the large body of persons who are not able-bodied and are not able to go to work. When the pinch of poverty comes, it is at first most severely felt by those who are not able-bodied, and who are not able to do profitable work, and it is my impression that this class should be provided for out of the relief afforded under the Poor Law system in Ireland with some relaxations. [Laughter.] I do not know why hon. Gentlemen laugh. I do not see why, if a large sum is to be provided out of the British Exchequer for the purpose of furnishing relief works for the able-bodied portion of the population, at least that portion which is required for the maintenance of those who are not able-bodied should come from the ordinary fund for the poor relief of the country.

(7.2.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I am glad to have the opportunity of making a few remarks on the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, of whom I may say that his manner has been so conciliatory and his intentions so kindly that although I feel it necessary to oppose the measure he has brought forward, I trust I shall in doing so exhibit a similar spirit. There are two things which the House ought to bear in mind in considering this question. The first is, how utterly incompetent this Committee is to deal with this purely Irish matter. Had this question been remitted to Irishmen in their own country, how much more competent would they have been to deal with it. The second point is, that the Chief Secretary is compelled to assure us that every effort in this direction that has been made before his time has been a failure. In that he was supported by the Irish Members who have addressed the House. [Colonel NOLAN: No.] Well, he has been supported by most of the Irish Members. I do not expect my hon. and gallant Friend below me (Colonel Nolan) to admit that anything is wrong in Ireland. But what does the right hon. Gentleman propose to do? He proposes to make roads and main drains, to reclaim land and to afforest a portion of the country. Now, as to roads, what do all the Irish Members tell us on that subject? They all tell us, "Whatever else you do, don't make roads, because the making of roads in days gone by has always been a failure." Well, what as to drains? Others who have spoken on the subject say, "Do not deal with main drains; do something else." When the right hon. Gentleman comes to the reclamation of land he is told by the late Chief Secretary, who is an authority on the subject, having had experience, to beware, and, with regard to afforesting, I have not heard anybody propose a tangible plan. We certainly have been told that it will be advantageous to have trees in Ireland, because the Irish have cut them down; but as you are going to hand over the land to the tenantry, I, for one, cannot see the utility of planting trees in order that the tenants may cut them down. All these things have been tried by equally kind-hearted Ministers, and equally philanthropic Governments in days gone by, and they have always failed. "But," says the Chief Secretary, "I shall succeed because I am going to try a new plan. I am not going to trust to the Local Authorities. I intend to have a special Board to carry on these works." But I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the great majority of the works of reclamation and other works for relief have been carried out in the past, not by the Local Authorities, but by a separate Board. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) introduced the Local Authority, but before that public relief works were carried on under the control of a public Board in Ireland. ["No, no!"] I say "Yes." They were so carried on in the main, whether drainage works, roads, or harbours, and they were all lamentable failures. Notwithstanding this, the right hon. Gentleman is going to attempt the impossible. I wish him success; but I tell him that, although my heart is with him, my judgment does not approve his plan, and I do not think he will succeed. The strangest thing about this business is that, while he asserts his desire to make the people to whom he proposes to administer relief self-reliant, he, nevertheless, intends to take the whole of the operations out of their hands, and to treat them as if they were not men, but mere human machines. I agree with him in saying that we ought to make these people independent, prosperous, and self-reliant if we can do so; but I cannot think you will secure that result, by administering the proposed relief in the manner suggested by the right hon. Gentleman. I say that his proposal is an impossible proposal. He is going to make certain gifts to this particular district in Ireland, and the money is to come from the Public Exchequer and the Irish Church Fund. He is under the impression that in this way the Irish people may be enabled to tide over the present period of distress, and that hereafter great blessings will be secured to the population. I sincerely hope he will be enabled to tide them over the period of distress. I cannot help giving him my hearty sympathy in this effort. I only regret that circumstances have been allowed to arrive at such a head once again that Parliament is asked to deal with this part of Ireland as it has had to do so often in the past. But I say that if the right hon. Gentleman is going, in defiance of all past experience, to bestow public money on the West of Ireland, while he declines to bestow it on this country, which almost equally needs it, ought he not, first, to take most stringent care to be as economical as possible in carrying out the works proposed; and, secondly, ought he not to see that the persons who are about to be benefited by those works, and who at the same time are not badly off, shall contribute a reasonable share of the outlay? I ask the House, is he economical? He is going to make railways. I ask him how have the landowners dealt with this matter? I allude to the landlords through whose district the railway will pass. I am told that personally I have done all I could against the construction of light railways. That is true, and I would do the same again. Let me recall what has happened with regard to these light railways. A Bill was passed in 1889. It was forced through the Committee upstairs, and afterwards forced through this House at what was expected to have been an All-night Sitting.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The fact is that a small minority attempted to coerce a great majority on the occasion referred to by the hon. Member.

MR. STOREY: Then we were only imitating the hon. Member and his friends in Ireland. But, however, the Bill was passed. It was forced into law in August, 1889. Will my hon. Friend tell me why that measure was not made use of? Why was nothing done under it? Why was not even a single line laid down even up to August, 1890?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: There was not time.

MR. STOREY: No, it was for this reason: it was because the Bill which passed the House was a useless Bill. It was a Bill which introduced the question of promoters, and we cautioned them that if they insisted upon introducing promoters the Bill would not work. The result was that last August an amending Bill was brought in to put an end to the promoters, and to place the lines in the hands of the Railway Companies. That is all I have to say about the Light Railways Bill. But the point I wish to put before the House is this: what have the landlords who are to be benefited done? Have they contributed their full share of the expense in relief of the Public Exchequer? I will tell the House what is to be done. These railways, which are to be made at the public expense, are to go through stretches of territory which are not in themselves valuable, but the value of which will be largely increased by the fact that the railways pass through them. If the public have to bear the expense of making those railways, is it not reasonable to demand that the landlords should, at least, give the paltry bits of land through which the railways are about to run? The landlords promised to be generous, but they have not, as far as I am aware, given a penny.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Yes, they have.

MR. STOREY: What proportion of them?

*MR. JACKSON: Oh, a considerable number of them.

MR. STOREY: Well, when we get the Returns, which will shortly be laid before us, we shall be able to see what proportion they have given. But even if some of them have contributed, that fact does not get rid of my argument, which is, that the House should see that when they are about to grant so large a sum of money as will be needed for these lines out of the Public Exchequer, the landlords should at least give the necessary land. Another point is this: Has due economy been observed in connection with this scheme? If we are going to make railways at public expense, why are they not to belong to the public? Why are they to be given to the existing Railway Companies for nothing? Public money is to be given to make railways, and then, when the lines have been completed, they are to be handed over to the existing Railway Companies! I think we shall be able to show the right hon. Gentleman that in the case of some other agreements we have made with the existing Railway Companies we have been exceedingly wasteful of the public money. We have given tens of thousands to Railway Companies to make lines, though we had in our possession agreements for the same lines at less sums. I do not call that attending duly to economy. Will the right hon. Gentleman tell me if he is going to spend public money on afforesting land belonging to the landlords, or is he going to acquire public land and put forests upon it? If he does the former I shall accuse him of being neglectful of the public interests, but if he does the latter then I shall have less objection to the proposal. I should like to press upon his attention the criticism as to whether or not the poor people of the districts are likely to get the benefit of the employment afforded in the construction of the railways. I have had some experience of contractors, who will endeavour to make as much as they can out of the work. The Chief Secretary said that much of the work could be as well done by unskilled as by skilled men. He can know nothing about the making of railways. I warn the Chief Secretary that unless he makes a bargain with the contractors now this will happen. They will employ skilled men, and the poor people of the locality will not receive benefit from the works. But, again, if you make a bargain with the contractors that they are only to employ the people of the localities, then you must be prepared to pay twice as much for the works as you would otherwise do. The contractor would certainly, if such a condition were imposed upon him, take care to put more money on his contract. If you do not make that bargain then the contractors will look to their own interest and will employ outside labour. I do not make these criticisms as at all opposing the evident desire of the Committee to do something at the moment for Ireland, but I can only say to the Minister that once again we are going the weary round that we have gone before. We will for the moment tide over the distress by a lavish and wasteful expenditure of public money, with more or less good or bad results; but the evil will remain, and the very medicine we administer will tend to make the patient not fitter to stand the future, but as first my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton remarked that six years hence, very likely, the Chief Secretary would be again standing at that Table proposing another Relief Bill for the West of Ireland. I sincerely hope my hon. Friend is wrong. If the right hon. Gentleman will still persist in trying to govern a country about which he knows nothing, and against the wishes of that country, of course, you will have successive appeals for charity. I hope, on the contrary, before six years are over, the present Chief Secretary will be relieved from the necessity of dealing with Irish matters, and that Irish affairs will be relegated to an Irish Assembly sitting in Dublin, where the work will be done much better than we can do it.

*(7.22.) SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): I only want the right hon. Gentleman to give us such information as he has in his possession in regard to the very important statement which he gave us at the beginning of his speech, namely, as to the number of meals per day partaken of by the people. I understand that it would be only possible for them to have two meals of potatoes during four months, whereas the other eight months are to be provided for. I suppose he simply intends to apply his proposal to those districts where there is a prospect of famine. It is necessary, before we proceed to the discussion of such an important proposal, that we should have all the information possible as to the area to be dealt with. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman must have been in possession of information before making such an important and painful statement in regard to certain of the districts of Ireland, and I trust the right hon. Gentleman will be able to furnish it to us. We would like him to tell us what is the average crop of potatoes at the present time, in the congested districts, and if Returns have been made which confirm the serious state of things in these districts.

*MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): Sir, I wish to call attention for one moment to the subject of afforestation. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give some assurance that if this work is undertaken it will be carried out in a proper, scientific, and permanent manner, and not merely with the view to afford relief. It would be a discredit to forestry could any reflections be cast upon a national system.

*SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): Will the right hon. Gentleman inform the Committee whether in the drainage scheme—not the great arterial scheme of drainage—the benefit will go to the landlords, or otherwise?

MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman state what proportion of land, in the construction of 284 miles of railway, has been given by the landlords through whose estates the lines will run?

(7.26.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will endeavour to answer the various questions put to me, and perhaps I had better first answer those asked last, and of which I have not taken a note. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds asked me a question with reference to the illustrations I gave at the beginning of my speech as to the congested districts. I am not quite sure that the right hon. Gentleman clearly understood what I said. I stated that under ordinary circumstances tenants have three meals a day. Two of these consist of potatoes, and not the third as a rule. I took the worst districts during an ordinary year, and I found the tenant would get two meals consisting of potatoes from the 15th August to the 15th December, and then probably only one meal of potatoes from the 15th December to the 15th April. After that date he has to depend directly on the credit of the local shopkeeper for what is necessary for himself and family. Here I took this year as an illustration, and I said that the tenant would only have one of the three meals with potatoes up to the 15th December, and that after the 15th December he would have to depend on credit, if he could get it, and it is probable he will not be able to get it. It is therefore that I have laid before the House some methods of affording relief. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Leeds asked as to the area of the congested districts. It is not easy to state the area over which distress exists. I shall, however, be able to give the right hon. Gentleman minute information as to the degree of failure in different districts in the West of Ireland. Of course, too, the resources of the population in different districts must be considered. In some districts the population may be successful in obtaining work in England, or in fishing. One cannot tell exactly how the distress will weigh in different districts, but in the illustration I gave about the beginning of my speech I had specially in view the south-west of Donegal. With regard to the question asked me by the hon. Member for Leith, as to afforesting, if the idea is carried out at all it will be a very tentative experiment. The land will be acquired by the Government, and it will be necessarily cheap land, worth very little to the owner, and practically not used by the occupier except for grazing. The earlier stages in the work of afforestation are those which require little practical skill, consisting largely of draining and making turf fences, surmounted subsequently by a couple of wires which are generally considered an effective fence. The planting so carried out under skilled supervision would belong to the public; whether it would be proper afterwards to hand over the land so planted to the Local Authority, the District Board, the County Council, or whatever the Local Body may be, will be a matter for subsequent examination. The hon. Member for Sunderland appeared to think that if Home Rule were granted there would be no more failure of the potato crop, that the wisdom of Ireland uncontaminated by the folly of Englishmen would be able to deal adequately with any difficulties that might arise, and that those congested districts would be put in a specially favourable position by being deprived of the advantages of English credit and English money. I really do not understand the view of the hon. Member. I believe I have considered the opinions of Ireland. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway, who knows those districts, is distinctly in favour of the proposals of the Government, and for myself I am vain enough to believe that, whatever form of government is adopted, they cannot do much better than the plan the Government has ventured to submit. The hon. Gentleman has said this scheme has been tried before. I maintain that the scheme which I now recommend to the House has never been tried before, and, whether it fails or not, it is not open to the criticisms which have been passed upon it by hon. Gentlemen opposite. An hon. Member asked why the Railway Bill passed in a recent Session remained unfruitful, and he puts that down to the action of the promoters. But a great many preliminary investigations had to be made, and it was true that five promoters came before the Railway Company. But the Bill of last year was not intended to exclude the private promoter; it merely enabled public companies to carry out schemes of the private promoters. Does the hon. Gentleman suppose that either in Ireland or in England the Local Authorities or the Public Exchequer could profit by a scheme which would retain in their possession the working of these railways, and prevent the great Railway Companies which they form working them? Why, a wilder idea than that I cannot conceive. To pass over the trunk lines to private companies and to give to the Exchequer the small feeders is quite impossible. It is the most preposterous idea that ever entered the mind of any politician. My hon. Friend the Member for Tyrone put certain questions, and I think the same questions were raised by the Member for Clare. I am asked what districts are to be scheduled. I do not think we should gain much from scheduling districts. The only result is that in this House each man whose district is not scheduled will bring pressure of an intelligible character to bear upon the Government. I do not think it leads to economy either of time or money. There was no Schedule put into the Light Railway Bill. In this case I do not think the Schedules would be necessary. I gave the House a pledge, which I think they will admit I carried out, that I would not allow myself to be induced by local pressure to use money for the purposes of constructing railways where assistance was not required, and I say now, that I will not allow local pressure to force me to start works in districts that do not require them. Therefore, I do not think a Schedule necessary either in the Seed Potato Bill or the Bill for these works.

COLONEL NOLAN: About how many Unions will reap the benefit of the Seed Potatoes Bill, 60 or 70?

MR. STOREY: Or 100?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should hope not so many. It, however, depends on the extent of the failure of the crop. I hold that no power should be given to the Boards of Guardians unless it is absolutely necessary owing to the poverty of the district. It will not depend on the district in which the failure occurred. I have been taken to task by hon. Members who referred to failures of efforts in the past. I am conscious of the failures in the past. I stated in language, afterwards borrowed by each gentleman in turn, that parts of Ireland were dotted over with roads which began nowhere and ended nowhere—a fact which spoke to the incompetence of those who had to deal with them. But surely no hon. Member will maintain that in Ireland no more roads are required. All I can say is that a more extraordinary statement never was made. There are districts where people have to go many miles round to attend church, fair, or market. It is only in such districts that roads will be made.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Will the roads when made be placed under the control of the County Authority?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Certainly, and I hope that no new roads will be made which the county will not be prepared and willing to take over. The next point which has been urged is that none but local labour should be used, and the hon. Member for South Tyrone urged the adoption of such a drastic measure as inserting such a condition in the contract. That is impracticable. It would not only increase the cost of the contract, but it would be utterly demoralising in the neighbourhood, because the contractor would be compelled to employ only local labour to carry out his work, and the labourers themselves would have it in their power to ruin him by refusing to work for him. It would also prevent these works being carried out on commercial principles. But I may tell my hon. Friend who raised this point that I am assured very little beyond local labour has been employed on these works in the past. Of course, contractors cannot make embankments without having culverts, which require skilled labour not to be found in the place, but I am confident there will be an adequate demand for unskilled and local labour. Then an hon. Member has urged that the Government ought not to give seed potatoes except for cash payments. Well, if that is acted upon, we may rely upon it that we shall not get at the people we wish to reach, and will have to come forward again next year to relieve these people from suffering all the evils of distress and want, or even of starvation. I think the argument of the hon. Member for Northampton, and of other hon. Members, involves some misunderstanding of the line of argument I laid before the Committee earlier in the evening. They have all said in turn, "You stated there ought to be more self-reliance among the Irish people, but how will this proposal of yours tend to increase it?" But I do not propose this measure in order to increase their self-reliance. I propose it as tiding over the present difficulties. It is giving them a lift out of the mire, as it were. I firmly believe that, not in consequence of these relief works, but in consequence of the general measure, especially when the lesson is brought home to the clergy and the tenants themselves that they must do something to help themselves, great improvements will be introduced. I may be wrong, but that is my opinion. At all events, it is perfectly clear that if you do not do something of the kind all hope will be gone, and if you drag the Local Authorities into debt, you will only plunge them deeper and deeper into the mire of insolvency. If you are going to do nothing to improve the communications, to improve the agriculture and industry of the people, then the thing is hopeless. But it is because of the far-reaching effects of my scheme that I attach importance to it. Whatever other proposals may be urged upon the Government, their immediate duty is a plain one, namely, to do what they can to relieve these poor people. I have given the best thought I could during many months to the preparation of this scheme, which I believe to be the most practicable, the most economical, and the most generous one that could be devised.

(7.46.) COLONEL NOLAN: I wish to ask a question as to the area in which seed potatoes will be distributed. I think that the distribution should not be confined to the distressed districts, but should be spread over a considerable part of the country in which the seed has not been renewed since 1880, and is consequently almost worn out, and, therefore, likely to render the potatoes peculiarly liable to disease. I would suggest that in every district west of the Shannon, and several east of it, it is desirable to give facilities for obtaining new seed. The fact is, in most districts of Ireland there are no proper seed merchants. There are those who sell the early and the fancy varieties of potatoes, but there is no machinery for the exchange of seed. I may point out that, even in the richer districts, there are many anxious to get new seed, and if the Government arranged for the supply they might rely on prompt payment, so that there would be no loss. All I wish for is an assurance that the Irish tenants will have the opportunity afforded them of obtaining new seed.

(7.49.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It will rest with the Irish Local Government Board, looking at the necessities of the district, to determine whether seed will be available or not.

(7.50.) COLONEL NOLAN: The matter should not be left to the Irish Local Government Board, but should be decided by the House of Commons. The Irish Local Government Board would be a very proper authority for determining which are the 20 poorest Unions, but it is not their business to say whether 20 or 60 of the Irish Unions shall be classed as poor.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is anticipating a discussion on the Bill.

*(7.51.) MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): There are large areas of Crown Lands in Ireland known to contain an immense wealth of minerals. For instance, there are Crown Lands of high value in County Wicklow.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There are no Crown Lands in Wicklow.

MR. P. MORGAN: There are lands over which the Crown claim certain rights. Perhaps I should call them

Crown Mines, which cannot be developed by private enterprise because of the royalties exacted by the Crown. Yet, the money of the British taxpayer is to be expended upon experimental works and new schemes which have not been tried before, when these mines might be advantageously opened up.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I suppose the hon. Member is alluding to the right the Crown have over certain minerals in Wicklow.

MR. P. MORGAN: Yes; and the Government prefer to thwart and starve Irish industries, which might easily be developed, rather than encourage them.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot conceive how the remarks of the hon. Member have any bearing on the matter.

MR. P. MORGAN: I have no desire to frustrate the objects of the right hon. Gentleman. I prefer to assist them, and therefore I would suggest that either the Crown should withdraw its claim to the royalties, which prevent the mines in the distressed districts in Ireland from being worked by private enterprise, or else that such mines should be worked at the expense of the Crown itself.

(7.53.) SIR J. SWINBURNE: I hope proper precautions will be taken to prevent landlords increasing the rent by reason of improvements carried out at the public expense.

(7.54.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Certainly.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman if the Government object in the reclamation of land is, as I understood it, to undertake such works as will enable the tenant when settled on adjoining land to so extend his holding as to get a living. I do not think the fund could be applied to a more useful purpose than undertaking drainage works beyond the power of individual effort, and enabling people to live on land not otherwise suitable for the purpose. I hope, however, that care will be taken to prevent the buying or leasing of lands so developed by the Government. With regard to the subject of finance, the right hon. Gentleman did not state how much money was involved in his scheme. I would, however, venture to suggest that, in order to prevent the Irish people from disappointment, the right hon. Gentleman ought to fix some definite sum that should be applicable for the purpose of relief. Indeed, I hold that this is a matter which should be controlled by the Imperial Parliament. A certain sum should be voted, and then if that proved insufficient to meet the necessities of the case a further grant should be asked for from the House. Otherwise, the right hon. Gentleman will have laid before him a great many applications in the simple hope that the Treasury may be drawn.

(7.59.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe the purpose we all have in view will be better attained by not fixing the amount; but I hope it will not be a great one. It is desired to keep down the relief works to the minimum of actual necessity; and fixing a sum will not keep down the number of applications. If reclamation is carried out, it will be an experiment, and it is desirable that the land reclaimed should be in the neighbourhood of holdings. There are cases where you will find holdings carved out of bog, and where there is a limitless amount of bog capable of similar treatment, and those are the cases in which experiments should be tried. If I can find such places, and obtain them on reasonable terms, it will be there that the experiment will be tried.

(8.2.) COLONEL NOLAN: When will the Unions know whether or not they will come under the Seeds Act?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No time will be lost in issuing to Boards of Guardians the Circular of which I have spoken.

COLONEL NOLAN: Will it be issued by the 1st of January?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall issue it on Monday if necessary.

Vote agreed to.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.
(8.3.)

(No. 110.)

Order for Committee read.

(8.35.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I rise to move the Instruction to the Committee of which I have given notice, and which in substance is similar to that I moved on the Motion for Committee on the Bill last Session. I had hoped that the Government would have made such modifications in this Bill as to have rendered this Instruction unnecessary. Unfortunately, though the Government have made certain modifications, for example, the redemption scheme does not find a place in the present Bill, and the provisions in Clause 3 are modifications, yet our expectations are disappointed, and the changes do not embrace every aspect of the question as we desire they should. On that account I have to give a few reasons why this Instruction should be supported, though after the discussion of last Session it is not necessary for me to enter at any length into the details of the question. Last Session the Attorney General in the course of debate on this Instruction gave one or two reasons why it could not be accepted. Speaking of corn averages, the main question we desired to deal with under cover of the Instruction, the Attorney General said—

"Her Majesty's Government are ready to give effect to any such scheme by practical legislation as soon as it can be devised, but," he went on to say, and this was the reason he opposed the Instruction,

"If the Instruction is passed, it will enable hon. Members to load the Bill with an unlimited number of Amendments."

No doubt from his point of view there was a reason for opposing the Instruction, but it does not hold good now, because the Government have undertaken to refer the question of redemption to a Commission, and this question of revision might also be referred to the same Commission. If such an undertaking is given, I shall be glad to withdraw the Instruction, but I see no sign yet that the Government intend to take that course. On Monday I asked the President of the Board of Trade, with regard to the Commission to which the right hon. Gentleman alluded, whether the question of corn averages was to be referred to it, and the right hon. Gentleman said he spoke simply of referring to the Commission the question of redemption. Then this afternoon my hon. Friend (Mr. Gardner) put another question, and obtained a similar answer—that the Commission would only refer to the subject of redemption, and the right hon. Gentleman added that naturally the Commission would have before it the existing state of things as affecting different parts of the country, but the Commission would have these facts before it just as the Executive Government had when preparing the present Bill. Well, there is no satisfaction in that. If the Commission is confined to dealing with the question of redemption only, why not exclude the whole question of revision? I do not wish to dwell on the causes which render revision necessary. I pass to one or two points bearing on the Instruction, and ask the Government to consider the position in which we are now placed. After an experience of 50 years the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836 has been found to operate most hardly in the corn-growing districts, especially in Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, and Kent, which four counties pay £1,000,000 a year of tithe, or about one-fourth of the whole tithe of the country. I shall not touch upon the Welsh part of the question, for that is entirely different. In Wales apparently there is no great desire for revision. As affecting Wales, the question is one of principle, and when this part of the subject was debated on Monday, we supported Welsh Members in their contention that tithe is national property. Reciprocally, I hope we may claim the support of Welsh Members in this English part of the subject when we show that the English agricultural classes labour under very serious grievances, which the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836 professed to remove, but as a matter of fact has done nothing to minimise. Whether the tithe is Church property or national property, devoted now to Church purposes, it will be made much more secure if the grievances of the tithepayer are removed in time. If, on the other hand, you allow these grievances to remain unredressed and to grow in magnitude, then in the long run it will not be a mere question of temporary revision such as is contemplated in the Instruction, but there will be danger to the existence of the tithe as a property at all. It is no doubt the intention of Her Majesty's Government that this Bill should not impose any personal liability, but it would be satisfactory if the Attorney General would assure the House that by no effort of legal construction could this be interpreted out of the Bill.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I do not see how this arises on the Motion.

*MR. F. S. STEVENSON: If it can be pointed out that this is not touched by the Bill, then there is one reason in support of my Instruction and a revision. If the Bill is merely for the benefit of the tithe owner then it may be asserted that the benefit to the tithe owner ought to be counter-balanced by a recognition of the claims of the tithepayer. There is another question—whether under Clause 3 it would be possible for the tithepayer to obtain an abatement in the case of tithe exceeding two-thirds of the annual value of the land without proceedings having previously been taken against him by the tithe owner in the County Court. If that is the only way in which the tithepayer can obtain a remission, I venture to think that in few instances will an abatement be obtained. The quiet easy-going tithepayer, reluctant to put himself in a humiliating position, will obtain no abatement. The tithepayer who makes a great outcry about his position, who refuses to pay, and who acts in what may be called a lawless manner, or at any rate in a manner not conducive to good relations with his neighbours, will obtain a remission. The construction which may be put on the provision in Clause 3 is that the remission cannot be obtained except in cases in which proceedings have previously been taken by the tithe owner through the Court; and if that is the case, then there is a clear case for this Instruction. What the tithepayer wants is not the opportunity of making an appeal ad misericordiam but a system by which his grievance will be redressed when it can be shown, and this is not provided by such a process as I have indicated arising out of Clause 3. There is a case for establishing some automatic system by which the remission may be obtained. We want to know whether in particular cases scattered over a wide area or parts of the country there is such an unjust system at present prevailing, in consequence of the operation of the Tithe Commutation Act of 1836, as to call for the operation of some such system of remission, either by the House or by a Commission to be appointed. As to corn averages, I think that there is apparently no indisposition on the part of the Government to grapple with that subject. If that is the case, then why not refer the question to the Commission which is to deal with the question of redemption? Surely it is a sufficiently cognate subject to refer to the same Commission? I fail to see any adequate reason why corn averages, which deeply concern the payment of tithe, should not be referred to the Commission which is proposed to deal with redemption—the two subjects are so interwoven that you cannot separate them. In regard to corn averages, two points came out clearly before the Committee on the subject which sat upstairs, and I fail to see why some practical action cannot be devised by the Redemption Commission, why the Redemption Commission should not endeavour to deal with the sale and resale of corn; and with the other and perhaps wider difference which exists between the system which was employed by farmers more than 50 years ago, when they sent all their corn, good, bad, and indifferent, to market, and that of the present time, when they send only their very best corn; why the price on which the average is taken should not be the price the farmer gets, but the price recorded after the best corn has passed through several hands by process of sale and resale. I venture to think that the Government ought to refer the whole of the question of revision to the Commission which they propose to appoint. If they cannot hold out any hope or make any concession, I am afraid that it may be necessary to press this Instruction to a Division. If, however, the Government make a concession on this point, or if they enlarge the scope of the reference to the Commission, then our work will have been performed, because it will be made clear that the question of revision is not alien from the task to which a Commission on Redemption would devote itself. I appeal to the Government to make this concession in time. It is a concession urgently needed in the Eastern and Southern agricultural districts, and not only there. The Government proposals are inadequate and incomplete if they simply deal with redemption. I trust the Government will accept the suggestions I offer, and include this question within the scope of their Commission, or accept this Instruction to enable Amendments to be moved in Committee

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to provide for an equitable revision of tithes in accordance with the altered conditions of agriculture."—(Mr. F. S. Stevenson.)

*(854.) SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I would like to call the attention of the House, and more particularly that of the President of the Board of Trade, to the fact that not only is this tithe question rampant in the Eastern counties to which my hon. Friend has more particularly referred, but in the five Northern counties, all of which at the time of the great European War were growing corn. After Waterloo the greater portion of the land was allowed to go away to weeds. Then, 54 years ago, at the time of the Tithe Commutation Act, tithe was exacted on the lands which still remained under grain cultivation. Since the repeal of the Corn Laws, in 1846, nearly the whole of this remnant has passed out of cultivation. Tithe owners have done nothing to reclaim the land, which was thoroughly exhausted by constant corn growing, but the right hon. Gentleman argues that if we begin to revise the tithe we may be raising the value of tithe on grass lands. I traverse that statement, because the owners have had no more to do with making the land productive than Irish landlords have done for their tenants' farms, nothing at all. The land would be almost valueless at this moment, and I speak from 25 years' experience of growing grass, for anything the tithe owners have done. You may look over one side of a hedge anywhere and see land worth 5s. or 7s. 6d. an acre under grass, and on the other side you will find land worth £3 or £4 made so simply by the capital and industry of the owner or occupier, or both. Tithe owners have no right to any increase in the tithe, because they have incurred no risk, and have invested no money in draining, in lining, or manuring. That was settled 54 years ago, and now all compacts then entered into are to be torn up, arrangements between tenants and landlord to be upset, and the latter is to be placed in the invidious position of collector for the clergy of the district. Well, what do you give in return? The right hon. Gentleman has made much of the remission provided by the third clause, that if the tithe exceeds two-thirds of the value there shall be a remission of the excess. But this is a mere fragment of the whole question. Then we are told by the President of the Board of Trade that this is only the beginning of the tithe question, and that the Government intend to have the tithes commuted. But how are you to get at the value of the capital sum which is to be borrowed by the tithe owner except by this Bill, which increases the value of the tithes 25 per cent.? I do not know if the right hon. Gentleman has tried to sell his tithes? If sold now, tithes may bring 17 or 18 years' purchase, but after this Bill is passed they will bring from 25 to 27 years' purchase to the owner. If we then object to the commutation proposals, we shall be told we are too late and should have settled this point when this Tithe Rent-Charge Recovery Bill was before the House. I maintain that the Government are establishing a false basis for the redemption of tithe. I suppose the right hon. Gentleman is aware that a large portion of the tithe in Durham and Northumberland goes to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. I do not think it will make it more easy for them to collect if this matter is placed on a false basis; a hardly-driven bargain, all one side, has never been found to work smoothly. Her Majesty's Government are tearing up contracts and increasing the security of tithe, making it a first-class security equal to the rates, and yet they give nothing in return, but the promise of a remission of the excess over two-thirds of the annual value of the land. I do not think a more one-sided bargain has ever been brought before Parliament, and I think it will not be found easy to work in future years.

(91.) Mrs. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I wish to say a few words in explanation of the vote I am about to give. If I thought this Bill had been introduced or was intended as a final settlement of the question, my vote would be given for the Instruction, because I agree with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Eye in most of his remarks, and also in what he has said of the altered condition of agriculture. In 1836, when the Tithe Commutation Act was passed, this country had not embarked upon that unhappy fiscal policy which has crippled, if it has not absolutely ruined, that industry which gentlemen on both sides profess to consider the most important of British industries—I mean agriculture. Had it been anticipated that such a terrible fall in prices, and such terrible damage to the agriculture of the country, would have followed, I cannot think that we should have had the tithe imposed upon the owner as it is now. I am well aware that the question of re-valuation is one of enormous difficulty; in the opinion of some, and I believe of the President of the Board of Trade, it is one of insuperable difficulty. I, myself, believe that in the re-valuation of the tithe will be found the only solution of the question. I am sorry to hear from the President of the Board of Trade that nothing is to be referred to the Commission but the question of redemption. I had hoped, and still hope, the right hon. Gentleman will enlarge the scope of the Commission, and adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member for Eye as to the inclusion of the question of re-valuation. I do not, however, think that these considerations need occupy our attention at the present moment, nor do I say that my voting against the Motion to-day will prevent me from supporting a proposal for the consideration of re-valuation and re-adjustment, if it is made on a fitting occasion, from whatever quarter it may come. The right hon. Gentleman, in introducing the Bill, stated that this was not a measure for the appreciation or depreciation of tithe, but for facilitating its collection and making the owner, not the occupier, responsible for its payment. As these are two good objects, and as the effect of the Instruction would be to kill the measure, I shall give my hearty support to the Bill. I must, however, say—and in this I speak for a great many agricultural Members in the House—that our support will be a great deal more hearty if the Government feel themselves able to adopt the Amendment of the hon. Member for Saffron Walden, which is regarded as of great importance.

* (9.7.) Mr. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I cannot understand why the Government do not feel themselves able to accept this Instruction, and I am sure many hon. Members will be disappointed that the right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Trade cannot see his way to include within the scope of the inquiry by the Royal Commission the question of the re-valuation of tithe. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will reconsider his decision, and I am sure that if he does so, and will refer the question of revision to the Commission, my hon. Friend will withdraw his Instruction. I have never been able to understand why, on both sides of the House, there is such a fear of revision of tithe. I will go further, and say I do not understand why there is so much fear of a reduction in the total amount of tithe in the present depressed state of agriculture. I disagree altogether with the hon. Member for Leicester. I do not understand why, if the burden of tithes is unjust, it should not be alleviated. Whether the tithe is Church property—as the Party opposite hold that it is—or national property, neither the Church nor the nation ought to desire to derive from it a revenue which is unjust. It is perfectly clear that when the settlement was made in 1836 the present state of things was never contemplated. It is not quite correct to say that tithe is an absolutely fixed amount like a rent-charge, because the Act of 1836 provides that it shall vary according to the septennial average. No doubt, when it was provided that there should be a septennial average, based on the prices of wheat, barley, and oats, that very basis was established for the purpose of making the charge absolutely fair. But we must all know that the septennial average on wheat, barley, and oats is not now a fair one. The relative prices of these descriptions of grain have changed, and there is a just demand for revision of tithe, even if it is only to alter the products on which the septennial average is based. In many ordinary cases the tithe bears so heavily that it is called a second rent, and it falls practically upon the tenant farmer. The cause of its bearing so heavily is to be found in the depression which has occurred in the agricultural industry. In one of the parishes I have the honour to represent—Bilton, near Rugby—the tithe was apportioned in 1841. A valuer was sent down from London, and he went to work in a very haphazard way. He, as I am informed, went on the land, inquired of the labourers what it was likely to produce, and what was likely to be the value of the produce, and he apportioned the tithe accordingly.

What has been the result? Why, that fields adjoining one another, having exactly the same quality of land and the same tillage, have to pay tithe of 4s. an acre, 6s., 8s., and even 10s. an acre. It comes to this, that in that parish, land—in respect of which the owner pays the tithe—produces to him 23s. rent, and he has to pay 10s. worth of tithe. In 1841, when the apportionment was made, corn, I believe I am right in saying, was 64s. 4d. per quarter. A gentleman who happens to be an owner of land in that parish—a good Conservative, I believe, and supporter of Her Majesty's Government—writes—

"I think it is framed,"

speaking of the Tithe Act,

"in the interests of the clergy and with no regard to those of the tithepayer. If the tithe had been re-apportioned there might have been no necessity to sue the landlord in the County Court. But this Bill enables the parson to get his pound of flesh, whether it is just or otherwise. . . . To exact from the land the proportion of tithe now which used to be paid when corn was double the price, is, to my mind, dishonest and arbitrary. This Bill will not settle the matter. It will only embitter the laity against the clergy, and, perhaps, cause the latter to be less esteemed generally."

The Bill itself contains provisions for the revision of tithe, as it says that where the tithe amounts to two-thirds the annual value of the land it shall not exceed that amount. This, however, will only touch very exceptional cases. Some hon. Member said the other night that he did not suppose there were 100 cases in the whole country where the tithe exceeded two-thirds of the annual value. I do not know about that, but we can see that these cases dealt with in the Bill must be very rare as compared with the great majority of cases in which no relief whatever is given. The very essence and origin of tithe is that it ought to bear some proportion to the actual value of the produce of the land, and ought not to be regulated by the prices of other produce which the land does not yield. Well, if that is to be done there should be some revision of tithe, and, accordingly, I shall give my vote to-night for the hon. Member for Eye. I hope that before the President of the Board of Trade moves the appointment of the Royal Commission on the Redemption of Tithe he will see his way to enlarge the scope of the Commission, and include the revision of tithe.

(9.18.) MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): I do not believe that there can be any lasting settlement of this question unless the matter of re-valuation is dealt with. It seems to me, however, that to attempt to include that subject in this Bill would be to kill the measure, as so many measures have been killed before. This Bill is desired in England as well as in Wales, not only by the clergy but by many other people. I hope that the scope of the Commissioners' inquiries will be so enlarged as to enable them to deal with the point to which I have referred. Surely it is ridiculously inconsistent that in one place the tithe should be in excess of the rent, and that it should be far below it in places adjacent. The machinery for re-valuation is ready to hand, and if the Government hold out no hope that the demand for it will be met, great dissatisfaction will be caused. However, as I have said, the question of revision goes beyond the scope of this Bill.

*(9.20.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): When the hon. Member for Eye moved this Motion last Session the circumstances were entirely different. The Government had brought forward a Bill which did not give satisfactory relief in the direction in which this Bill gives relief. There was no provision in it for dealing with exceptionally hard cases where the tithe is so heavy that it prevents the satisfactory letting of the land. The present measure does deal with such cases, providing for remissions of tithe where the charge exceeds two-thirds of the rental value of the land. There is a good deal of confusion introduced into this Debate by referring to tithe in general terms. There is no such thing as tithe in districts in the sense of a charge or rate of so much in the £1, or so much per acre. Prior to the Tithe Commutation Act in 1836 the tithe was levied in kind. The tithe owner took a certain share of the produce of the land, but the Commutation Act altered all that. According to Sir Robert Peel—

"The object of the Act was to get a fixed money payment in lieu of tithe, and thus to put an end to the discouragement of agricultural improvements and the demand for increased tithe in proportion to improvements."

The tithe rent-charge was put on particular land. It was to vary according to certain corn averages which have had, perhaps, not so large an effect as hon. Gentlemen representing agricultural constituencies desire. Still, they have had an appreciable and important effect on the actual money payments in lieu of tithe. Hon. Members have only to refer to the very useful table issued under the sanction of the Commissioners to show the operation of the corn averages. The operation of the corn averages has largely reduced tithe in accordance with the altered conditions of agriculture. In 1883 tithe was about par price—that is to say, £100 of tithe produced £100 4s. 10d., but under the operation of the corn averages £100 of tithe has been reduced to £78 1s. 9d.—some think there will be a further reduction, to £73 or £72. Therefore, there is a gradual and appreciable diminution of tithe in accordance with the altered condition of agriculture. Lay tithes are sold, not as a right to take tithe in particular districts, but as sums of money payable annually out of particular lands. The people who own these lands bought them subject to the tithe, and the people who buy tithe rent-charge buy fixed sums charged upon and payable out of particular land.

SIR J. SWINBURNE: Out of produce. That makes a deal of difference.

MR. T. H. BOLTON: There is a deed in every parish which is called the Tithe Award and Appropriation, and that deed, which is the common property of the landowner and the tithe receiver, their common title deed, in fact, states that on particular parcels of land or on particular farms there is charged not so much per acre but certain sums annually payable. The landowner has bought his land subject to the payment of this annual sum, he has given so much less for it because of its being burdened with this annual charge. What is now proposed in this Instruction is a revision of tithe and a readjustment. What is readjustment? To take tithe rent-charge from land which pays it at present, and put it on land which does not pay it? The question of revision is a different thing. That must mean reduction—making a present at the expense of the tithe owner to the landowner. I sympathise with my hon. Friend when he says that in certain cases the tithe may be so heavy that it may prevent cultivation of the land, and prevent either the tithe owner or the landowner deriving benefit from the land, and that the State should come in as a matter of public policy, and revise the tithe; and as the Bill of the Government deals not only with the collection of tithe, but will give relief in exceptionally hard cases, I shall cordially support it. The tithe owner practically has, under the existing law, the first charge upon the land—[SIR J. SWINBURNE: Produce.] That is a distinction without a difference. That sort of argument would have been very well 50 years ago, but, under the Act of 1836, tithe is now rent-charge, and property has been bought and sold subject to this rent-charge upon the land. It is absurd to argue that the charge is payable out of the produce as having practical application to the consideration of the question. The truth is that, for all practical purposes, this is a rent-charge upon the land. It is a rent-charge, wanting certain conditions and advantages usually associated with rent-charges, but it is none the less a rent-charge. It is true you cannot sell the land to pay the charge, but you can distrain, and if there is not sufficient distress you can take possession of the land and hold it, and that is a very practical remedy. The Bill of the Government relieves the tenant, and puts the tithe on the landlord's shoulders. To that extent it is a most satisfactory measure. It also provides that, whenever the tithe is so heavy that it threatens to wipe the landowner out of existence, which was never intended by the Act of 1836, the landowner shall have the right to claim a reasonable abatement and so have a share of the land. As a matter of right, I am very much inclined to think that the landowner would have very little case; but it is a concession made, as a matter of public policy, in a generous view of the relations between landowner and tithe receiver. I am very much surprised that my hon. Friends have not received the Bill with cordiality and gratitude. I know that there is a feeling of dissatisfaction in certain districts as to tithe. But this dissatisfaction to a large extent rests upon a want of knowledge of the circumstances connected with tithe, and what are the relative interests in it, and what are the liabilities connected with it. I agree to a very considerable extent with the argument of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, that tithe is public property, and I hope ultimately to see tithe applied to public uses. I look forward to a scheme for the redemption of tithe, which will capitalise the value of the tithe, and fix the capital value upon the land, and so practically get rid of difficult questions and unpleasant associations, while preserving tithe as a national property for public uses. I do not want to see tithe frittered away or destroyed; at the same time I wish to see the charge levied with due consideration. I cannot vote for the Instruction of the hon. Member for Eye, and I intend to vote in favour of the Bill.

* (9.38.) MR. C. W. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): Mr. Deputy Speaker, the rather long speech of the hon. Member for St. Pancras seemed to me more in the nature of a speech on the Second Reading than one confining itself to the Instruction of the hon. Member for Eye. I will not now attempt to traverse his arguments, with which I entirely disagree. I do not think the hon. Member was quite consistent in the speech. He took very high ground as to the first claim of the tithe owner, and as to the tithe rent-charge being on all-fours with a mortgage. But afterwards he did admit that the tithe rent-charge should not leave the landowner without some little share in the value of his property. I think the two ways of putting it are rather inconsistent. The hon. Member for Eye made an offer to the Government in reference to the promised Commission. The Instruction itself is a very clever one; I am sure the speech of the hon. Member in moving it, considering that he sits on that side of the House, was also clever. There was a great deal in it with which I thoroughly agree, but there is a little difficulty in understanding what he means by the word "revision," which may mean a little or a great deal. If it means a re-valuation of the tithe all over England I should not be able to agree with it. I could not stand up in my place and ask, for specific reasons, that the tithe in a particular locality should be lowered, and at the same time not allow, for the very same reason, that it should be increased. The offer of the hon. Member for Eye not to push his Instruction, if the Government would allow the question of tithe averages, in these altered conditions of agriculture, to be included in the reference to this promised Commission seems to me to have put some of us who sit on this side of the House in a somewhat difficult and close place. I certainly think that this question should have some fair opportunity of being inquired into. I think that we who are too well acquainted with those districts where things have become so altered ought to have some liberal and fair opportunity of bringing our grievances before this House, and having our cases put in the Journals of the House. I do not think that the Government can positively exclude some evidence upon these various questions from being put before the Commission. Last year I presented a Petition signed by Members on all sides of the House asking the Government to give us a Commission upon tithe redemption. I do not quite remember the actual wording of that Petition, but I think it asked for a Committee or Commission, in the first place, to inquire whether there was any necessity for redemption, and I take it that that would, at any rate, be part of the duty of the Commission. I do not suppose it would be taken for granted that redemption is really necessary. Having made the preliminary inquiry, I think the door would certainly be open to us to bring up questions such as we have heard raised by the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. F. S. Stevenson.) The knotty point for the Commission would be the terms to be set up, and certainly we of the Eastern Counties, where agriculture is so changed, would never listen to any proposal of redemption for the same number of years' purchase to be relieved of the tithe on our lands in Essex as would be given for land that is actually worth more than it was in 1836. I do not see that the Government could prevent a certain amount of evidence being taken on questions of that sort. The hon. Member was good enough to say he would not press the Instruction to a Division if it were understood that the other questions I have referred to should be brought before the Commission. If that should be the case, I trust that some evidence at least will be put before that body as to the position of the farmers of the Eastern Counties in regard to this important subject.

(9.46.) MR. J. ELLIS (Leicestershire, Bosworth): I have only a very few words to say upon the subject now under discussion, but I desire, on behalf of my constituents and the agriculturists of Leicestershire generally, to say that it would afford them very general satisfaction if Her Majesty's Government would accept the suggestion contained in the Instruction moved by the hon. Member for Eye (Mr. F. S. Stevenson). As a born agriculturist the question is one in which I myself have taken considerable interest, and I may say that there is a very strong feeling on the part of my agricultural friends on this subject. They are of opinion that the measure by which the tithe is collected is an unfair measure. If the hon. Member for St. Pancras were right in stating that at the Tithe Commutation of 1836 a certain sum had been fixed and that that was an unalterable sum, I and my friends would have been satisfied, because we do not wish unfairly to lessen the amount of tithe. I agree with the hon. Member that the tithe is public property, and that any unfair lessening of the amount would simply mean the handing over of the sum thus deducted for the benefit of the landlords; but I must repeat that I think the measure under which the tithe is at present collected is an unfair one. At any rate, the subject is one which demands inquiry. I have been familiar with the way in which barley is prepared and dressed for the market for the last 40 or 50 years, and I can state that the alteration which has taken place in the mode of threshing has made a difference in the weight of the barley of two stones in the quarter. The old measure under the system of threshing by hand was 15 stones to the sack, whereas under the present system it is 16 stones to the sack. This, I assert, is one of those things which have affected the amount of the tithe. To many hon. Members this may seem to be only a small matter. But when we have regard to the fact that most of the barley which is grown in Leicestershire and in the Eastern Counties is sent to two or three different markets and that the account is taken first to Huntingdon, then to Leicester, and then to Burton, we have before us a state of things which I think demands some inquiry. I have stated that the measure is not the same as it was in 1836, and that is the view taken by my agricultural friends in Leicestershire. The tithe is not oppressive in that county, because the conditions of farming there are different from those which appertain to Essex. In Leicester we have what is called mixed farming, and under that system the farmer may escape, whereas in the Eastern Counties he cannot escape without paying the full amount of tithe. I do emphatically urge, on behalf of the agricultural tenants of England generally, that the measure by which the tithe is collected should be inquired into. I cannot see why Her Majesty's Government should refuse this request. I say that whatever was agreed to in 1836 was a fair settlement as between the landlord and the tithe owner; but if the measure has been altered in the meantime, as we aver to be the case, we ought to readjust it. I think the Government are quite right in placing payment of the tithe on the landlord instead of on the tenant. That seems to me to be a very simple proposition, and I, for one, am of opinion that half the rates ought to be put upon the landlord in the same way. I am sure the Government will give great satisfaction to their followers and to the agriculturists at large if they will allow the inquiry which is asked for into this matter.

(9.52.) MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): Before this discussion closes, I should like to say a few words upon the question that has been raised. Those who take the same view as myself will either vote against this Instruction or refrain from voting altogether. I have listened to several of the speeches that have been made in support of the proposal, and I have as yet failed to find any argument in favour of the course the hon. Member for Eye proposes to take. In point of fact, we have hardly heard a single word of solid argument in support of the Motion. The view which I entertained upon this subject was well expressed in the course of last Session by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, namely, that the tithe is national property, and I think that we must watch with jealous care any attempt to fritter that property away. Those who support the hon. Member for Eye have been very frank in the expression of their views. The hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Gray) said that for his part he could not conscientiously support any proposal to re-appraise the tithe, and that the term equitable possession is merely a sounding phrase which, in reality, means reduction. We are not prepared to reduce the tithe. If it be necessary to make any alteration in the charges on the land to meet the altered conditions of agriculture, it should come out of the landowner, and not out of the tithe, which is, really, national property, and when this Bill comes into operation that argument will be still more applicable, because the tithe will be a first charge on the land and not on the produce of the land. Any abatement of the tithe must consequently be an increase on the value of the land to the landlord. This is the reason why, if the hon. Gentleman who moved the Instruction insists on going to a Division, I shall feel compelled to vote against it. We who take this view are the more disposed to adopt this course because we believe that we are within a measurable distance of getting this national property devoted to national purposes.

(9.56.) MR. H. GARDNER (Saffron Walden): I think, Sir, that we on this side of the House who are identified with agricultural constituencies are at the present moment between cross fires, whether from the orthodox cannon of Her Majesty's Government or the bombardment of my hon. Friend the Member for St. Pancras. But I would venture to point out to those who take an interest in this particular subject that, for my part, and that of my hon. Friends who have moved and supported the Instruction, we are quite as jealous of the public property as those who oppose it profess themselves to be. We consider the tithe-rent charge to be national property allocated by the State to a specific purpose, and which may be allocated by the State to a different purpose if Parliament should so decide. But we who have some knowledge of the agricultural districts, and have taken some trouble to inquire into this special question, have formed very strong opinions upon it, which are opposed to those of the hon. Members for St. Pancras and Bosworth. If the Liberation Party join with the Church Party in order to wring the last farthing out of the land, it is probable that in the rural districts there will arise an agitation for the abolition of tithes altogether. This is what has already taken place upon the Continent, and our predecessors in bringing on and passing the Commutation Act of 1836 were fully alive to what was then taking place in the South of Europe. Lord J. Russell referred to the case of Austria, where an anti-tithe agitation was then going on. He pointed out that an agitation was then proceeding against the payment of tithe in that country, an agitation which, even at that time was likely to come to a successful conclusion. We know now that that agitation has succeeded all over the Continent, and that successful agitation furnished a sufficient warning to those who are engaged in passing the Act of 1836, which was supposed to include some reduction of the corpus of the tithe. Hon. Members on both sides of the House agreed to that reduction in 1836 because they saw, as some of my hon. Friends on this side do not see at the present moment, that if they did not agree to pay a tithe they were likely to lose that portion of the national property altogether. It is absurd to call this a landlords' question. [Cries of "Question!"] I feel sure the House will admit that I am applying myself distinctly to the Instruction, which is the question now before us. Hon. Members say this is purely a landlords' question, but let those hon. Members go down to the rural districts and hear what the farmers have to say on the subject. You may tell them that it is theoretically and logically a landlords' question, but you will never convince the farmers of the Eastern and Southern Counties or any of the corn-growing districts, that the money comes directly out of the pockets of the landlords, and not out of the produce of the land. In other words, they believe that an excessive tithe is a hindrance and injury to agriculture, and not a mere matter of debit and credit on the landlords' bankers' books. I support the Instruction of my hon. Friend for this reason, that I am certain that any revision of tithe must include a preliminary inquiry as to whether a revision is necessary or not. One special argument that has been put before the House on the present occasion has never been answered by any Member who has spoken on this subject, and I am assured that the agricultural constituents would very much like to hear some definite and distinct statement of the Government upon it. In my opinion, the great argument for any inquiry into the Act of 1836 is this, and it goes to the vital principle of that Act, namely, if we can show that our predecessors were wrong in calculating what should be taken as the measure on which the tithe rent-charge should be valued, we must admit that we have gone into the central principle of the measure of 1836 in order to make out some of the grounds on which we say that the inquiry asked for should be granted by the Government. The argument is this, that by the choice of the three cereals—wheat, barley, and oats—in the Act of 1836 it was intended that the tithe rent-charge should in the future be a fluctuating amount, in the same way as tithe in kind had fluctuated in the past. And that contention is borne out by the speech of Lord Lansdowne—to which I have referred—on the occasion of the Second Reading of the Tithe Rent-Charge Bill in the House of Lords. And if it be true that the three cereals were taken because it was the intention of the framers of the Act that the tithe rent-charge should in the future fluctuate, it must be obvious to the House at the present moment that the mode of taking the corn averages as proved by the evidence brought before the Committee, and as recognised by everyone who understands agricultural matters—is utterly and entirely wrong. If the tithe rent-charge is to fluctuate according to the produce of the soil, you must take the whole of that produce. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade shakes his head at that argument, but let us take the converse way and see how it works out. If the three cereals were not chosen in order that the tithe should fluctuate as it had done in the past, why, then, were they selected? We are told it was because they considered at that time that the three cereals would be less fluctuating in the ratio of exchange of other articles than money. In other words, our predecessors in 1836 imagined that money—that gold—would depreciate in the future as it had done in the past, and they imagined so with some reason and justice: for as we have been reminded by the hon. Member for Faversham, the iniquitous Free Trade Bill had not been passed, and at that time, too, they had no idea that giant steamers would travel across the ocean with cargoes of corn, and accomplish the journey in a few days. Therefore, they thought that though the population of the country might increase, the value of corn would not decrease, though that of gold might do so. What has happened? At the present moment is there any sound financier who would take corn as a stable standard of value? Absolutely the reverse of what was anticipated by our predecessors who carried the Act of 1836 has come about. If you say it is wrong that the corn averages were intended to fluctuate as the tithe had fluctuated in the past, or, if you take the converse of the proposition, that the three cereals were chosen as the stable standard of value, you will see that the conclusion is utterly wrong. These are arguments which should receive some answer from the Government. If either of them be true, then it is obvious that the Act of 1836 has failed in a very vital principle. The fact of the matter is, that Her Majesty's Government have stood on very firm ground as long as they called the Act of 1836 a solemn covenant, but as they have chosen to open it without being asked they have lost that sound basis. Having done so, they cannot deny that the question of having some inquiry is, at all events, deserving of attention.

*(10.9.) SIR J. GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): It has been suggested that this Instruction has been brought forward in the interests of the tenant farmer, but I think I can show from experience it is nothing of the sort. I believe it is absolutely in the interests of the landlord. We were told just now that land is not affected by the payment of tithe. The fact is, that as a result of the passing of the Extraordinary Tithe Redemption Bill, which made the landlord liable for the extraordinary tithe, the tenant simply asks the landlord what the rent is, without going into the question of what that tithe is which the landlord pays. That has been the case with regard to extraordinary tithe, and it will happen in this case also. Therefore, I think it is in the interest of the tenant that this Instruction should not be carried. The Government have determined to examine into the question of redemption; and, for my own part, I do not see why the landlord should not be allowed to redeem this tithe, with which he alone is concerned, as he has been allowed to redeem the extraordinary tithe. The working of the Bill for the redemption of extraordinary tithe has been of immense advantage to the tenants, and if the Government follow the course they have promised, equal advantage will, I believe, accrue from the redemption of the ordinary tithe. I do think, then, that the adoption of this Instruction can only do harm to the tenant.

(10.15.) MR. A. J. WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, W.): As I had the honour last Session of seconding the Instruction which the hon. Member for Eye has again moved, I venture again to address the House upon this very complicated subject. But I will not occupy the time of hon. Members more than a few minutes in explaining my attitude in regard to this Instruction. If I thought for one moment that the revision of tithe was going to reduce the aggregate value of what in Wales, at all events, we look upon as national property, I should not support the Instruction, but I am convinced that it will not have that effect. If I understood the Instruction to mean simply that you are to go into the question of the amount of tithe now payable in such counties as Essex, Suffolk, Hampshire, and Wiltshire, which are suffering, as I think unfairly, through the methods of taking the proportion of the produce of the land to be paid, I would not vote for it; but I understand it to be a question of a re-consideration of the way in which averages are at present taken, with a view, if necessary, to the entire re-valuation of the country as regards this taxation. Surely it is not unreasonable to say that if you begin to tamper with the Act of 1836 the Government ought to include in the inquiry which I understand they are prepared to grant, the whole question of the present tithe averages. Such an inquiry would satisfy the country. Last Session the President of the Board of Agriculture made a significant statement when he warned the House that if an Instruction were accepted with reference to the over-burdened corn-growing districts in the East of England the consequences might be rather awkward for the whole of the tithepaying owners throughout the kingdom. I cannot help thinking that that may be the reason why the Government are not prepared to extend this inquiry. I should like to point out that if the averages were based on wheat alone, the value of £100 tithe rent-charge of 1836 would now be £59 13s.; if based on meat alone it would be £133; if on meat and wheat together it would be £96; while if on wheat, meat, barley, and oats, instead of £59, it would be £93 6s. I cannot help thinking that if we went thoroughly into the whole question before a Royal Commission, it would mean this, that the tax upon corn-growing areas throughout the country would be largely reduced by spreading it over the whole produce of the land.

(10.21.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): My hon. Friend who spoke last is apparently in favour of the creation of a new tithe altogether. I think that that is a totally unacceptable idea. My hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden concluded his speech by saying that the Government were tampering with the settlement of 1836. I cannot acknowledge that for a moment. They are simply enforcing what was understood in 1836, namely, that the landlord should pay the tithe. But my hon. Friend, in order to press on the Government the necessity for making this revision, dealt with the very great changes which have taken place in agriculture in modern times. It was just because the statesmen of 1836 felt that changes were coming on that they sought to make a settlement once for all which need not ever be disturbed. It is well-known that the tithe owners at that time thought they were making a great surrender, for they naturally expected that agriculture would improve, and that that improvement would lead to an increase in the value of the produce. But Lord John Russell and other statesmen held at that time that any increase in the value of the produce of the soil should be equally divided between the farmer and the landlord. That, indeed, was the effect of the settlement of 1836, and it, therefore, seems to me that the arguments as to changes in the system of agriculture are irrelevant. My hon. Friend asks for an inquiry which is to result in what he calls an equitable revision of tithes. Does he mean lowering the tithe in one place and raising it in another? We all know that the raising of it is impossible.

and therefore what my hon. Friend means is simply a reduction of the tithe. I maintain that the nation owns the tithe, and that to reduce it would be simply to rob the nation of it, and against that I must most emphatically protest. We have heard a good deal about this being a burden on agriculture. But is it a burden on agriculture to put a charge on the landlord? Of course, if you put a specially unfair charge on the farmer I can understand its being a burden on agriculture. But that is not the case with the landlord. If the landlord's interest in the land does not yield him a legitimate return for his capital then he can make the land over to the public. It is not necessary for him to hold it as a losing concern. Regarding the Amendment of my hon. Friend as a movement towards the reduction of tithe, which I contend would be a robbery of the nation, I shall certainly vote against it.

*(10.28.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I do not think I ever listened to a Debate in which the proposition before the House was so conclusively negatived on its own merits by those who supported it. The Motion is that it should be an Instruction to the Committee that they should have power to insert clauses in this Bill providing for an equitable revision of the tithe in accordance with the altered conditions of agriculture. Therefore, it is reasonable to conclude that before this Motion was placed on the Paper its supporters had some definite idea as to the way in which they would carry out their views, and were prepared with clauses for that object. But now the hon. Member who placed the Motion on the Paper, and the hon. Member for Saffron Walden who supported it, indicate that what they really want is an inquiry into the matter. I confess I cannot understand why the Member for Saffron Walden, if he desires an inquiry and is not prepared with clauses, did not move the other day the Motion of which he has given notice. The hon. Member's speech to-day was an echo of what he said on Monday. The whole pith of it was a desire for an ideal revision of tithes. The hon. Member for Suffolk has repeated the speech he made last Session and on Monday, and I do not think, therefore, it is necessary that I should deal with the arguments of these two hon. Members at any length. It seems to me that the Instruction is a deliberate attempt to kill the Bill. They want to be able to overload the Notice Paper with Amendments upon every conceivable subject relating to tithe, and so to make it impossible to carry the Bill through Committee in any reasonable time. The Bill is smaller than that of last year, and deals solely with an alteration in the liability for tithes and the mode of recovery, and to raise upon it all those questions that have been previously debated would, I think, be an abuse of the forms of the House. Among those questions is, first, that of the mode of taking corn averages. If any hon. Member desires to alter the present mode, and will submit any practical proposals on the point to the House, they will receive fair consideration. But I am bound to say I cannot see how anyone can ascertain the market value of corn that is never taken to the market at all, or how it would be possible, considering the great difficulty that is now felt in obtaining Returns from dealers in corn, to alter that system for one under which it would be necessary to obtain Returns from a different and a far larger class of men, namely, the farmers, who sell corn in the first instance. Then there is the question of the proportions of the different kinds of grain which form the subject of the corn averages, and of these cases of special apportionment, owing to which it may happen that one field may have a tithe rent-charge of 10s. per acre, and another next to it only 5s., or 2s. 6d. Next comes the question of revision, which in the view of the hon. Members for Suffolk and Saffron Walden means solely a lowering of the tithes. But, as has been pointed out, if equitable revision means anything it must mean not only the lowering the tithe where it is too high, but raising it where it is too low. That would involve the re-opening of the settlement of the Act of 1836, a course which no Commission would recommend, and which no House of Commons would sanction. If hon. Members want the tithe lowered in cases where there has been great depreciation in the value of land, that is precisely what we propose to do in the third clause of the Bill. If hon. Members are dissatisfied with Clause 3 as it stands, which provides for revision in certain cases, let them move Amendments to carry out their wishes, and their proposals will be considered. The Government look on that matter as one to be settled by the House on its merits, though when the time comes I shall be able to defend the proposals of the Government. We are asked if it would be possible to carry out the provisions of the third clause in relief of the tithepayer without application to the County Court. Of course it would be. The tithepayer can show his assessment to the Income Tax, and if that shows that the tithe is more than two-thirds of the value of the land, no tithe owner would be such a fool as to appeal to the County Court. I do not suppose that in nine cases out of ten there would be any necessity to appeal to the County Court at all. The pith of the Debate has been in the demand for an inquiry. What hon. members seem to desire is that there should be a sort of general and roving inquiry into all the questions I have referred to, including, of course, the subject of the equitable revision of tithes, but I must say at once that the Government are not prepared to assent to such an inquiry. They do not believe that an inquiry into the equitable revision of tithes would lead to any practical result. They believe that the depreciation of agriculture which they deplore ought to be met by temporary relief in the way proposed by the provisions of this Bill. But although the Government propose strictly to confine the inquiry by a Royal Commission to the subject of redemption, yet I entirely agree with what was stated by the hon. Member for Maldon, that an inquiry into the question of redemption must also have regard to the special circumstances of the tithe rent-charge in each particular case. Last Session we proposed to abolish the existing law with regard to redemption, and to enact that the Board of Agriculture should, in certain cases, with the consent of both parties, fix the price at which the tithe rent-charge should be redeemed, and that in fixing that price they should have regard to certain considerations of much the same kind as those taken into account by the Commissioners who carried out the Act for the redemption of extraordinary tithe rent-charge. One of those considerations was any such increase or decrease in the proportion between the annual value of the tithe rent-charge and the annual value of the lands out of which it issues as might affect the security of the rent-charge: and this is a point which, in my opinion, must necessarily come before any Commission dealing with the subject of Redemption. I will not detain the House any longer, and will only further express the hope that the House will reject, by a decisive majority, the Instruction, which is meaningless, because its promoters could not carry it out, and which can only be intended to defeat the Bill.

(10.54.) VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): I would ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he cannot tell the House precisely when the consideration of the Bill in Committee will be resumed, or give an assurance, at any rate, that the Government will proceed with the Bill and pass it into law with all dispatch.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Message from Lord Salisbury!

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: We will proceed with the Bill on Thursday, January 22.

Committee report 'Progress; to sit again upon Thursday, 22nd January.

TRANSFER OF RAILWAYS (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 113.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 16 agreed to.

Clause 17.

(10.59.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I listened with a great deal of patience to the different clauses being read from the Chair, and made no objection to them, because I know they are formal, but Clause 17 stands in an entirely different position, and I am surprised that it should be passed over in silence by the Minister in charge of the Bill. The object of the Bill is to transfer the undertaking of certain Tramway Companies to existing Railway Companies. Clause 17 is, however, of a different character. I will read the clause:—

"Where the Treasury in pursuance of the Light Railways (Ireland) Act, 1889, have agreed with the promoters of any light railway that the undertaking of the promoters shall be aided by a capital sum out of public money, the sections of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, with respect to the entry upon lands by the promoters of the undertaking shall apply to the land which the promoters are authorised to take, and the Treasury, on the request of the promoters, shall cause to be paid into the Bank, out of such capital sum, any sum required to be deposited in the Bank for the purpose of those sections, and where the sum claimed, or if no sum is claimed, the total value of every estate and interest in the land does not exceed one hundred pounds, the amount to be deposited may be determined by two justices."

This clause relates to an entirely different set of light railways to that with which the rest of the Bill deals. The rest of the Bill deals with existing undertakings, the construction of none of which has been wholly provided by public money—given not lent. ["No, no!"] We shall see that as the discussion proceeds. There is not a single undertaking that I know of where the whole of the money is provided for out of public money, with the single exception of a railway to be made under the "Light Railways Act" of 1889, and although it may be desirable to transfer the powers of existing promoters under the old arrangements, yet it cannot be desirable that the House should without full explanation consent to a clause such as this. The clause deals with lines the cost of which is borne by the Public Exchequer—a free gift. We know that in a large number of cases the barony provides nothing, the county provides nothing, the ratepayers nothing, and the promoters nothing, the Railway Company nothing—the whole of the money is to be given. ["No, no!"] I know as a matter of fact it is so. Perhaps the hon. Member for South Tyrone can give us an explanation. It was said that it was impossible to make the railway as a paying speculation, and, therefore, the public were asked to give the whole of the cost. ["No, no!"] I take the most glaring instance—this Galway and Clifden Railway. This is a railway that includes 76 miles of line, and I am not incorrect in saying that the total cost is something like £440,000, and every penny of that is coming out of the Public Exchequer as a free gift. There was an idea of a small sum being guaranteed, but even that has been abandoned; and the fact stands that the railway is to be made by public money alone. I say it is improper to interpolate in a Bill dealing with a different class of cases a clause having this effect, that it enlarges the power already given by the Act of 1889 and Act passed last August, and makes further arrangements under which the money to be paid for the land on which the railway shall be constructed shall be provided by the Public Exchequer. I am going to contest the clause by way of an Amendment, that if the public provide the cost of construction the landlords through whose land the railway runs should give the land for nothing, or, at the outside, at something like 16 years' purchase of the net agricultural value of the land. In order that I may have time and opportunity, as we ought to have in such a matter, to put Amendments in form, I beg to move that you, Sir, do now report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed: "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Storey.)

*(11.5.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am very sorry that the hon. Member before making the statement he has made should not have taken some pains to inform himself, as he might easily have done, of the facts of the case by reading the clause to which he takes exception. The hon. Member states that the clause relates to an entirely different class of railways to those in other parts of the Bill. Now, if he will read the clause he will find that all it does is really to give power to get earlier possession of the land necessary to be acquired for the railway. It is merely a machinery clause. The hon. Member shakes his head, but if he will only read the clause he will find I am correct. I think, as a rule, we may anticipate that there will not be much difficulty in getting possession of the land for the railway. The hon. Member has spoken as if the difficulty was in dealing with the landlord's interest, but the difficulty is not with the landlord, but the occupier. All the clause does is to give us power, on payment into the bank of the sum of money assessed by a valuer to be appointed, to take possession of the land at once. It deprives the occupier of none of his rights, it leaves him full power to traverse the valuation, but what it is intended to do, and what I hope it will do, is to facilitate matters in the case of an occupier who might stick out for exorbitant terms, and provide that the construction of the line shall not be delayed until all processes are gone through. That is all the clause does, and really the question the hon. Member has raised, drawing a distinction between promoters and others, has nothing to do with the clause. The clause applies to existing Railway Companies as to promoters of a line under the Act. Of course, there are promoters on existing Railway Companies and other bodies. When the time comes to discuss this freely, I shall be prepared to defend the arrangements made as regards all the railways, feeling satisfied that the judgment of the House will approve them.

(11.13.) Question put, and negatived.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Clause 17 stand part of the Bill."

(11.15.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I take it that the explanation is that when the Treasury has agreed with the promoters to find all the money, this clause permits them to find the money to pay for land. My hon. Friend wants to provide a limitation that they shall not provide 30 years' purchase. There ought to be some limitation in the price to be paid for the land, the tenant's right, and the landlord's right. It is an important point, and demands discussion on amendment now or on Report.

*(11.15.) MR. JACKSON: So far as the Treasury is concerned, there cannot be an exorbitant price paid for the land. There is no limitation, because the amount agreed upon between the Treasury and the promoters is in itself a limited sum, and, therefore, whether the promoters pay a high rate or a low rate for the land is immaterial to the Treasury.

(11.16.) MR. STOREY: That is a fair statement in regard to all the arrangements already made. Take the railway to which I have referred. The Treasury have agreed upon a sum, and it is clear that is the whole sum that the Railway Company will get, and if they pay too large a sum for the land it is clear there will be a loss to the promoters. But the clause not only relates to agreements already made, it may relate to agreements yet to be made, and a limitation will enable the Treasury to make better bargains in the future. I think the right hon. Gentleman knows that he has made a shocking bargain with this Galway line, and has spent far more public money than he had need. This was partly due to the absurd provisions in the Light Railways Bill, the Bill we tried to kill. But for those provisions independent promoters might have made the line. But by the provisions of their Bill the Government were thrown back on the Railway Company, and the company, taking advantage of the position, exacted a large sum. A limitation would strengthen the Government in making a better bargain next time, and, therefore, I move this limitation to the clause—

"Such sum shall not exceed 16 years' purchase of the net agricultural value of the land."

THE CHAIRMAN: The question has been put that the clause stand part of the Bill, and it is too late to move an Amendment to the clause. Moreover, such an Amendment as is proposed would not be relevant to the clause.

(11.17.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I think the hon. Member has created some confusion in reference to the line in question by lumping the property together. It is true the Berridge property is worth very little—

THE CHAIRMAN: This discussion is entirely wide of the clause.

(11.20.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 224; Noes 22.—(Div. List, No. 10.)

Bill reported, without amendment.

*(11.31.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I wish to make an appeal to the House to read this Bill a third time. It is exceedingly important that the provisions of this measure should become law without any possible delay. The House is aware that the present Sittings may be limited. The Bill has to go to another place, and it will therefore be very desirable indeed that we should read it a third time to-night.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

(11.32.) MR. STOREY: I thought it necessary to make the protest I did make against one clause of the Bill, but, personally, I have no objection to the Third Reading.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILL PROCEDURE (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 114.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(11.33.) MR. W. H. SMITH: Objection has been taken on the other side of the House to proceeding with this Bill in the course of the present Sittings. I had hoped there would not have been this objection, but, of course, I am bound by the engagement I entered into with the House that only certain measures should be proceeded with at the present time, and, therefore, if the objection made by certain Members from Scotland is persevered in I must postpone the further consideration of the measure until after Christmas. I regret very much that I am obliged to do so. I had hoped this was a measure that would have been received with favour in all parts of the House, or, at least, that it would have been accepted by the House, and that any objections that might be made to its provisions would have been dealt with by the House. But, if as I understand, hon. Gentlemen persevere with their objections, I have no alternative but to postpone the further consideration of the measure.

(11.34.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I cannot admit the justice of all the right hon. Gentleman's remarks. Those Sittings were held under a pledge that only certain measures should be proceeded with, and I think we are justified in holding the Government to that pledge. We do not enter into the question of the desirability or non-desirability of the present measure. We only desire to hold the Government to the pledge they gave.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): May I point out to the right hon. Gentleman that this is one of the most revolutionary Bills ever introduced into this House? It takes away from the House powers which it has always had until now. This is the second time such a thing has been done. On the first occasion the hearing of Parliamentary Election Petitions was handed over to the Judges. I certainly object to the powers of the House with regard to Railway Bills being transferred to Commissioners or Boards. We do not want any more Commissioners or Boards in Scotland, as we are overdone with them already.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday, 22nd January.

SOLICITORS' MAGISTRACY BILL.

(No. 80.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(11.35.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time.—(Mr. Maclure.)

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I understood when I was last in the House that the Government were not going to allow any private Members' Bills to be taken before Christmas.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I would, with the permission of the House, appeal to my hon. Friend to postpone the consideration of this Bill on the ground which has just been stated to the House. It is undoubtedly a fact that I appealed to the House to consider only the Government measures, and that I stated what those measures were; I would appeal to my hon. Friend not to press the consideration of his measure.

(11.36.) MR. MACLURE (Lancashire, S.E., Stretford): I cannot refuse to obey the orders of my chief, and I shall be happy to postpone the measure till the 22nd January, when I believe it will be unanimously adopted.

Debate adjourned till Thursday, 22nd January.

DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 66.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(11.37.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. M. Healy.)

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I would appeal to the hon. Member on the ground I have already stated not to press this Bill.

MR. M. HEALY (Cork): This is a Bill which has been agreed to by the Government. It consists, in fact, of a clause taken from one of the Drainage Bills of the Government last year. Seeing that distress in Ireland is imminent, I trust the Government will allow the Bill to be read a second time.

(11.38.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): No doubt the hon. Gentleman is accurate in saying the Bill was accepted by the Government last Session, and will be in proper time accepted by the Government this Session. This is not, however, the time for pressing it.

MR. M. HEALY: Of course it is useless to attempt to fight the many legions of the Government.

POLLEN FISHERIES (IRELAND) BILL. (No. 91.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

(11.39.) MR. MACARTNEY: My Bill stands in a different position. I deferred to the Government the other night when I was asked to refrain from passing it through Committee. There is no objection to it in the House.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I must appeal to my hon. Friend on the grounds I have already stated not to press the Bill. The Government support the measure, but they cannot consent to its being taken to-night.

MR. McCARTAN (Down, S.): I would appeal to the Government to give this Bill their consideration. Unless it is passed, the fish in Lough Neagh will suffer great injury.

Committee deferred till Thursday, 22nd January.

MOTIONS.

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Milvain, Bill to amend and consolidate the Law relating to Corporal Punishment, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Milvain, Sir Matthew White Ridley, Sir George Russell, and Mr. Wharton.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 149.]

SLANDER OF WOMEN BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Milvain, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Slander of Women, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Milvain, Mr. Shireess Will, Mr. Gully, Mr. Robert Reid, and Mr. Pickersgill.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 150.]

EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS (IRELAND) RAINEY SCHOOL, MAGHERAFELT.

*(11.40.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I am exceedingly sorry to detain the House for a very few minutes on a question affecting one of the schemes of the Endowed Schools Commissioners in Ireland. I hope the Debate will be a very short one, and as I understand that there will be a practical consensus of opinion in my favour, so far as the Irish Members are concerned, and even as far as the Ulster Members on the Government side of the House are concerned, I hope the Government will see their way to make the small concession asked for by my resolution. I do not make a claim on behalf of any locality in Ireland. I make it on behalf of the entire Presbyterian community, represented by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, numbering at least half a million of people. They ask not for any favour, but for simple justice, and for the restitution of what is their own. The facts are exceedingly simple. One Hugh Rainey died, I think, in the year 1708. By his will he left a freehold estate of the value of £400 per annum. Some of that went to his representatives, and the residue he devised for a school for boys in the town of Magherafelt, County Londonderry. The school was established, and is in existence now, but it has a very peculiar history. That Hugh Rainey was a Presbyterian is beyond all manner of doubt. The Endowed Schools Commissioners admit that, at least they do not deny it, but the simple matter of fact is that Mr. Hugh Rainey was a ruling elder in the Presbyterian congregation at Castledawson. The question arises, what kind of a school did he intend to set up under his will, and under what kind of auspices did he intend it to be conducted? I think I shall prove that beyond all possibility of dispute out of the scheme sanctioned by the Commissioners. In his will, Hugh Rainey, after providing for the setting up of a school, directed that two old and good men, known Christians, such as feared God, and were qualified to read the Scriptures, sing Psalms, and instruct boys, should be appointed and maintained, and that if any such old men should be found defective or unable to perform such duties, he should be replaced by a person selected by the Presbytery of Ulster. I have not only proved that Hugh Rainey was a Presbyterian, but that he intended this school to be conducted under Presbyterian auspices. The startling part of the matter comes in now. In the year 1713, five or six years after the old men's death, an Act of Parliament was passed, the second of George II., Chapter 2, which vested this Presbyterian endowment of £177 a year, not in the Synod of Ulster, but in His Grace the Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of all Ireland. From that day the Episcopalian Church of Ireland has been in possession of this purely Presbyterian endowment, and at the present moment the Rector of Magherafelt, and not the Presbyterian minister, is in charge of the school. In that position it came before the Endowed Schools Commissioners who inquired into and reported upon it. The Commissioners were brought face to face with the facts I have stated. They could not agree, and the scheme as it is framed is not the work of the entire Commission, it is the work of the two Judicial Commissioners, Lord Justice Fitzgibbon and the late Lord Justice Naish. Those two distinguished lawyers said that if Rainey's endowment was alone to be dealt with and the intentions of the founder were to be regarded they would have considered it their duty to place the institution under Presbyterian management. That gave away the whole case, for it was a distinct admission that this was a Presbyterian endowment. They added, however, that £177 per annum was found not to be sufficient for the maintenance of the school, and that the Salters Company, on whose land the school was built, intervened and gave an additional sum of £66 per annum in aid of the original endowment. Granting that this complicates the matter a little, I say the Presbyterians are in an enormous majority in County Derry, and they are fairly entitled to their share of the Salters' endowment. Will the House believe that in framing the scheme the two Committees actually so arranged the Board of Governors that the Episcopals were given the majority of the Board, and therefore the whole control of the school? The Primate of all Ireland was made Chairman of the Board, and practically the entire control of the school was given to the Episcopals. That is substantially what I have to bring before the House. The Presbyterian Church do not object to this being a mixed school. They do not object to the Episcopals being represented on the Board of Governors — far from it. Their claim is simply this, that as the endowment was originally a Presbyterian one, and as the small addition to the endowment by the Salters Company cannot affect the real issue, the Presbyterians have an undoubted right, not to the second place on the Board of Governors, but to the first place. The Chief Secretary has disappeared, but I think I know what the Attorney General for Ireland is going to say. I don't know whether he is going to speak as the representative of the Government or of Trinity College, but I know what his case will be. The doctrine of user commends itself to all legal minds, and I suppose the right hon. and learned Gentleman's case will be that, inasmuch as his Grace the Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of all Ireland, grabbed this endowment in 1713— [Cries of "Grabbed?"] I have no other word for it, and I refuse to withdraw it unless Mr. Deputy Speaker calls on me to do so. I say it with no ill-will to the Episcopalian Church in Ireland. My constituents are largely Episcopalian; but I say this annual endowment passed unjustly and unfairly into the hands of the then Established Church of Ireland. I do not think that in this House the legal doctrine of user should be allowed to ride over the moral claim of the Presbyterians to this endowment. I entreat Conservative Members not to sanction a proceeding of this kind. I may be told that the matter was argued before the Privy Council, and that the Privy Council decided against us. What is the Privy Council? The Presbyterian Church has only one representative on the Privy Council of Ireland. There is room found on that Council for every class of Episcopals and Roman Catholics, but to get a Presbyterian merchant on it is almost impossible. I beg this House to undo the work that has been done, and to establish justice in this small matter in the province of Ulster. I move the Motion standing in my name.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to withhold Her consent from that part of the Scheme of the Educational Endowment (Ireland) Commissioners for the administration of the endowment in the town of Magherafelt, known as the Rainey School, in so far as the proposed composition of the Board of Governors is concerned."—(Mr. T. W. Russell.)

*(11.55.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): In the short statement I have to make to the House, I think I can show that the arrangement come to by the Charitable Endowment Commissioners, and confirmed by the Privy Council, ought to satisfy the House, and that the decision which was come to was a fair and reasonable one. No doubt the original foundation of the school was Presbyterian. In the time of George II. an Act of Parliament was passed dealing with the question, and from that time to the present day the school has ceased to be a Presbyterian school, and has become, rightly or wrongly, an Episcopalian one. It is not necessary to consider whether it had rightly become so. The Education Commissioners and the Privy Council have recognised the right of the Presbyterians in this matter, and they have made that full restitution which ought to be made in the circumstances of the case. After the passing of that Act the school-house was permitted by the managers to fall into decay, the rent-charge had become insufficient, and it became unsuitable for the reception of pupils. In 1862 the Salters' Company entered into an arrangement for the building of the existing school-house on the terms that the scheme should be settled by the Court of Chancery. In accordance with that arrangement, in 1863, the then Lord Chancellor of Ireland settled a scheme under which the entire management of the charity devolved upon the Archbishop of Armagh, and the local management of the school was committed to the Rector of Magherafelt. The arrangement was arrived at under judicial sanction in 1863, and it was with this state of facts that the Charity Commissioners had to deal. They said, in effect, "We will not consider that this is an exclusively Episcopalian endowment, as doubtless it has been for more than a century; but we will have a fair regard for the original foundation and the population of the district, and will equally divide the Governing Board between the Presbyterians and the Church of Ireland." Now, the Governing Body to which my hon. Friend objects, as settled by the Commissioners, consists of four ex-officio Governors, who are the Archbishop of Armagh (Dr. Knox), the Moderator of the General Assembly, the Episcopal Minister who is the Incumbent of the Parish of Magherafelt, and the officiating Minister of the Presbyterian congregation of Magherafelt. Can anything possibly be fairer than that?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: What about the Chairmanship of the Board?

*MR. MADDEN: I am coming to that matter in due course. As to the other half of the Board, the representative Governors are also equally divided.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I quite admit that the Board is fairly divided; but after having been so divided it is provided by the scheme that the Primate of Ireland shall be the Chairman for life, and that position gives him the casting vote, whereby the Episcopalians are practically invested with the entire government of the school.

*MR. MADDEN: It is provided that so long as the Most Reverend Dr. Knox shall hold the office of Archbishop of Armagh he shall continue to be Chairman. The sole point that appears to be raised by my hon. Friend appears to be that the status of the Archbishop is to be preserved during his life. That seems to be the hon. Gentleman's only objection. I submit that in fairness no better course could have been taken. The Archbishop of Armagh has been the Chairman of the Governing Body for more than a century, and it does not seem unreasonable that the present Archbishop should continue in that position during the remainder of his life. The endowment is one which no doubt was originally a Presbyterian endowment, but since its foundation it has been very largely added to, and, in fact, almost doubled from other sources. The Commissioners, finding themselves in this position, divide the management between the two bodies equally, retaining the present chairman for life. It would, in my opinion, have been an act of injustice to have taken away from the Archbishop the position he and his predecessors have so long held. After the present Archbishop the person holding that position instead of being the head will merely become one of the Governing Body. I appeal to the House not to assent to the Motion of my hon. Friend. The case is one that has been thoroughly threshed out, and in the fullest detail, by the able Counsel who represented the Presbyterian Body before the Commissioners, while previous to that the whole matter had received the careful attention of the Commissioners of Charitable Endowments. The Report was signed by two eminent Judges, the late Lord Justice Naish, one of the fairest-minded men who ever sat on the Irish Bench, and Lord Justice Fitzgibbon, who is one of the ablest and most distinguished Judges in Ireland. They fully examined the case, and the result is that we have before us what I trust the House will regard as a fair decision, equally apportioning the government of the school between the representatives of the Church of Ireland and Presbyterian Church. Under all the circumstances, I appeal to the House not to take upon itself the responsibility of reversing a decision which has been come to after so much argument and consideration. I may add that this is the only case in which the decisions of the Irish Commissioners have been questioned in this House. The conclusions arrived at by the Commissioners are such as have hitherto commanded the general confidence of the country. The matter now under consideration is one that has been well threshed out and considered, and, submitting that the decision arrived at is one that is fair and just to the interests concerned, I venture to hope that the House will refuse its assent to the Motion of my hon. Friend.

(12.8.) Mr. DICKSON (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green): I wish to remind the House that this endowment was originally a Presbyterian endowment, and that we Presbyterians, in asking that it should be restored to our control, are merely asking for our own. The Attorney General for Ireland has referred to the Privy Council. I am afraid I have not so high an opinion of the decisions of the Privy Council as the right hon. Gentleman seems to entertain. A case in point occurred in connection with the Royal School of Dungannon. The Privy Council, under the dictation of the Archbishop of Armagh, altered the scheme in connection with the Dungannon School, and deprived us of our position as the controlling authority on the Board of Governors. I gave notice that I would dispute their action when the scheme came before the House for confirmation. What was the result? Why, when the Privy Council knew that I should have 85 Irish Members to support me in the action I had intended to take, they quietly altered their decision and reverted to the original scheme. Therefore, unlike the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, I do not regard the decisions of the Privy Council as resembling the laws of the Medes and Persians. I say that in this case also we are entitled to the control of the school. We wish the school to be a mixed school. We are anxious to see both Presbyterians and Episcopalians fairly represented on the Board of Government, and, therefore, we do not want the Archbishop of Armagh to have the controlling power over the decisions of the Board. The hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) has lightly described what is going on as simply grabbing at the Presbyterian endowments; at least three-fourths of the endowments originally left to Presbyterians have been grabbed in the same way by the Episcopalians, and had we Presbyterians received fair play our position in connection with the schools in the Province of Ulster would have been very different from what it is. I trust that hon. Members on both sides of the House will fairly consider this matter, and join the hon. Member for South Tyrone and myself in endeavouring to do an act of justice to the Presbyterians of Ulster by giving them the control of their own property.

(12.14.) COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I rise for the purpose of supporting the Motion of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, and in doing so I cannot but express a certain amount of regret at the vehemence with which this Motion has been not only supported, but has been met by the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland. I think that in a matter of this kind it is very undesirable to import vehemence of tone or language, or in any way to give to the question at issue a personal character. There are two grounds upon which I desire to support this Motion. I have two grounds for supporting the Motion—sentimental and practical. As an Irishman, I have a right to take the sentimental one first. I am a lineal descendant of Hugh Rainey, and were he here—and he would probably be more effective in the flesh than in the spirit—he would support the proposition now before the House. On the practical ground of the unity of Protestantism, I support the proposition. In the year 1708 unfortunate differences—now, happily, dead and gone—divided us; and I hope, now that unity has been restored, these small causes of friction will not be allowed to interfere with it. The hon. Member who moves this Resolution does not belong to the section of the Church interested in the matter any more than I do. I support the Motion simply because I hope that the Presbyterians would support me if I made a claim to an endowment that was clearly Episcopalian. I hope the House will allow the matter to be referred back to the Commission for re-consideration.

(12.18.) MR. W. P. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): Sir, how is it the Archbishop of Armagh is imported into the consideration of this endowment at all? The fact of the matter is, it is due to the Penal Laws of the 18th century, under which Presbyterians could not hold property; therefore, they were obliged to put their property in trust, and who better than the head of the Episcopalian Church? No doubt that was the feeling at the time of which I speak, and I am sorry that feeling has not continued. I think if we revert to the position which existed at the time when the Archbishop was asked to take the property in trust we shall be doing the right thing. Knowing as I do the feeling of not only Presbyterians, but members of other denominations and Episcopals, I trust the House will decide in favour of the Motion of my hon. Friend, and reverse the decision of the Irish Court.

(12.20.) MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.): The argument of the Attorney General for Ireland rests chiefly on the decision of the Privy Council. I wish to give two or three reasons why Parliament should interfere. This may be considered a trivial and trumpery matter, so far as concerns the money involved, but it is a question in which half a million of the Presbyterians of Ireland take the deepest interest. The decision of this House will not be a trumpery matter. The Rector of the parish, the very man who is at the bottom of this whole matter, appeared before the Commissioners, and he was asked this question—

“Do you think that a substitution of the reference of the Synod to Ulster by placing the management in the hands of the Archbishop was right?”

The Rector did not dare to answer that it was right. He said—

“That was done by Parliament 100 years ago, and I think it would be very indecorous of me to express an opinion in the face of that.”

What did Parliament do 100 years ago? It appointed by a Private Act the Archbishop of Armagh as receiver of the money, and decreed, further, that he should carry out the trusts of the will. In spirit the Archbishop has absolutely ignored the trusts of the will from that day to this, the trust being that the teachers should be sought from the Presbyterians of Ulster. Again, I think the House should interfere, because the school has been a complete failure. The Attorney General said that the Salters' Company found the school in ruins. It is absolutely at the present moment, not physically, but mentally in ruins. Out of 320 pupils that have been in the school since intermediate education began in Ireland, only 29 have passed. Again, the House should interfere in behalf of the Presbyterians, because the Episcopals, who claim to have a majority in the management of this school, are the minority of the inhabitants of the parish. The Rector, in reply to the Commissioners, said the Episcopals were a third of the population of the parish, but these are the figures: Presbyterians, 2,098; Roman Catholics, 1,730; Episcopals, 1,462. The Presbyterians are as seven to five, and with that proportion of representation will we be content? A strong argument against us is that of user. But that argument cannot apply, because it is founded on a breach of the trusts of the will. If the user can apply under these circumstances, it will be a new doctrine to me. Besides, the Privy Council have completely destroyed the argument of user in favour of complete control by the Episcopals by giving representation to the Presbyterians. The Attorney General said that great weight should be given to the views of the Salters' Company, because they had come to the aid of the school. But here is an extract from the letter of their

Secretary, Mr. Cartwright, of the 14th December, 1886—

"The Presbyterian body under the influence of a local Presbyterian minister made a claim to the endowment under Rainey's will, against which I considered that the Church had certainly a preferential claim. The wise liberality of your Grace's predecessor enabled me many years ago to throw open the advantages of the education afforded by the school to children of all religious denominations,"

I do not wish to make this a matter personal to the Presbyterians, nor do I wish to say anything against the Episcopalians. I simply state the facts, leaving the House to decide on which side justice lies.

(12.25.) MR. MADDEN: I understand that the result of the Motion being agreed to would be simply to refer the matter back to the Commissioners. I have submitted to the House the grounds on which the Privy Council came to a decision and the reasons why I consider that decision to be a fair one; but as it appears there is a general wish that the decision should be reviewed, I do not think I can any longer oppose the Motion.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Sir, I only wish to take note of this fact, that on a Motion brought forward by the hon. Member for South Tyrone, and supported by the Unionists generally, the Member for South Derry, who ought to have so much influence with the Government, has thought it convenient to skedaddle, and to leave the question of the rights of Presbyterians on this matter in Derry entirely derelict. [Laughter.] I am very glad the Government have seen their way to accept the suggestion, and that the Presbyterians, having fought this matter for a century, have now a prospect of getting justice.

*MR. MADDEN: I wish to correct a mistake into which the hon. and learned Gentleman has fallen. He appears to think I spoke on the part of the Government in this Debate. I did not.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, that a humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to withhold Her consent from that part of the Scheme of the Educational Endowment (Ireland) Commissioners for the administration of the endowment in the town of Magherafelt, known as the Rainey School, in so far as the proposed composition of the Board of Governors is concerned.

To be presented by Privy Councillors.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 5th December, 1890.

MR. SPEAKER'S CONTINUED ABSENCE.

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House that Mr. Speaker was again unavoidably prevented from taking the Chair of the House this day.

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

QUESTIONS.

OUT-STILL LICENCES IN INDIA.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to the Petition of Arthur Brownlow, of Sungoo Tea Estate, Chittagong, to the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, complaining of the granting of an out-still licence for a shop at Sadhanpur, which immediately adjoins his tea estate, and whereby the injury caused to him and the coolies employed by him on his two tea estates was very great, inasmuch as the liquor shop quite demoralised the coolies and servants employed, while drunkenness and absence from duty of the coolies became the order of the day, and the Native doctor of the Sungoo Tea Estate had to be dismissed for inebriety?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): Yes; the Secretary of State understands that such a Petition has been addressed to the Government of Bengal, and is now under the consideration of that Government.

MILITARY STORES IN INDIA.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India what, if any, steps have been taken in accordance with the undertaking of the Government of 22nd July to arrive at a settlement of the disputed and long unsettled charges for military stores; and whether he can now make any statement on the subject?

SIR J. GORST: The Secretary of State addressed an inquiry to the War Office on the 1st November, to which no reply has yet been received.

FIRTH OF CLYDE.

COLONEL MALCOLM (Argyllshire): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he will order a minute survey to be made of the Firth of Clyde, near the Cloch Lighthouse, in order to determine the exact position of the alleged banks, and correct the present Admiralty Charts, which show 19 fathoms where there is less than seven?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): This survey has been already made. The Admiralty Charts have been corrected, and the results communicated to the Board of Trade.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Is the noble Lord aware that more than one bank has been discovered? Has the survey been sufficiently made?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I am not aware of the banks to which the hon. Member refers. There is a bank which is supposed to have been formed by dredging. All the banks have been thoroughly surveyed.

NAVAL LIEUTENANTS.

CAPTAIN PRICE (Devonport): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is true that the Admiralty propose to increase the number of Lieutenants; and, if so, whether he will consider the advisability of giving a certain number of Lieutenant's Commissions to warrant officers who may be able to qualify for the rank?

LORD G. HAMILTON: In reply to my hon. Friend, I may remind him that it takes about 8 to 10 years to make a Lieutenant from the time he enters the Britannia to the time he passes his final qualifying examination. The want of Lieutenants now is due to short entries made during the years 1880 to 1885. Since then the entries have been increased about 40 per cent., but the Lieutenants' List will not increase for some years to come, though the Sub-Lieutenants' List will begin to swell next year. I am not prepared to promote officers to the rank of Lieutenant except for war service, or other specially meritorious service.

KING JA JA.

SIR W. FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston), for MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether King Ja Ja is still detained at St. Vincent; whether it was intimated to him in August last that he would be released from further detention as a political prisoner on his undertaking to observe certain conditions on his return to Opobo; whether the undertaking was duly signed by King Ja Ja; and whether, under these circumstances, Her Majesty's Government will order his re-conveyance to Opobo?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): Ja Ja is still detained at St. Vincent, but as was stated in the reply of the 2nd to the hon. Member for Leicester his removal to another colony is being arranged. An assurance was taken from Ja Ja that if permitted to return to Opobo he would conduct himself peaceably. The Reports from Opobo show, however, that his immediate return is inexpedient, and must, consequently, be deferred.

SIR W. FORSTER: Will the right hon. Baronet lay on the Table the Papers relating to the subject?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: To the best of my belief we are not in possession of the text of these documents.

Captain Price

MR. PICTON (Leicester): The right hon. Gentleman has not answered this part of the question—whether it was intimated to Ja Ja that he would be released from further detention as a political prisoner on his undertaking to observe certain conditions on his return to Opobo? Was it so intimated to him? We have not been told that.

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I do not think it is known in this country what were the precise terms used, or that Ja Ja had any distinct promise given to him, but I have not the least doubt that he was led to expect that he would be allowed to return home. It is plain that it would be very regrettable, if after his return he should have to be again removed.

MR. PICTON: Is the territory of Opobo part of Her Majesty's Dominion?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: It forms part of Her Majesty's Protectorate, and we are responsible for the preservation of order there.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that it is only a question of time.

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Only a question of time and of advisability.

JUVENILE OFFENDERS.

MR. MATHER (Lancashire, S.E., Gorton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that, out of the total number 1,131 juvenile offenders under 16 years of age brought before the Police Courts of Manchester and Salford in 1889, only two-fifths, or about 450, were charged with felony, the remaining three-fifths, or about 680, having been arrested for trivial offences without criminal intent, and that the whole of the non-criminal offenders were classified among criminals at the Police Courts and associated more or less with them, including confinement in police cells, up to the time of their discharge after the payment of a fine; whether he is aware that cases have occurred when juvenile offenders of a non-criminal character have been put into prison for their inability to pay costs amounting to four or five times the sum of the fine, when the fine itself has been tendered by parents and friends who were too poor to pay the heavy costs; whether the Magistrates or Police Authorities have discretionary power under the existing law to treat juveniles under 16 years of age, arrested for trivial offences against police regulations only punishable by fine, in such manner as shall prevent their associating with criminals at the first or at any stage of the process of punishment; and whether, if such power does not exist, he will introduce a Bill to confer power on Magistrates and Police Authorities to provide juvenile offenders of a non-criminal character with such accommodation after arrest as shall prevent their mingling with or being regarded as criminals, and also to provide special Courts to try trivial juvenile offences in order to spare children, otherwise honest, the obviously evil consequences arising out of the treatment to which they are at present subjected in Manchester and Salford and elsewhere?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): The Secretary of State has no official statistics on the subject. But the distinction drawn between criminal offenders and non-criminal offenders has no foundation in law, and would in practice be impossible. All must be treated alike while in custody in the police cells; and all in prison must also be treated alike, provided that they have received the same sentence. It is a mistake, however, to suppose that there is any association in prisons. Each prisoner is kept separate. The Legislature, in the Summary Jurisdiction Act, First Offenders Act, and other Statutes, have provided various means by which unnecessary or unduly long imprisonment may be avoided—allowance of bail, dismissal of trivial cases, remission of costs, allowance of time for payment of fine, imposition of fine in lieu of imprisonment, detention of juvenile offenders in a reformatory or industrial school. Circulars have been issued from the Home Office impressing on Magistrates the desirability of children not being imprisoned before trial, and Governors of prisons have been instructed to report to the Secretary of State every case of such imprisonment of a child under 14. The Secretary of State regrets that Magistrates do frequently impose light fines with heavy costs, as it leaves a false impression as to the administration of justice. But in most of these cases it will be found that the fine has been so light because the costs have been so heavy, and the person convicted has not been punished more severely than he ought to have been. There are difficulties in the way of such measures as those indicated in the 4th clause of the question. The practice in Metropolitan Police Courts is to remand to the workhouse, under Section 19 of the Industrial Schools Act, 1866, all children under 14 where desirable, pending inquiries necessary for the decision of the case. I understand this practice to be based on the view that the power given by that section exists in all cases where a child under 14 years is brought before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. The Secretary of State hopes to introduce again a Bill authorising several alternative modes of dealing with juvenile offenders, with a view to preventing the necessity of their being sent to prison.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, with a view to the prevention of railway accidents, the Board of Trade have made, or will make, specific inquiry into systems of automatic electric signalling between trains and trains which would be an additional safeguard in cases of fog, detached cars, or mistakes of signalmen?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The subject of automatic electric signalling has frequently engaged the attention of the Board of Trade, and further inquiries are now being made. There are many difficulties to contend with, and all I can say at present is that the matter will continue to receive attention. It may be added that the Norton Fitzwarren collision would not have been prevented had the system as hitherto carried out been in force there.

THE GWYLWYR SETT QUARRY.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon District): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the negotiations for the lease of the Gwylwyr Sett Quarry, Pistyll, Carnarvonshire, have been completed; and, if so, whether such a lease contains a provision for ensuring that the quarry will be efficiently worked by the lessee; and whether any explanation can be afforded why this quarry is still unworked, notwithstanding the assurance given that it was intended to commence active operations without any delay?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The lease of the quarry referred to has not yet been completed, and that is the reason why the quarry is still unworked. It is expected that the lease will shortly be completed, and it will contain clauses requiring the lessees to work it.

SOUTH SEA ISLAND LABOURERS.

MR. S. SMITH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that the Sydney Presbyterian of the 2nd of August, 1890, states that the forcible recruiting of labourers in the South Sea Islands for Queensland still continues, and that recently a French schooner recruited a woman from Malo, leaving an infant behind; whether he is aware that the Rev. J. G. Paton, missionary, has stated that last year he complained of a vessel which called at his island, Amida, and got away a young widow, leaving her two infant children behind uncared for; and that it also got away three or four young men, one of them leaving his wife behind unprovided for; whether he is aware that the Rev. P. Milne, of Nguna, complained to the authorities in Queensland of a Brisbane labour vessel, the Eliza Mary, taking away, on the 28th of September last year, from his station three lads who were his hired servants from other islands, and afterwards other lads, 10 in all; and whether, after waiting long, an official reply came to him that the Chief Secretary of the Colony has fully approved of them all being so taken away by the Eliza Mary; and whether Her Majesty's Government is now prepared to adopt energetic measures for the suppression of this Slave Trade in the South Seas?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Through the courtesy of the hon. Member I have been supplied with a copy of the Sydney Presbyterian referred to. The first two cases mentioned have not been reported home; but it may be observed that the first is one of a foreign vessel, and that in the second it is not clear whether anything unlawful is alleged. As to the third, it is known that the Rev. P. Milne complained to the Queensland authorities, but not what the terms of the reply were. The Pacific Islanders Protection Acts of 1872 and 1875 make it penal to carry away a native without his consent, but in the above cases no violation of this law is alleged; and if any Queensland regulation, creating and providing penalties for other offences in connection with the labour traffic, has been infringed, such infringements must be dealt with by the Queensland Government. I may remind the hon. Member that, as I stated to him in July last, under a Queensland Act of 1885 the introduction of Polynesian labourers into the colony will cease after the end of this year.

THE NEW MAGAZINE RIFLE.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War for what reason it has been thought desirable to introduce Mark II. of the magazine rifle; and if he could state the cost of the rifle as compared with that of the Martini-Henry at similar stages of its production?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I explained very fully yesterday, in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Horsham, the reasons why Mark II. has been introduced. The cost of the Martini-Henry rifle was, of course, high at first, but in the first year in which it was extensively made it was £3 18s. 4d., which sum, as the manufacture went on, was gradually reduced to £2 2s. 10d., neither price including any charge for the special machinery required. The price of the magazine rifle for the small number at first produced was £5 5s., but the estimated cost for the current year is £4, which includes a Sinking Fund calculated to pay for the necessary alteration of machinery in six years. This price was for Mark I.; Mark II. will probably cost a trifle less, and it may be anticipated that the charge will decrease as the manufacture proceeds, as it did in the case of the Martini-Henry. In this comparison allowance ought to be made for the facts that wages have increased and hours of labour been shortened since the Martini-Henry rifle was first turned out.

WOOLWICH ARSENAL.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will state why the present slackness of work exists at Woolwich Arsenal; why men (some of whom have been employed there for years) are being dismissed; why men are "suspended" for no apparent reason, sometimes for a week at a time; if he can explain why, although £101,000 were voted this year to Woolwich Arsenal, which is a larger sum than was voted the year before, about 40 men have been discharged within the past few weeks; if sub-contracting is permitted, and, if so, on what grounds; whether Messrs. Easton and Anderson have received 30 gun-breech mechanisms from Messrs. Vickers, of Sheffield, and if these gun-breech mechanisms were given out from Woolwich to Messrs. Vickers; and, if so, will he explain why; if it would be possible to put down the system of working overtime at Woolwich Arsenal; and, if not, will he state the reason; and why is work given out from the Arsenal to Messrs. Anderson, of Leith?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: There has been no general reduction in the Ordnance Factories. But I should like to say at once that, as the special work to be undertaken under the Imperial Defence Loan is now drawing to a close, and employment in the factories is coming to its normal state, there must of necessity be reductions, but they shall be made with all possible regard to the importance of doing so at a time of year when other employment can be found. There is very little overtime at the Arsenal, and that only under special circumstances. There are no sub-contracts in the Ordnance Factories. The contract made by me with Messrs. Vickers is for heavy guns. The War Office is aware that they have entrusted the breech mechanisms to Messrs. Easton and Anderson, but the matter is not one that concerns us. As to work being given out from the Arsenal to Messrs. Anderson, of Leith, my inquiries do not enable me to find out anything whatever about them.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Is it the fact that 40 men have been discharged within the last three weeks?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am unable to answer that question directly. There is a total number of 16,000 men of different classes employed; some men have been discharged, and some may have been taken on, and it is quite possible that there might have been a balance of discharges of the number stated.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Will the right hon. Gentleman take into consideration the advisability of shortening the hours in order to meet the slackness of work, as this is a most inclement season at which to discharge men?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I do not think that would be possible. What the country require is that the warlike stores should be turned out by the time they are needed.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: The point is, whether the men employed by Government are to be worse treated than they would be if employed by private firms? Will the right hon. Gentleman endeavour to introduce some system to alter the overtime working?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am happy to say that these men are better treated than they would be by any private firm. With regard to overtime, I have already stated that it is only worked under special circumstances.

BIRMINGHAM POST OFFICE.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether his attention has been called to the fact that the plastering work of the new Birmingham Post Office has been sublet to a man of the name of Welling; whether information has been submitted to the Office of Works of the very extensive system of adulteration of the materials used that has taken place; whether the Board of Works acknowledged by letter, dated 10th September, 1890, that the statements made in regard to the adulteration were substantially correct; and whether, in spite of this condemnation, Welling has been allowed to continue to work and to commence the front block; whether he is aware that the Clerk of the Works has given orders that no plasterer was to be employed on the job who had worked there previous to the complaint made of the adulteration of the materials; and whether he will inquire into the circumstances of the case?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): As the question only appeared on the Paper to-day, I have not been able to obtain the information necessary to enable me to answer it, and I must ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone it.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I will repeat it on Monday.

THE SULTAN OF VITU.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether a reward of 10,000 rupees has been offered by the British Naval Authorities on the East Coast of Africa for the capture of the Sultan of Vitu; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government have given instructions that such offer should be withdrawn?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The reward has been offered. The Sultan has not yet been captured, nor has he surrendered to take his trial, and the offer still holds good.

THE BRUSSELS CONFERENCE.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is true, as reported, that the Government of the Netherlands has demanded an extension of the time given in which to sign the General Act and Declaration of the Brussels Conference; and whether Her Majesty's Government can afford the House any information as to the steps they have taken to overcome the reluctance of Holland to sign the General Act and Declaration of the Conference?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No such demand has been made to our knowledge. It could only be addressed to the Conference. Steps are being taken by Her Majesty's Government, in concert with other Powers, to induce Holland to sign, but it is not at present possible to indicate their nature.

THE NEW LOAD LINE LAW.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will be good enough to state the nature of the instructions issued to the Board of Trade Surveyors relative to the new Load Line Law; and whether he is aware that doubts exist regarding its application or otherwise to vessels already sailing and marked under Lloyd's freeboard rules?

Mr. Sydney Buxton

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The instructions to Surveyors include the tables of the Load Line Committee, with a Memorandum on their application and directions as to the course to be followed when owners apply for load lines to be fixed by the Board of Trade. The provisions of the law apply to all British vessels, whether previously marked by Lloyd's or not, and I have not heard of any real difficulties having arisen in the matter.

NATURAL HISTORY MUSEUM— ELECTRIC LIGHTING.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether, considering that the public are now deprived of the use of the Great Natural History Museum, not only in the afternoons and evenings but also on foggy winter days, and that the facilities of lighting are now such that the Museum has already been temporarily lighted by electricity for Societies meeting there, he will again consider the advisability of arranging to light the Museum?

*MR. PLUNKET: The Trustees of the British Museum must determine this question in conjunction with the Treasury. I have no authority in the matter.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will have to ask Parliament to sanction the necessary funds?

*MR. PLUNKET: That is a question for the Treasury.

SIR G. CAMPBELL repeated his question to the Secretary to the Treasury, but received no answer.

THE MUZZLING ORDER.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture when the Order for muzzling dogs will be withdrawn from the County of Middlesex?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The question of my hon. Friend has already engaged my attention, but I have found it exceedingly difficult to relax the Order in the County of Middlesex until the same course is adopted for the whole of the Metropolitan Police District. There has been a case of rabies so lately as the month of September within that area, and I am advised that a sufficient time has not elapsed to justify me in withdrawing it at present. I cannot indicate the date of its probable withdrawal, for the reason that it must depend upon the nature of the Returns which we continue to receive; but I am glad to say that they have been exceedingly favourable of late, and I have great hopes that I may be able to relax it, so far as the Metropolis is concerned, at no distant date.

*MR. DIXON-HARTLAND: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that Middlesex is the only County in which the Order is in force, and that cases of rabies are found in dogs coming from over the borders and not in the county itself, and whether, therefore, this is not an injustice to the county?

*MR. CHAPLIN: No, Sir; the statement of my hon. Friend is not altogether correct. The Muzzling Order prevails throughout the whole Metropolitan District at present, and in that district are included parts of several other counties, in addition to the County of Middlesex.

SOUTH-EAST AFRICA—DISTURBANCE IN MUTACA'S COUNTRY.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can give the House any information with regard to the reported collision between the police of the British Chartered South Africa Company and certain Portuguese in Mutaca's country, in South-East Africa?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: A telegram has been received from the High Commissioner substantially confirming the reports which have appeared in the newspapers. Of course, there has not been time for Her Majesty's Government to consider the matter as yet.

MR. BRYCE: When will the right hon. Gentleman be able to make a statement? Will it be before the end of the present Sittings of the House?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: If the hon. Gentleman will put down a question I will answer it to the best of my power.

RELIEF OF LOCAL TAXATION.

MR. OLDROYD (Dewsbury): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the letter, written by Mr. Clinton E. Dawkins to Mr. A. Arnold, J.P., from the Treasury Chambers, dated 17th November, 1890, and published in the newspaper Press 30th November, 1890, and giving information as to the net financial gain to the Borough of Halifax under the new arrangement for the relief of local taxation compared with the old system, was, as stated, in fulfilment of a promise by him; and, if so, whether the Government will furnish similar information as to the effect upon the finances of six typical non-county boroughs with a high rateable value?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Yes, Sir; I gave Mr. Arnold the information as regards Halifax, as I should have given it to any other gentleman who had asked for it. It would not be possible to furnish information in the same way for non-county boroughs. As the hon. Member will recollect, payments in their case are not made direct from the Local Taxation Account, but after the county has paid the discontinued grants and the grants for union officers the balance is applied to the reduction of the rates over the whole county area, inclusive of the non-county boroughs, which participate in the balance according to their respective rateable values. But I am informed that a Return will shortly be issued by the Local Government Board showing what the balance was in each county for the year 1889-90.

THE SHARDLOW UNION.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that some two months ago the Guardians of Shardlow Union (Derbyshire) decided to send the children who are inmates of the workhouse to the national school of the parish of Shardlow; whether the school managers, in the first place, raised objections to receiving them, and finally charged a fee of 1s. per head, notwithstanding the fact that fees of only 2d. and 3d. per head were charged for other children not inmates of the workhouse, whose fees were paid by the Guardians; and whether he can take any steps to remedy this inequality of payment?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The facts are as stated in the hon. Member's question. It is usual in such circumstances for the managers to charge a fee considerably in excess of that paid in respect of other scholars, and so long as the average fee is not thereby raised above 9d., the Department would not be justified in objecting to the fee charged.

POLICE AND HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate, with reference to the Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, whether he is correctly reported as having said, in answer to a deputation, "that only three Members representing Scotland objected to the said Bill;" and, if this be the fact, whether Her Majesty's Government will arrange after Christmas to give reasonable time in order to pass the Bill, and comply with the all but unanimous wish of the Scotch Burghs, by passing a measure which they have repeatedly represented as being urgently needed and of great importance to the health of the people, and to which there is practically no opposition?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The statement quoted in the question was made, not by me, but by Members of the deputation, and I am not aware of any Report which describes it to me. I believe the objection to the Bill to be confined to a few Members; but the opposition of even a few Members, to a Bill of 571 clauses, constitutes a formidable Parliamentary difficulty in the way of its progress. I stated at the beginning of last Session that if the Scotch Members were practically unanimous in desiring that the Bill should pass through this House in the form in which it left the Select Committee of 1888, the Government would be most willing to effectuate this desire; the offer then made was not accepted; and the deputation which I met last month was unable to say that the situation was materially altered. Under these circumstances, the Government, while adhering to previous statements regarding the Bill, do not feel justified in giving the undertaking suggested by the hon. Member, seeing that the "reasonable time" which he desires would only be obtained at the expense of other measures to which the Government are pledged, and that, at present, they have no adequate assurance that it would be effectively bestowed on the Bill in question.

HOURS OF WORK OF LOCOMOTIVE DRIVERS.

MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he has received any reply from the Railway Association to the Letter he addressed to that body, in reference to the long hours worked by locomotive drivers; and, if so, will he circulate the Correspondence to Members?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: No reply has yet been received; but when it has, the Correspondence will be laid upon the Table.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Will it embrace the hours of all workers on the railway?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: No, Sir; I think not.

THE CROFTER COMMISSION.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Scotch Office has received any communication from the Crofter Commission as to the reason why the clauses extending holdings has been inoperative; and whether the Government intend doing anything in regard to the matter?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The Secretary for Scotland received a Report from the Commissioners with reference to this subject, and it was laid on the Table of the House. No other Report has been received. No decision has been come to by the Government as to whether it is expedient to take any further steps in the matter.

ST. GEORGE'S CHURCH, BOTOLPH LANE.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. J. W. Lowther), as a Charity Commissioner, whether the Charity Commissioners have refused to contribute to the necessary repairs of the Church of St. George, Botolph Lane, in the City of London, which was built by Sir Christopher Wren, for the reason that it is not of any special architectural interest or value; and whether the Charity Commissioners, before coming to this decision, obtained any Report upon the Church from any architectural authority; and, if so, whether they will lay the Report upon the Table, or state upon whose opinion they have acted?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The central scheme framed by the Charity Commissioners under the City of London Parochial Charities Act provides the annual sum of £41 for the maintenance and repairs of the fabric of the Church of St. George, Botolph Lane, besides an annual sum of £117 for the ordinary cleaning of the church and the maintenance of public worship. In view of the fact that the church is not of primary architectural interest, and of the general condition of the parish, and that the Commissioners are advised that a sum of £2,700 would be required for the restoration of the church, they did not feel justified in dealing with it specially under Section 14 of the Act. The Commissioners were advised by their architect, Mr. Ewan Christian, but they accept full responsibility for their action in the matter, and are therefore not prepared to lay his Report upon the Table, but if the right hon. Gentleman will call at the office of the Charity Commissioners the Report will be open to his inspection.

LIFE-SAVING APPLIANCES.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to the finding of the Coroner's Jury in the inquest upon the late Lord Cantelupe, that his life might have been saved if a rocket life line apparatus had been available at Bangor; and if it is possible for anything to be done to provide such appliances at all coastguard stations round the coasts of the United Kingdom, or to compel vessels to carry them under the Merchant Shipping (Life-Saving Appliances) Act?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have seen a report of the finding of the jury, but the apparatus which saved the crew in this case was stationed only some three miles from Bangor, and it would not be practicable to keep an apparatus at every place on the coast where a casualty may occur. There are already about 300 rocket stations, and life lines alone are kept at many other places. Any suggestion for establishing a new station always receives consideration. On mature consideration, the rocket apparatus has been deemed unsuitable as an equipment for ships themselves.

H.M.S. TYNE.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether H.M.S. Tyne, which is to be despatched on the 9th or 10th of this month with two Batteries of Artillery, reliefs for Line battalions, and with the entire crews of two men-of-war for the China Stations (in all, over 1,200 persons), has only accommodation for half that number of persons, and, although in need of thorough repair, has only been patched up?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: The hon. Member's information is not quite correct. His statements are to the effect that the Tyne is to leave England on the 9th of December with 1,200 troops on board, being twice the number she can accommodate, and that she requires thorough repairs, which have been scamped. The facts are, the Tyne is not to leave England until the 31st of December; she will not have on board any troops, being on Naval Service, the entire crews taken amounting to 142 men, to which have to be added 190 supernumeraries, a total of 332, which is well within the accommodation of the vessel. The Tyne is at the present moment in the hands of the Dockyard receiving careful repairs.

THE IRISH MAILS.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that merchants in Belfast, who formerly used the mail from London via Holyhead and Dublin, have of late been obliged to direct their parcels and samples to be sent by the Larne and Stranraer route in order to compete with Dublin; whether he is aware that the English mails, sent by Holyhead, even when the mail train reaches Belfast at the time appointed, arrive too late for business purposes; and whether he can say definitely about what date some arrangement will be made to give the merchants of Belfast and other important towns in Ulster the advantage of having the English mails sent by the Larne and Stranraer route?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): An application has been made to me by a Belfast firm for permission to have letters, &c., sent from London to Belfast via Stranraer and Larne on their being specially so addressed, but in the absence of any proper arrangement for the purpose I have not been able to accede to their request. There is some misapprehension, I think, with regard to the delivery in Belfast of the English night-mail letters. Those letters, when the mail train arrives punctually, are included in a delivery beginning at 11.20 a.m., and it can hardly be said that this is too late for business purposes. The outward mail for England is not despatched from Belfast until 3.30 p.m., so that there is a reasonable interval for reply by return of post. I am not yet able to make an announcement respecting the proposal to adopt the Stranraer and Larne route for the Belfast mails.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that, during the present year, a written request for a Sunday delivery of letters from Millisle to Carrowdore was made to the Secretary of the General Post Office, Dublin, by a large and influential number of the inhabitants of the district of Carrowdore, Donaghadee; and whether, considering the general complaints made by the people as to the serious inconvenience which non-delivery of letters there on Sundays causes to the residents of the district, he will consider the advisability of instituting a Sunday delivery of these letters?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that the Sunday post between Millisle and Carrowdore was discontinued about three years ago on a Memorial from the inhabitants receiving two-thirds of the correspondence, and I shall be happy to sanction its restoration upon similar conditions. But the Memorial forwarded a few months ago in favour of the restoration of the Post was found, on careful inquiry, to represent the receivers of only one-half of the correspondence, and, having regard to the regulations which govern questions of this kind, I should not at present feel warranted in acceding to the wishes of the memorialists.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the delivery of letters arriving by the Holyhead route about half-past 11 does not necessitate a return of merchants after they have left their offices in order to deal with their correspondence; whether he is aware that if the Larne route were substituted letters would arrive at 10 o'clock; and about what time does he think it likely he will be able to arrive at a conclusion as to the Stranraer and Larne route?

*MR. RAIKES: I do not know the habits of the merchants of Belfast, but in any other town letters arriving at half-past 11 would find a merchant in his office. The difference of time by the Larne route, as I am at present advised, is only about three-quarters of an hour, and, therefore, there is not a material difference in that respect. As soon as I have the data, I shall lose no time in arriving at a conclusion as to the respective merits of the two routes.

THE BRIDPORT MAIL.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the mail due to be delivered at Bridport at 10.30 a.m. missed twice during the week ending 11th October; whether this mail has frequently missed the connection at Bristol this year; and whether he will state to the House what means he has of preventing these irregularities?

*MR. RAIKES: The hon. Member's statement is quite correct, and I regret the irregularity should have occurred. The remedy lies in a more punctual arrival at Bristol of the mails from the North, and I am in communication with the Railway Companies concerned, with the view of securing this result. It is right, however, to say that delay sometimes arises from circumstances beyond their control.

THE EMIN RELIEF EXPEDITION.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether he has observed that several British subjects connected with the Emin Relief Expedition have admitted that they bought slaves in Africa, and that they flogged and killed the inhabitants of uncivilised countries in that continent; and whether it is intended to render them responsible to the laws which punish British subjects committing either of these offences?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I do not know to what British subjects or to what admissions the hon. Member particularly refers, but, so far as I know, there are no persons now within British jurisdiction who have admitted the commission of any of the offences referred to in the question. I need not remind the hon. Member that if any such offences can be proved the intervention of the Government is not necessary.

MR. LABOUCHERE: May I ask whether, in the case of gentlemen who are under British jurisdiction, who have admitted that they have killed or bought slaves, the hon. Gentleman will instruct the Public Prosecutor to prosecute? The hon. Gentleman says that anyone can prosecute, but what is everybody's business is nobody's business.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: Any statement made on the authority of the hon. Member I shall look into carefully, and have it fully inquired into. It is impossible, without knowing the authority for the statements, that I can undertake to prosecute. Admissions are not proof, and they must be supported by proper proof before a prosecution can be undertaken.

In answer to Mr. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM,

*SIR R. WEBSTER said these gentlemen had no commission whatever from Her Majesty's Government.

LAND PURCHASE IN IRELAND.

MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether in the event of the whole amount of money provided for loans to tenant-purchasers under the Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Bill being advanced (a) immediately after the passing of the Act; (b) within five years; or (c) within 10 years after the passing of the Act; each year's recoveries being continually re-lent, as provided by Clause 6 (3), he will state, in all three cases, the total amount of the normal annuities which will be due to Government from all the tenant-purchasers on the fortieth year of the operation of the Act, and the total amount of the Guarantee Fund for that year which will exist as security for the amount thus due; and if the result be to show a deficit in the Guarantee Fund on that year, as compared with the corresponding instalment of annuities which will be due on the same occasion, will he give the aggregate of all the annual deficits which will obtain during the whole 49 years under the same conditions?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): It would take some time to work out in detail the various calculations suggested in the question of the hon. Member; but as I understand that those calculations are suggested with a view of testing the financial soundness of the Government scheme, I may inform him that it is impossible that its security could be affected by any process of re-lending, for under no circumstances could the amount advanced exceed 25 years' purchase of the annual Imperial contribution, plus the actual amount of the Sinking Fund.

*MR. KEAY: As the matter is one of extreme importance, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman or the First Lord of the Treasury whether, if the Government have not been able to make a calculation, they will be good enough to examine one which I have prepared, and which is at present in the hands of right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench. The result of that calculation shows that there will be absolutely uncovered loans to the extent of £25,000,000 sterling.

*MR. MADDEN: I do not think the hon. Gentleman will expect me to express an opinion as to the result of a calculation which I have not seen. I can hardly set myself up as a Court of Appeal from the hon. Member upon such a question.

*MR. KEAY: It is a very important question, and the right hon. Gentleman must know that the Sinking Fund is the taxpayers' money and not a Guarantee Fund at all. May I ask him whether, if on examination he finds there is the large deficit I allege—[Cries of "Order!"]

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The question the hon. Gentleman is now putting is not a legitimate one.

MR. WALSH.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he is aware that Mr. Walsh, of the Cashel Sentinel, was sentenced to three months' imprisonment for conspiracy at Tipperary, and arrested instantly on conviction; that several days before he had been (on appeal) sentenced to two months' imprisonment for the publication of a speech in his newspaper; but that the police held over the warrant, commanding them to arrest him on the latter charge, in order to see what would be the result of the Tipperary prosecution; under what authority was this done; do the Government still hold over the warrant; under what statute do the police exercise this suspensory power; and what officer is responsible?

MR. MADDEN: The question of the hon. and learned Member appears to be founded on a misapprehension as to a matter of fact. He appears to assume that the warrant, after it was signed, was kept back by the authorities. This is not so. I am informed that Mr. Walsh did not appear when the appeal was called, that a certificate was given for the estreating of his recognisances, but that the warrant has not yet been signed.

IRISH LOTTERIES.

MR. GURDON (Norfolk, Mid): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to the number of advertisements of lotteries from Ireland, as well as abroad, which are being sent to our National schools; and whether he can prevent this practice?

*MR. RAIKES: My attention has been called to the transmission of advertisements of lotteries through the Post both from Ireland and abroad, but the Law does not, I am advised, empower me to ascertain the contents of closed packets which may contain such advertisements. As regards notices of this description conveyed in open covers, I am considering what course of action should and can be taken.

DEDUCTIONS FROM MEN'S EARNINGS.

MR. BURT (Morpeth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has had any correspondence with William Armstrong, an iron ore miner, of Moor Row, West Cumberland, complaining of the treatment he received from his employers, and the doctors who attended him after he received a serious accident in the mine; whether it is true, as stated by W. Armstrong in a letter addressed to the Home Secretary on the 21st of February, that the doctors are appointed by the mine owners, but "are paid by money deducted from the men's earnings, the workmen having neither voice nor choice in the matter;" whether he has any jurisdiction in a case of the kind; and, if so, whether he has inquired into the subject, and with what result; and if he has any objection to lay the correspondence upon the Table of the House?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: The answer to the first two paragraphs is in the affirmative. Mr. Armstrong has already been informed that this is not a matter in which the Secretary of State has any jurisdiction. Under these circumstances it is unnecessary to lay the Papers before Parliament.

THE DEATH OF MRS. PEEL.

*(4.15.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Mr. Deputy Speaker,—Sir, I feel sure that on the present occasion, whatever differences may exist in this House, there will be no difference of opinion as to the expression of the views and feelings of the House in desiring to convey to the Speaker the expression of their real and sincere sympathy with him in the sorrow which has befallen him during the last few hours. The House has been aware that the shadow of that great sorrow has prevented the Speaker from discharging his duties in the Chair during the last 10 days. All who know the Speaker are aware that only extreme necessity would have kept him from the discharge of those duties, and I am sure the House is unanimous in feeling that the Speaker was right in abstaining from coming into the Chair. I am sure that hon. Members would, if that were possible, individually have tendered their expression of sincere regard and sorrow that a man so loved by all his friends, and so valued in this House, should be so heavily afflicted. I know that on such an occasion as this words should be few, and that the voice of sympathy should be almost hushed. I do not wish to enlarge on the present occasion on the personal affliction that has befallen Mr. Speaker—that is a sacred matter for himself—but we can at least approach him, and say from our hearts that we are grieved, that we enter into his sorrow, and that we trust a sense of the performances of duties yet to come to the country and to this House will arouse him from the sorrow and affliction in which he is at present plunged, and that we shall be able to welcome him back to the Chair; a sad man, a man deprived of the comfort of his life, it may be, but a man ready to discharge the honourable duties which the country expects from him, and which this House thoroughly trusts him to fulfil. If I do not make any Motion it is because I thought it undesirable that we should say more than what I believe is the unanimous feeling of the House expressive of our sorrow at Mr. Speaker's deep affliction.

(4.17.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): Mr. Deputy Speaker, —Although the right hon. Gentleman has refrained, and I am disposed to think has wisely refrained, from submitting any actual Motion to the consideration of the House, and although he has not left me in point of form any defined province or function on the score of which I may appeal to the House for its indulgence, yet I think it my duty, presuming on its kind permission, to echo the words which have been so well spoken by the right hon. Gentleman. I feel sure, and I believe the entire House feels, that we are deeply interested in all that concerns the happiness of Mr. Speaker. The House of Commons is of necessity under great and increasing debt to Mr. Speaker. At all times the duties imposed upon that great officer of State have been duties of an arduous character, but they have of late years become such as to task to a degree altogether extraordinary most of the qualities which go to make up a powerful mind and a masculine character. I think, therefore, that we do well to discharge this growing obligation in expressing to Mr. Speaker our deep sympathy with him in his sorrow. Nor can I pass by that which the right hon. Gentleman has well said as to the value of his services. It is not for us to intrude into the sanctuary of private sorrow, nor to know what consequences may follow upon a visitation so heavy, but I believe the right hon. Gentleman has expressed the universal sense of the House when he has stated his wish and hope that we may still enjoy, and enjoy in spite of this great visitation, the valued services which Mr. Speaker performs to the public and to the House when he sits in the Chair. I, Sir, therefore, concur with the right hon. Gentleman in everything that he has said, and I believe that it will be the earnest hope of the House that while any expression of sympathy one can offer him must be well known to be a very inadequate medicine indeed for so severe a hurt, he may be favoured with every consolation that can be derived by man on these great occasions of life, whether from a human or from a higher source.

Return ordered—

"Showing, in respect of each Workhouse, Workhouse Infirmary, and Sick Asylum in England and Wales, the number of the beds in the wards for the sick; the average number of sick persons occupying those wards during the months of September, October, and November in the present year; the number of paid officers acting as nurses; and the number of such officers who, prior to their appointment by the guardians or managers, had received any training in nursing."—(Mr. Rathbone.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PURCHASE OF LAND AND CONGESTED DISTRICTS (IRELAND) BILL.

(No. 111.)

Order for Committee read.

(4.25.) MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have to rule that the Motion which stands in the name of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell)

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to reserve a head-rent for public purposes in all cases of purchase by State aid," is not in order.

(4.26.) SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): May I be allowed to amend it? [Cries of "Order!"]

(4.27.) MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee), in rising to move—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to divide the Bill into two Bills, and to consider first Part II., Congested Districts, and to report the same separately to the House," said: I ask the indulgence of the House while I explain the reasons which induce me to move this Instruction. The main object of this Bill is to commit the House and the country to an expenditure of £100,000,000 of public money upon a small section of Her Majesty's subjects. Notwithstanding the importance of the measure, it has by means of the closure been read a second time without a single word of debate being said upon its principle. I allude to that dramatic performance of Mr. Deputy Speaker, not for the purpose of complaining of it, but simply to ask that in future Her Majesty's Ministers, and particularly the President of the Board of Trade, abstain from making remarks in regard to the independence of the Chairman of Committees. I am precluded on the present occasion from discussing the principle of the Bill, but I wish to point out that the measure, which is divided into two distinct parts, should be divided into two separate Bills, and that the second one, which is of minor importance and is non-controversial, should be disposed of in the first place, leaving the first measure, which is of great importance and which involves many matters of controversy, to be discussed at a future time. So much for the machinery of the Bill. In the next place, I object to the form and shape in which the measure has been introduced. The first part comes before us in such a questionable shape that I think we ought not to be induced to accept it. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary has told us that he finds it easier to pass a short Bill than a long one, and he has consequently divided the original Bill into two parts, and has greatly condensed the clauses of each, the result being that whereas Bill No. 1 only contains 19 clauses, the corresponding portion of the Bill of last Session consisted of 40 clauses. The Chief Secretary seemed to think that this was a remarkable feat in legislative condensation; but I am afraid that the right hon. Gentleman has only made it easier for himself by making it much more difficult for the House. The right hon. Gentleman has described the measure as one which grafts the Land Purchase Scheme on the Ashbourne Act. What he has done has merely been to put the "new wine" of his own Land Purchase Bill into the "old bottles" of the Ashbourne Act. He has brought down the dimensions of his Bill by resorting to two devices, each of which is most objectionable in its character. In the first place, he has not taken care to express the terms of his proposals with sufficient directness; he has not put his meaning into plain, straightforward English, but has relied on references to previous Acts of Parliament. In the second place, he has devolved an immense portion of what ought to be the business of this House on outside authorities, or external officials, over whom the right hon. Gentleman may have control, but over whom we have none. The most important word in this measure is the word "prescribed," the meaning of which would seem to be that the work we ought to do is being turned over to clerks and officials. In point of fact, the main, broad result of what the Chief Secretary has done has been to make the Bill a chaos, perfectly unintelligible to the Members of this House. The measure professes to be one to provide further funds for the purchase of land in Ireland. I would respectfully invite the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland to the point I am about to submit to the House. I have been unable to discover in the whole of Part I. any direct grant of money for Stock at all. The only operative clause I can see in Part I. is the last part of Clause 1, which says that every advance for Land Purchase under the Bill shall be made on the issue of Guaranteed Land Stock, which shall be equivalent to the amount of the advance. Consequently, what is advanced under this measure is not a grant, and, in point of fact, I find nothing in the nature of a grant in Part I. Now, Sir, I think we have a right to complain that in so important a matter as this, involving as it does not merely the £33,000,000, which is the sum named by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, but in all probability £100,000,000, if not a much larger amount, we ought to have the text of the proposal placed before us in plain English, so that every Member of the House may know what is intended. I am not asserting that there may not be within the four corners of the Bill some obscure clause or provision that may not by human ingenuity be tortured or twisted into a grant of £33,000,000; but I do unhesitatingly say that, looking at the Bill as I have been enabled to understand it, I think hon. Members will fail to find anything in it in the shape of a grant beyond the £10,000,000 limit established by the Ashbourne Act. This, Sir, is the result produced by the condensing process of the right hon. Gentleman, who avowedly has resorted to that method to render his work easier than it would have been if he had stated his intentions in plain, straightforward English. I will give the House an example of the difficulty to which I have alluded. A great deal was said last Session about the Guarantee Fund, which we were told was a most essential feature of the old Bill and one of its most valuable securities. In the old Bill the provision as to the guarantee deposit occupied two pages of print, and was composed of some nine or ten sub-sections, carefully drawn, and although elaborate and not quite easy of comprehension yet calculated to carry out the purpose intended to be served. I wonder how many hon. Members can read this new Bill and be aware what parts of it have been copied from the elaborate provisions of the old Bill, especially those introducing the most important proposals as to security. The House will probably be very much surprised to hear that the guarantee deposit provided for in the old Bill has totally disappeared from the new. There is, in point of fact, no provision in regard to guaranteed deposit unless it is contained in the clause I am about to read.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: How does the hon. Member make this relevant to the Motion he has placed on the Paper?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I am contending that Part I. in its new shape is, in fact, so unintelligible that it would be more convenient to deal with Part II. first, so as to give time to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to re-cast Part I. I will, with your permission, read to the House a portion of the clause to which I have just referred. It sets forth that

"The issue of land stock to the prescribed counties shall be equivalent to the advance and payment of the purchase money and to the retention by the Land Commission of any sum as a guarantee deposit."

Surely this is a genuine triumph of Hibernian draughtsmanship, and I merely mention it as an example of the unsatisfactory state in which the question is left. The only other point I have to urge is this—that the Chief Secretary might be enabled under the Instruction I am moving to carry a little further the process he has begun. He has already subdivided the Bill and cast out of Part I. the provisions relating to the Land Department, and I ask him to carry the process further. The provisions relating to the Land Department are more closely connected with Part I. than Part II., which has special relation to the Congested Districts. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to follow out the lines he has already adopted; to leave out, for the present, the consideration of Part I., and proceed to Part II., as the more urgent portion of the measure. If he will only do this I am convinced that Part II can be got out of the way in a very few days—that, at any rate, it might be disposed of before Christmas. I for one, at any rate, should have no objection to sitting here until that is done. This part of the measure is, in my view, the uncontentionous portion, and having got rid of that part we might leave the other portion which is contentious to be dealt with after the adjournment. If the right hon. Gentleman refuses, I hold that we have no other alternative than to resist to the uttermost every one of the proposals he has made in Part I., and to do our best to prevent its passage. But whether the proposals in that portion of the Bill are good or bad, I maintain that they should be put before us in straightforward ordinary English, so that every hon. Member of this House may be enabled to understand them. For the reasons I have thus given, I now beg to move the Instruction that stands in my name.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to divide the Bill into two Bills, and to consider first Part II., Congested Districts, and to report the same separately to the House.”—(Mr. Edmund Robertson.)

(4.40.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I understand, Sir, that this Debate must be of a very limited character, and in the few remarks I have to make I desire to express the astonishment with which I have heard one of the statements of my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Robertson). The hon. Gentleman has mentioned the second part of the Bill, which deals with the congested districts, as being of a non-contentious character. I am very glad to hear him say so; but I would remind the House that last Session, when that which is the second part of this Bill was before us, it was declared by many hon. Members to be the most contentious portion of the measure. The hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), who, by the way, is, I think, a better authority on the Irish land question than the hon. Member for

Dundee, spoke against every clause of what is the second part of this Bill, and, so far from declaring that it was non-contentious, he strongly affirmed that it bristled with contentious points from beginning to end. As far as I am concerned, I really do not know what is a non-contentious measure. I do not believe that any Bill can be drawn on this subject that would be non-contentious, and, therefore, I must decline to accept the proposition of my hon. Friend that if the Chief Secretary gives way to his proposal the second part of the Bill can be passed in this House as a practically non-contentious measure. I do not intend to dispute the urgency of this portion of the Bill. Very far from it; but I assert that the problem we have to deal with in respect of the congested districts is one of the greatest problems that can be brought before Parliament. In these districts of Ireland you have, first of all, a poor soil; then you have small holdings; next you have a crowded population; you have also a defective system for the education of the people; and you have, furthermore, a passionate clinging to those patches of bog on which the people are located. When any hon. Member tells me that an attempt to solve a great problem like this, which has baffled the statesmanship of this country for generations, and has never once been fairly or squarely approached until the present moment, is a non-contentious effort, I am glad to hear him; but I should like to hear other hon. Members confirm that statement. I hope, most earnestly, that the second part of this Bill will be passed—that the whole Bill will be passed—and I am not disputing the responsibility which rests on this House in regard to it, especially at the present moment; but I wish to point out to the House that there is a sense in which the urgency spoken of does not attach to this question of the congested districts—a sense which will be appreciated by hon. Members. Where, I ask, does the trouble in regard to the land question come from? We hear a great deal every day, and we hear it with sorrow, about evictions; we hear about the police being employed at evictions; about the connection of the Royal Irish Constabulary with this question, and we hear it very frequently; but I would point out that the pressure does not come so much from the congested districts as from other parts of Ireland, thereby showing that although there may be urgency in the West of Ireland there is also urgency in other portions of the country. My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee seems to think that the small holdings are confined to the western districts, and an idea has got into the head of some people that the operations under the Land Purchase Acts have been mainly in favour of large occupiers. That is a total mistake. If anyone chooses to go to these estates which have been transferred from owner to occupier, and investigate the facts for himself, he will find that the majority are small occupiers and poor men, many of them as poor as those in the congested districts in the West of Ireland. There is, therefore, a necessity for dealing with these districts, and the Government have recognised it, and would be only anxious to meet it, were it not for the urgency of the other parts of Ireland. I do not think my hon. Friend is quite accurate in stating that those who have thousands of pounds will get thousands of pounds added to what they have. [Mr. ROBERTSON: Might.] That is another thing. But I do not believe even that is possible. What of the £5,000 farmer? He has not a large farm. The £5,000 farmer is not considered a large farmer in England and Scotland. The holders of large farms are, however, a very small class in Ireland. According to the Registrar General's Returns for 1880, the number of farmers holding farms of more than 200 acres in Ireland is comparatively small. It is not the large but the small farmers, the small occupiers, who make the model proprietors. I hope the Chief Secretary will resist the proposal of my hon. Friend. If the House is going to take the conduct of the Bill out of the hands of the Government, if the House is going to cut and carve as it likes, then I do not quite understand what will be the character of a measure which will come out of such a process as that. I think the Bill has been wisely drawn, though I still think mischief may result from its having been divided into two parts. However, since the Bill has been drawn in this way, upon a well-conceived plan, I hope the Government will stick to that plan, and that they will carry the Bill to a triumphant issue.

(4.50.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): The hon. Member for South Tyrone has challenged Members to say whether any unreasonable opposition will be given to Her Majesty's Government. If my humble assurance is anything to him, he is extremely welcome to it, and I can assure him that, so far as I am concerned, no such unreasonable opposition will be shown. On a former occasion, my hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone said he was convinced that too high prices would be given, or too much would be risked over this Land Purchase Bill, and that were it left to the counties and districts to be security no purchases would take place.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I did not say that. I was speaking on the question of local control, and I said that if the County Council or Local Authority had control over the sales, they would have the power either of influencing the price given—

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member will address himself to the Instruction.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I am aware that I am trespassing, but I was referring to what took place formerly in illustration of what I have now to say. The hon. Member has affirmed that localities have no faith in this Act being worked without giving a larger price for the land than would be given for it under any fair and reasonable business transaction. Although I sympathise largely with my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, I can see no great purpose that can be served now by taking the control of the Bill out of the hands of the Government, and I am, therefore, unable to support his proposition.

(4.54.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): Sir, I do not agree with my hon. Friend that the second part of this Bill is free from contentious matter. I think, on the contrary, that a strong argument for the Instruction is that it will raise the most important issues relating to the settlement of the land question. I look upon that part of the Bill referring to the congested districts with a less unfriendly spirit than upon the other portions of it, to which I am absolutely opposed in every way. As to the part dealing with congested districts,

I think it must be materially amended, and the Amendments, which are to be moved from this Bill, will test the sincerity of the intentions of the Chief Secretary as they found expression in his remarkable suggestion of a plebiscite to the districts of Ireland. That is a question of the first importance, and it is one on which the decision of the House ought to be taken at the earliest possible moment. With regard to the remainder of the Bill, the right hon. Gentleman has, of course, control over the big battalions, and, of course, will be able to carry it though we resist to the utmost. I cordially support the Instruction of my hon. Friend.

(4.57.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): Sir, we have heard from hon. Gentlemen opposite a clear recognition of the very great urgency of the question relating to congested districts, and we have also had indication of a disposition, which we on this side of the House welcome, to deal with this question in a non-contentious spirit. I would point out that there is one conclusive argument against the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman, namely, that it is impossible. He proposes that we should consider the congested districts scheme without having first considered Part I. The hon. and learned Gentleman ventures criticism of Hibernian drafting. If his Anglo-Saxon drafting is as bad as his criticism, I can only say that I prefer the worst drafting which I have seen in my native land. Has he read the Bill? If he has not, I say nothing. If he has, then has he not seen that the portions dealing with congested districts have special application to the whole land scheme, with suitable modifications. How has that fact escaped his notice? Has he not seen that one of the most important portions of the congested districts scheme has a special application to the whole land purchase scheme which is adapted with suitable modifications to the circumstances of congested districts?

(5.0.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I entirely sympathise with the hon. Member for Dundee, whose object is to strike out that part of the Bill which applies to non-congested districts, retaining that part of the Bill dealing with congested districts. I think it is certainly necessary to do something for the congested districts, but for the rest of Ireland it is not necessary to do anything at all. At present the tenants are extremely well off, and in an infinitely better position than the tenants of either England or Scotland. I see no reason, therefore, why the money of the taxpayers should be lavishly given in order to make the tenants of Ireland proprietors of their holdings. To my mind the tenants are already owners for all useful purposes. They do what they like with the land, and they can improve it by exercising their own industry. It is only a question of a word. In any other country but England they would be called the owners. It seems to me that in regard to land we must always have two values, one created by the industry of man, and the other—the unearned increment—given by God. Now, occupiers have a right to all property which is the result of their own industry. But they have no right to the unearned increment, which I contend ought to be devoted to State purposes. As regards the greater part of Ireland no one wants this Bill.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is now arguing the merits of Part I. of the Bill.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I confess I thought that it was competent to me to do so, as the object of the Instruction is to secure that the House shall have an opportunity of considering Part II. of the Bill, and, having disposed of it, be at liberty if it choose to reject Part I. I do submit that Part I. is altogether unnecessary.

Question put, and negatived.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday, 22nd January.

SEED POTATOES SUPPLY (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 53.)

(5.5.) Bill read a second time, and committed.

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 3.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): This clause is the same as that contained in the Bill of 1880. Subsequently to the passing of that Bill it became necessary to apply to the Treasury for an extension to four years. I hope the Treasury will be willing to grant a similar extension now if necessary.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I think the hon. and gallant Member will find that Clause 7 adequately meets his point.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5.

(5.9.) COLONEL NOLAN: On this clause I desire to move an Amendment which will enable the Guardians to sell seed to occupying owners. I think, unless some such provision is made, the Bill will fail to benefit many people who require the advantages of it.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 5, page 2, line 37, after "land," to insert "and to occupying owner."—agreed to.

(5.10.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): What provision is to be made by Government to control the sale of seed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My hon. Friend will see from Clause 11 that there are wide powers given to the Local Government Board, with the consent of the Lord Lieutenant, for making rules for the distribution of seed. I hope that the object aimed at will be adequately carried out.

(5.11.) MR. MACARTNEY: Seeing the progress which is being made with the Bill I do not wish to take up the time of the Committee, but I do desire to place on record my protest against seed being distributed except for cash payments.

(5.12.) COLONEL NOLAN: In the case of the ordinary Unions it is perfectly understood that the seed must be paid for, and no liability will, therefore, be incurred, but in the case of the five or six very poor Unions it would, I think, be very unwise to insert such a provision. My hon. Friend may rely on it that not a single penny will be wasted by Guardians under this Bill.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

(5.16.) COLONEL NOLAN: Would it not be desirable to insert a new clause showing what is to be taken as prima facie evidence of the delivery of seed? There have been many disputes raised on this point in the past, and much trouble has ensued, so that it would be as well to define the evidence in the Bill.

*(5.17.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I think that is met by Clause 11, which gives wide powers for the framing of rules and forms of receipts, which will be prima facie evidence.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: At any rate, we will confer with the hon. and gallant Member on the point before the Report stage is taken.

Bill reported: as amended, to be considered upon Monday next.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolution [4th December] reported.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

CLASS VII.—MISCELLANEOUS.

"That a sum, not exceeding £5,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1891, for certain Expenditure in connection with apprehended distress in Ireland."

*(5.21.) SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I should like to say one or two words on this question, as it is a subject to which I gave careful study a few winters ago. Yesterday the right hon. Gentleman stated that he intended to be guided by experience. In one most important matter he has been so guided. The winter of 1883-4 was the time when the question of not relaxing the ordinary operation of the Poor Law was fought out, and settled. It is true that it has once been disturbed since then; but the right hon. Gentleman has reverted to the right course, and I hope that matter is settled for ever. There is one other point upon which I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be guided by experience. In the famine of 1846, which was a much more serious matter than the distress in 1880, when relief works on an enormous scale was started, it was proved that relief works and improvements ought to be strictly separated. The right hon. Gentleman has two classes of relief works, one consisting of railways, and against these I have nothing to say. They are, in the truest sense, relief works, and as they will promote communication they are likely to prove of permanent benefit. But I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be most careful in setting on foot works which are taken in hand for the purpose of giving wages, for the experience of 1846 and of 1880 showed that such works completely demoralised the whole population of Ireland. They had to be given up, and relief in food substituted. In the present case relief works of reclamation and afforesting are to be set on foot in order to give wages. That is a most dangerous thing to do. The result of these relief works on a great scale during the great famine was described by one who had the most intimate personal experience of what occurred from first to last, and he stated that the attraction of wages from the public purse led to the abandonment of other works, and every description of industry participated in the relief; that landlords competed with each other in getting the names of their tenants on the lists, that masters dismissed their servants, and that the clergy insisted that their parishioners should be put on the works. The consequence was that the fisheries were deserted, and one could not get shoes patched or clothing mended, because the whole of the population was out on the roads. I see no reason why the same painful effects should not follow in the case of these works, although, of course, they will not be on so extensive a scale. I think the right hon. Gentleman, however, is alive to the danger; and if he looks back to the history of those days he will find that the danger is a very real one. In 1846 it was distinctly discovered that the naval and military officers and the engineers engaged in supervising the works, although strangers to the district, were able to distinguish between those people who required employment for the purposes of relief and those who might be better employed elsewhere. I hope that the relief works, which have been chosen with such care by the right hon. Gentleman, will prove of real service to the country; but I repeat that I trust he will stop them immediately it is found that they are having a demoralising tendency and substitute for them actual relief in food.

Sir George Trevelyan

(5.26.) COLONEL NOLAN: I think the case of 1846-47 absolutely differs from the present case, because in those years the relief works were on a gigantic scale, and those now projected are to be carried out in a very different manner. A better comparison is, I think, to be obtained in the year when the right hon. Gentleman who last spoke was Chief Secretary, and himself so well-managed some small relief works in Connemara and avoided all the difficulties against which he has warned the Chief Secretary. I have but one other observation to make. I would suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should arrange the work so that the minimum shall be done in the sowing season. I may also suggest that in the case of small towns of 4,000 or 5,000 inhabitants sanitary works should be included.

(5.28.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, I will consider the suggestions with regard to sanitary works, but I am afraid such works are not likely to give large employment to unskilled labour in proportion to their cost. It should also be borne in mind that it is the village labourer who suffers chiefly from the famine, and it may be anticipated that the starting of these railway and other works will give a stimulus to the trade of the small towns from which the labourers in those places will benefit. With regard to what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman, I acknowledge that he has not only himself had experience of the industrial condition of the West, but he has an hereditary claim to speak on the subject of Irish distress, since the late Sir Charles Trevelyan took a most distinguished part in the relief of the great famine. I can assure him I am fully alive to the dangers incident to these relief works. I admit that it will be extremely difficult to carry out the works without a certain amount of collateral abuse, but I will try to reduce it as much as possible by the precautions I propose to take. The Government, who are undertaking these works, will have absolute control over them with respect to the time that they shall take and the expenditure upon them, and care will be taken that the works which are undertaken shall be of a complete kind and shall avoid the extravagance, jobbery, and inutility which have marked those in the past. One of the first principles I have laid down to the officers in charge of the works is, that under no circumstances are the works to be allowed to interfere with any other form of industrial occupation whatever. Care will be taken to consider the point which has been raised—namely, the requirements of cultivation at the time of sowing potatoes in the spring. A certain amount of that, I believe, could be done by the men's family, but I shall take care that work shall be given at a time when it is really requisite. I thank the right hon. Gentleman again for the general approval he has given to the scheme, and also for the suggestions he has offered to me. I assure him I shall not forget their substance or their general tenour.

(5.31.) DR. COMMINS (Roscommon, S.): I wish to mention a work which I think could be most appropriately undertaken in pursuance of the right hon. Gentleman's relief operations. There has been for several years a great want of waterworks in the little town of Roscommon. Preparations are being made for bringing water from the Shannon, and I ask the right hon. Gentleman to communicate with the authorities of Roscommon on the subject. This is a work which would give employment to people who are likely to require it, and which would probably fall in with the Chief Secretary's view with respect to relief work.

(5.32.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I hope the Chief Secretary will at once accept the suggestion made by my hon. Friend (Dr. Commins). The House is in a sympathetic humour; if the right hon. Gentleman asked for a million sterling I believe he would get it. If he would only give something to each Irish Member for each constituency he would strike a deadly blow at Home Rule.

Resolution agreed to.

THE CASE OF WALTER HARGAN.

On the Motion for adjournment,

*(5.33.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I think the feeling of the House is in favour of an immediate adjournment. Last night we agreed that no business except Government Business should be taken this evening. I see that my right hon. Friend (Mr.

J. Lowther) has a Motion on the Paper, but this is hardly an occasion in which to discuss a Motion of that character. I therefore beg to move that the House do now adjourn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I have the following Motion on the Paper:—

"To call the attention of the House to the grave miscarriage of justice in the case of Walter Hargan, who is undergoing a sentence of 20 years' penal servitude for defending his own life; and to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that She will be graciously pleased to direct that a free pardon be granted to Walter Hargan."

and I must own the Motion of my right hon. Friend the leader of the House is of a most unusual and scarcely decent character. The other day a Motion was made asking private Members to give up their privileges. I was under the impression at the time that my right hon. Friend had no wish unduly to interfere with the rights of private Members, except in so far as it was necessary to do so in order to effect the object which the Government had in view—namely, the despatch of urgent business. The Resolution which stands in my name as an Amendment to the Order of Supply relates to a subject which has aroused a great deal of interest. It is now only 25 minutes to 6 o'clock, and there is ample time to discuss this matter without interfering unduly with those social functions which, no doubt, at this hour are uppermost in the minds of some hon. Members. My right hon. Friend will be committing an outrage upon the rights of the House at large if he insists upon the Motion for Adjournment, and will be showing that the only object of the Government in making their Motion the other day is to strangle the privileges of private Members. I shall certainly object to the Motion for Adjournment.

(5.38.) COLONEL DAWNAY (York, N.R., Thirsk): I earnestly appeal to the leader of the House to re-consider his decision as to the adjournment of the House. A great many Members take a very serious interest in the question which my right hon. Friend wishes to bring forward. He may not have another opportunity this Session of bringing the matter forward.

*MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I withdrew the Motion which stood in my name in order to give the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Lowther) an opportunity of introducing his, and, therefore, for what it is worth, venture to add my appeal to his. While I am on my feet, I should like to draw the attention of the leader of the House to an answer given earlier in the day by the Under Secretary of State for India (Sir J. Gorst), because unless by Monday some attention is paid to the matter, it may be my duty to raise a debate in a way which would be unpleasant to all of us.

(5.40.) MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government are not at the present moment in a position to discuss the subject of my right hon. Friend's Resolution. The matter is now receiving the most serious consideration of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. The House, I am sure, will feel that in these circumstances the Government cannot fitly discuss this grave subject, which concerns the administration of justice and the exercise of the prerogatives of mercy by the Crown. My right hon. Friend has assured me that he is weighing carefully all the circumstances of the case. Could it be right to debate in this House a matter which, in his quasi-judicial capacity, the Home Secretary is still considering with a full sense of his responsibility? It would certainly not be in accordance with precedent to force on a Debate before the Secretary of State, the officer responsible to the Crown, has had full opportunity of forming a definite judgment.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: The right hon. Gentleman has taken no notice of the other point put to him.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will undertake to communicate with my right hon. Friend on the subject.

MR. J. LOWTHER: With the indulgence of the House, I would say that this is a subject which in no way concerns myself specially, but it is one which involves the liberty of the subject. I shall certainly not waive my present opportunity of bringing it forward unless the right hon. Gentleman assures me that when Parliament re-assembles after Christmas I shall be placed in as good a position as I occupy now for drawing attention to the matter. If I am assured that my Motion will be given the first place on the Paper on some afternoon soon after the re-assembling of the House I shall be satisfied.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I cannot give my right hon. Friend an assurance of that character. I can only assure him that the Secretary of State will give full consideration to all the facts of the case.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Will the Government give me a day?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I cannot undertake to do that. My right hon. Friend will be able himself to find a way to bring the matter forward.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I shall take the sense of the House.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): May I point out that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Lowther) has the matter entirely in his own hands. If he wants an early day for a Debate on this important subject, in which a large number of Members are undoubtedly interested, he will be able to secure the opportunity by a Motion for the Adjournment of the House. I can only say that if my right hon. Friend should see fit to give way to the appeal made to him by the leader of the House, I would certainly support him on a subsequent occasion in a Motion for an Adjournment of the House.

MR. J. LOWTHER: On a point of Order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, am I to understand it would be within my power to bring the subject forward on a Motion for Adjournment as an urgent matter of definite public importance?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: That would be for the occupant of the Chair to settle, but I think there are examples warranting the belief that the right hon. Gentleman would be able to take that course.

MR. J. LOWTHER: Under these circumstances I shall give way, but I shall raise the question on an early day after the re-assembling of Parliament.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, till Monday next.

Colonel Dawson

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 8th December, 1890.

SAT FIRST.

The Earl Cairns, after the death of his brother.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I rise to ask the noble Marquess whether he will be good enough to state to the House the course of business he proposes?

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): It is very important that two Bills for the relief of distress in Ireland should receive the Royal Assent before the House separates, and, therefore, we propose to meet early to-morrow in order to complete the necessary stages before the Royal Commission in the evening. We propose then to adjourn to the 22nd of January, except, of course, for legal business.

THE PORTUGUESE AND ENGLISH IN AFRICA.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

EARL GRANVILLE: There is a question I should like to put to the noble Marquess. It is, whether he can give us any further information than that which has appeared in the newspapers with regard to the incident connected with Colonel Andrade—the reported hauling down of the British flag by the Portuguese in Africa?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I am afraid I can give no information which would be of any use. The Portuguese and the English accounts appear to differ considerably, as far as we can gather from the imperfect and somewhat obscure telegrams. I prefer, therefore, not to say anything until we have received information by despatch.

THE EDUCATION CODE.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD NORTON: I beg to ask the noble Lord the President of the Council at VOL CCCXLIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

what date it is likely that the Education Code will be laid on the Table when the House meets again after the adjournment, whether it will be before Easter or later?

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My Lords, my noble Friend had not given me any notice of this question, so that I cannot answer it very particularly; but I have no reason to suppose there will be any cause for delay in laying the Code on the Table, and I have no doubt it will be done as early as he can wish.

CHILDREN'S LIFE INSURANCE BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the law relating to insurances on the lives of children—Was presented by the Earl of Harrowby (for the Lord Bishop of Peterborough); read 1st; to be printed; and to be read 2^d on Thursday, the 22nd of January next. (No. 16.)

TRANSFER OF RAILWAYS (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 15.)

Read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House; Standing Orders Nos. XXXIX. and XLV. considered (according to order), and dispensed with.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into Committee; agreed to.

House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 17.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I propose to omit, in Clause 17, all after the words "promoters shall be aided by a capital sum out of public money," and to make the clause read thus:—

"Where the Treasury in pursuance of the Light Railways (Ireland) Act, 1889, have agreed with the promoters of any light railway that the undertaking of the promoters shall be aided by a capital sum out of public money, the promoters, before the arbitrator has framed his draft award, may enter upon any land which they are authorised to take, on depositing in the Bank of Ireland such sum as may be certified to be proper by such valuer as may be appointed for the purpose by the Commissioners of Public Works, and the Treasury on the request of the promoters shall cause to be paid into the Bank, out of such capital sum, any sum required to be deposited in the Bank for the above purpose, and the Railways Acts (Ireland), 1851 and 1860, and the Acts amending the same, shall, as amended by this section, apply accordingly."

I may mention that the object of the Amendment is to harmonise the Bill with Irish legislation. The draftsman has apparently taken the analogy of the Lands Clauses Act of England, and has made the machinery of that Act apply to the Bill. He seems to have forgotten that the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act for Ireland is a totally different measure, and that its machinery is different, and the effect of my Amendment is to restore the Bill to a form which will make it in harmony with the Irish legislation.

Amendment agreed to; the Report thereof received; Bill read 3^a with the Amendments, and passed, and returned to the Commons.

HARES PRESERVATION BILL [H.L.]
(No. 4.)

House in Committee (according to order): Bill reported without amendment: Amendments made; and Bill to be read 3^a to-morrow.

[H.L.]—(No. 8.)

House in Committee (according to order): Bill reported without amendment; and to be read 3^a to-morrow.

DURATION OF SPEECHES IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS BILL [H.L.]—(No. 14.)
SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD DENMAN: My Lords, this is the third time I have brought forward a Bill on this subject. On the first occasion I presumed to include the House of Commons, but on consideration I thought it was better that I should not attempt to dictate to another branch of the Legislature the adoption of that which should be approved of in this House. I happen to know that there is a Bill pressing forward in another place, and I believe that the author of that Bill would be perfectly ready to support any measure which your Lordships approved of. In the case of procedure a great deal has been done in this direction, and full latitude was given to Privy Counsellors to speak for an unlimited time; but certainly that does not seem to me to tend to the rapid transaction of business. I think that the substitution of an hour-glass for regulating time would be an improvement. It certainly would be less offensive than to have a bell sounding in your Lordships' ears. I have no other wish on the subject than to provide for the transaction of Public Business being less clogged than it has often been hitherto. I would venture to remind your Lordships that in 1831 Mr. Stanley brought forward a Bill upon the subject. The only person who opposed it was Mr. Shaw, the Recorder of Dublin. He divided the House 17 times, and although it was a Wednesday Sitting, the House sat on until an early hour in the morning. I wish to see everything go smoothly, and I will do my best to facilitate the fair and proper consideration of Public Business.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Denman.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I think, perhaps, we had better reserve our energies for more urgent and serious grievances than this, and that we need not consider a proposal of this kind until the Debates in your Lordships' House assume such a character as to render it necessary. Any person who is not content with the speed at which your Lordships transact business in this House and who complains of the duration of time which you devote to it in making speeches must, indeed, be very hard to please. I think that whenever the speeches in this House come to be of the model referred to by the noble Lord, when a speaker carried on his speech until 1 o'clock in the morning, your Lordships may very well undertake some such reform as this; but until that condition of things comes about, we had better do without this legislation. I am compelled to make the unusual Motion, that this Bill be read a second time this day ten months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day ten months.")—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

On Question whether ("now") shall stand part of the Motion, resolved in the negative.

Bill to be read 2^a this day ten months.

SEED POTATOES SUPPLY (IRELAND) BILL.

BROUGHT FROM THE COMMONS.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN): In asking your Lordships to give a First Reading to this Bill, which is one of the two measures for the relief of distress in Ireland to which the Prime Minister alluded at an earlier stage of the proceedings, perhaps I may be allowed to say that its object is to enable the poorer occupiers in various districts in Ireland to obtain seed potatoes at a reasonable price. The provisions of the Bill are very similar to those of the Seed Supply Act which was passed in 1880. Its general object is to secure that there shall be a proper supply of seed potatoes for next year's crop brought to the doors of the poorer occupiers in those districts where, at present, it would be very difficult to obtain it. For this purpose different Boards of Guardians are empowered to apply to the Local Government Board for loans in any division of a Poor Law Union where such a state of things exists, and where it would be impossible for the inhabitants to retain seed potatoes because they will have to eat all the potatoes of which they are now possessed. If the Local Government Board approves, the loan will be made on the security of the poor's rate of the division, and will be repayable by half-yearly payments during 1892 and 1893, but the interest is to be payable out of the Irish Church Temporalities Fund. The main objects of the Bill are that seed potatoes shall be brought to the doors of the poorer occupiers, that they will obtain that supply at cost price, that they will have two years' credit, during which time they will make payment to the Board of Guardians for the potatoes they have bought, and the middleman will thus be got rid of. I hope your Lordships will allow me to give notice of a Motion to suspend Standing Order No. XXXIX., in order that this Bill may be passed through its remaining stages at an early Sitting to-morrow.

Bill read 1st; and to be read 2nd to-morrow; and Standing Orders Nos. XXXIX. and XLV. to be considered in order to their being dispensed with.

FISHERY BOARD (SCOTLAND) BILL.

*THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (The Marquess of LOTHIAN): I have to ask your Lordships to allow me to introduce a Bill entitled—

"An Act to alter the Constitution of the Fishery Board for Scotland, and to amend the laws in respect of the mussel fisheries in Scotland."

I had hoped your Lordships would have passed the Bill before the Recess, but circumstances over which we had no control prevented that. I have now, therefore, only to ask your Lordships to read the Bill a first time.

A Bill to alter the Constitution of the Fishery Board for Scotland, and to amend the law in regard to mussel fisheries in Scotland— Was presented by the Lord Ker (M. Lothian); read 1st; and to be printed. (No. 17.)

CUSTODY OF CHILDREN BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the law relating to the custody of children — Was presented by the Lord Chancellor; read 1st; and to be printed. (No. 18.)

House adjourned at a quarter before Five o'clock, till to-morrow,
half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 8th December, 1890.

MR. SPEAKER'S CONTINUED ABSENCE.

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House that Mr. Speaker was again unavoidably prevented from taking the Chair of the House this day.

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

NEW WRIT.

For Kilkenny County (Northern Division), v. Edward Mulhallen Marum, esquire, deceased.

QUESTIONS.

THE TIPPERARY PROSECUTIONS.

MR. J. M'CARTHY (Londonderry): I beg to give notice that as soon as possible after the re-assembling of the House next year I shall call attention to the circumstances connected with the prosecution of Mr. Dillon and Mr. W. O'Brien, and move a Resolution.

At a subsequent stage,

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said: I wish to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether, in view of the notice given by the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. J. M'Carthy) that he will take the earliest opportunity to review the proceedings at New Tipperary, he will lay upon the Table the Judgment given by Baron Palles in the case of Mr. O'Brien Dalton?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, Sir; if there is, as I have reason to believe that there is, an authentic copy of that Judgment in existence, I shall be happy to lay it upon the Table of the House.

THE NAVAL RESERVE.

DR. R. M'DONALD (Ross & Cromarty): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that the Chief Officer in charge of the Naval Reserve men in Stornoway employs these men in rowing visitors to Stornoway Castle round the harbour there, preparing and decorating their drill shed for over a week for a friend's marriage, and using rockets the property of the Admiralty to celebrate the same, and, generally speaking, often requisitions the labours of the Reserve men for his own private purposes in his house and elsewhere; and whether the employment by an officer of Naval Reserve men for private purposes is in accordance with the regulations of the Admiralty?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): I have called for a Report on the allegations made by the hon. Gentleman from which it appears that the Chief Officer in charge of Naval Reserve men at Stornoway is not in the habit, as suggested, of employing these men to row visitors to Stornoway Castle round the harbour. It is true that one lady who was staying at the Castle was on several occasions rowed by Coastguard men at a time when they had no duty to perform. As regards the drill shed, it was lent for one evening for a private entertainment, and a few flags and evergreens were put up by the Coastguard during the evening. Steps will be taken to prevent a recurrence of this irregularity. The rockets used on the occasion in question were private property. There is no foundation for the suggestion that the Chief Officer employs the Naval Reserve men for private purposes.

THE MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, under "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854," if a seaman has been seriously injured in the execution of his duty on board his ship, the master of the vessel may land him at a distant foreign port, the owners can immediately stop the wife's half-pay, and their obligation to pay the disabled seaman's wages ceases from the date he is put on shore; whether, if a vessel is lost at sea and all hands perish, the widows and children, or other representatives of the crew, are only paid wages up to the supposed time of the loss of the ship, although the owners, who have insured their freight, recover the whole sum as if the voyage had been completed; and whether, if such cases can and do frequently occur under the present state of the law, he will propose Amendments on the Merchant Shipping Act containing more humane and equitable provisions with reference to the payment of seamen's wages?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The answer to the first question is "Yes;" but it should be added that, if any seaman receives any hurt or injury in the service of the ship to which he belongs, the expense of providing the necessary surgical and medical advice, with attendance and medicines, and of his subsistence until he is cured, or dies, or is brought back to some port in the United Kingdom, if shipped in the United Kingdom, or if shipped in some British Possession to some port in such Possession, and of his conveyance to such port, and the expense (if any) of his burial, shall be defrayed by the owner of such ship, without any deduction on that account from the wages of such seaman. The answer to the second question is also "Yes;" the wages do not accrue after the termination of the service through wreck—see Section 185 of "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854." The insurance of freight is not in any way regulated by this provision. The extension of the Employers' Liability to Seamen contemplated by the Bill of last Session would, of course, provide for further compensation from owners to men injured in their service.

SCOTCH CORN MILLS.

DR. R. McDONALD: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he will be good enough to say what is the state of the Common Law in Scotland in reference to the provision and up-keep of corn mills by the landlords in country districts; and whether, when such mills have been in existence from time immemorial, and have been accidentally destroyed by fire or otherwise, it is incumbent on the landlords to have them restored for the use of the occupiers of the soil?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I am sure the hon. Gentleman intends the first part of his question to be introductory to the second, and does not desire me to inflict on the House any general exposition of the law. In the ordinary case, and apart from special conditions or speculations, I am not aware of any Common Law obligation on the proprietors of corn mills which have been accidentally destroyed by fire or otherwise to have them restored.

CENTRAL POST OFFICE ACCOMMODATION.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I had intended to ask the Postmaster General if he can explain why it is that in London, Manchester, Birmingham, Newcastle, and other large towns, adequate and extensive buildings have been erected at the public expense for Central Post Office accommodation, but that in Liverpool, the second largest commercial city in England, the Central Post Office has been lodged in buildings designed and erected to serve as a Custom House; and whether, with a view to providing adequate accommodation for the large postal business necessarily transacted in Liverpool, and securing better sanitary conditions for the numerous employés, any further steps have been taken towards providing Liverpool with adequate Central Post Office buildings, but I beg to defer the question?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): New head post offices have been erected within the last few years at Manchester, Birmingham, and other towns where the exigencies of the Public Service have showed conclusively that nothing less would suffice. But it is not certain that such is the case at Liverpool, where large expenditure has been incurred for the purpose of decentralising the post office business. The building in which the business of the Head Post Office has been conducted for many years was not designed solely for a Custom House, and there is room to conceive that the allegations of insalubrity may be exaggerated; but additional accommodation is admittedly required, and by my directions a special inquiry is now being made into the whole subject.

BIBLE CLASSES.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Invernessshire): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the Post Office regulations permit of outsiders holding Bible classes, prayer and temperance meetings, and such like, within those rooms appropriated for dining rooms or reading rooms in the larger post offices?

*MR. RAIKES: There are no Post Office Regulations on the subject to which the hon. Member calls attention. The practice has been to allow officers of the Department desiring such facilities the use of rooms which could conveniently be employed for any objects of a beneficial character in which the staff might happen to be interested. The participation in such meetings of persons not officially connected with the Service is invariably conditional upon the consent of the proper authorities, who also exercise due care that there is no interference with the right use and enjoyment of the rooms by other members of the staff.

TELEPHONES.

D^r. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in view of the fact that the patent for the telephone in use by the company which possesses a practical monopoly of telephonic communication in Great Britain has now expired, and in view of the numerous complaints on the part of the public as to high rates and faulty service resulting from that monopoly, he will, with as little delay as possible, make known his decision as to applications for licences submitted to the Post Office by proposed competitors desiring to introduce loud speaking and long distance telephones, and other forms of improved instruments?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member I have to say that I trust that I may be able at an early date to announce the decision of the Government with regard to licences for Telephone Exchanges. It should be borne in mind that the patents for the more important telephones have not expired and do not expire until July in next year.

RATE OF EXCHANGE IN INDIA.

MR. HOYLE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if he will state what was the estimated rate of exchange made by the Finance Minister for India for the year 1890-91; what has been the lowest rate, and what the highest rate realised during the current year; and what is the total amount realised in excess of the estimate in tens of rupees and in pounds sterling, up to the present time?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The estimated rate of exchange for 1890-91 was 16·552 pence per rupee. The lowest rate realised during the year has been 17 1-16d.; the highest 20 15-16d. The excess over the estimate is £995,063.

MILITARY STORES.

*MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, in reference to an answer which was given by the Under Secretary for India on Friday, and the undertaking which he gave on the 22nd of July last, whether he can now state that anything has been done in pursuance of that undertaking?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The hon. Gentleman is fully entitled to ask this question. The Government have taken steps to bring about a settlement, and they have every reason to believe that a conclusion will be arrived at before the re-assembling of Parliament.

THE DISCHARGED POSTMEN.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Postmaster General when and by whom the inquiries were made into the characters of the 57 discharged postmen who had been in the Service from three to 30 years; and whether their characters were found to be satisfactory in every respect; and, if so, when does he intend to reinstate them, considering they have been out of employment since last June?

*MR. RAIKES: The inquiries were made by myself in those quarters in which alone authentic information could be obtained. Many of the dismissed postmen bore good characters; but, having regard to the extreme gravity of their offence—an offence as grave as any that a public servant can commit—and the imperative necessity of discouraging any similar misconduct in future, I regret that I do not feel justified in holding out any hope that they can again be employed by the Department. If the hon. Member will refer to the answer given by me to him on July 14th last, he will see that I then intimated that considerations of the public interest must govern my decision in these cases.

MR. W. ISAACSON: Owing to the very unsatisfactory answer I have received from the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to give notice that I will call attention to the subject on the Post Office Estimate.

BLAENLLECHA POST OFFICE.

MR. ALFRED THOMAS (Glamorgan, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that, from the 28th of October last, no Post Office Orders or Postal Orders have been issued, and that the Savings Bank has been closed since that date at the Blaenllecha Post Office, to the serious inconvenience of the inhabitants of that populous district?

*MR. RAIKES: The re-opening of the Blaenllecha Post Office will take place as soon as a suitable person for the appointment of sub-Postmaster can be selected and instructed in the duties of the office. I hope to be able to effect this in the course of the present week.

THE CROZET ISLANDS.

MR. LENG: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, as more than one British vessel has been missing recently between the Cape of Good Hope and Australia, and it is probable their crews may have landed on the Crozet Islands, there is any reason why one of the nine ships in the service of Her Majesty at present in commission on the Cape of Good Hope and West African Stations, should not, for the satisfaction of the friends of the crews of the missing ships, periodically visit those islands, in the hope of rescuing seamen who may have landed upon them?

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: If the hon. Member will refer to the Correspondence presented to the House of Commons in June, 1876, and May, 1877, he will see that a visit to these islands can only be undertaken at considerable risk. There is no vessel on the Cape station able to steam the long distance (nearly 4,000 miles) involved, without coaling. There is at present no sufficient evidence to show that the crews of the missing vessels are at the Crozet Islands, and in the absence of such evidence Her Majesty's Government do not feel justified in ordering a vessel to undertake the onerous duty suggested.

SALE OF CROWN PROPERTY IN WALES.

MR. ALFRED THOMAS: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury with respect to the following sales that have been made of Crown property in Wales between 1849 and 1888: (a) lands, foreshores, and rights of the value of £85,535; (b) encroachments on waste lands, £30,236; (c) fee-farm and other unimprovable rents of the value of £34,346, whether it is part of the policy of the Commissioner of Woods and Forests to sell foreshores in Wales, and whether the inhabitants of the districts where the foreshores are situate are consulted previously to each sale; whether in many of the cases where fee-farm rents are sold there is some reversion belonging to the Crown under 34 and 35 Henry VIII, c. 20, or otherwise, and whether records are kept of all cases where there is such a reversion; and whether the Commissioner of Woods and Forests will henceforth abstain from all sales of land in Wales except for public purposes?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): As regards the Crown foreshores in Wales which remain under the management of the Commissioner of Woods, the policy of the Commissioner is rather against the sale of them, excepting to public bodies or when they are required for the execution of expensive works of improvement. It is the practice to consult the ex adverso proprietors before disposing of foreshore, unless taken under Act of Parliament. It is not supposed that there are many cases where fee-farm rents are sold in which there is any reversion belonging to the Crown under 34 and 35 Henry VIII, c. 20, or otherwise. The sale of the fee-farm rent would not extinguish the reversion. A record is kept of such cases as are known. I am unable to give an undertaking that the Commissioner of Woods will henceforth abstain from all sales of land in Wales except for public purposes.

PRISON CLERKS.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to a question put to him on 30th June last, whether he can now communicate to the House the terms of the Report of the Departmental Committee, appointed so long ago as April, 1886, to inquire into the complaints of the Clerks in Her Majesty's Prisons?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): It is not usual to lay on the Table of the House the Report of a Departmental Committee on such a subject as that of the complaints of the Clerks in Her Majesty's Prisons, such a Report being of a confidential character. But I am able to inform the hon. Member that, with the approval of the Treasury, I have been able to sanction an increase in the scale of pay, and a large addition to the number of the highest grade of Clerks and Storekeepers in Her Majesty's Prisons, by which a considerable improvement will be made in their position. I shall have no objection to laying on the Table of the House a statement of the changes that have been made if it is wished.

MERCHANDISE MARKS.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether Her Majesty's Government have taken, or will take, any steps to give effect to the recommendation of the Select Committee on Merchandise Marks to make the Customs' entry trade description under the Act?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am carefully considering the best way of giving effect to the recommendations of the Select Committee on the Merchandise Marks Act, and I hope at an early date to be able to announce to the House the result of that consideration.

LATIMER ROAD BOARD SCHOOL.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that on 1st December a portion of the ceiling of one of the rooms of the Latimer Road Board School fell down suddenly, injuring some of the children; whether further examination has shown other portions of the building to be dangerous to the lives of the poor children compelled to attend there; whether the Education Department will, in consultation with the London School Board, take steps to fix the responsibility for such dangerous condition of school buildings on someone; and what steps, if any, are being taken to protect the lives of the Board school children from such dangers in the future?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (SIR W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The Department have no official information on the subject, though I believe the facts are as stated in the first part of the question. The duty of the Department is limited to ascertaining whether the school is in proper repair before the annual grant is made to it, but the responsibility for its actual condition rests entirely with the London School Board.

ARMY MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can now inform the House what answer he has given, or intends to give, to the British Medical Association and the various medical corporations and medical schools who recently memorialised him by deputation, and otherwise, with reference to proposed changes in the Army Medical Department?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I think the hon. Member will agree that my answer ought to be addressed to the deputation which waited on me, and I will undertake to give it in January.

HOUSE OF COMMONS SESSIONAL PAPERS.

MR. KNOWLES (Salford, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can arrange that the Annual Index of the Sessional Papers of the House of Commons shall be so compiled as to include year by year references to all Papers published since the preceding Decennial Index?

MR. JACKSON: I have not been able to obtain the information that would enable me to answer the question. I therefore hope that the hon. Member will repeat it.

POSTMASTER AT ABERAMAN.

MR. DAVID THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil), who had on the Paper a question to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been drawn to the great inconvenience caused to the public at Aberaman by the delay in filling the office of postmaster there; if he will state the reason for the delay; and when an appointment will be made, said that since the question had been placed on the Paper the appointment to which it had referred had been made.

PAY OF THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Slough, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if the details of the alterations as to pay and classes in the Metropolitan Police Force, appearing in the Times of 5th December, is accurate, and, in such case, why it is not proposed to extend to the officers of the Criminal Investigation Department the increased benefits accruing to the uniform branch, having regard especially to their skilfully performed and onerous duties, and their subjection to many expenses which are not recoverable; and if it is intended in any way to endeavour to meet the extra cost of lodgings in the inner divisions compared to the outer districts?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have not compared the statements which have appeared without authority in the Press with the scheme which I have recently sanctioned, and which in due course I have undertaken to lay on the Table of the House. The scheme applies to all constables alike, whether in the uniform force or in the Criminal Investigation Department. The pay of the higher officers of that Department is on a different footing from the rest of the force, and has been constantly revised up to quite recent dates, and the scheme does not apply to them. Every effort has been made to arrive at some satisfactory method of dealing with the lodging question separately, but no working arrangement has been found possible.

BIRMINGHAM POST OFFICE.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether his attention has been called to the fact that the plastering work of the new Birmingham Post Office has been sub-let to a man of the name of Welling; whether information had been submitted to the Office of Works of the very extensive system of adulteration of the materials used that has taken place; whether the Board of Works acknowledged by letter, dated 10th September, 1890, that the statements made in regard to the adulteration were substantially correct, and whether, in spite of this condemnation, Welling has been allowed to continue to work and to commence the front block; whether he is aware that the Clerk of the Works has given orders that no plasterer was to be employed on the job who had worked there previous to the complaint made of the adulteration of the materials; and whether he will inquire into the circumstances of the case?

*THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): The plastering work at the new Birmingham Post Office was sub-let to Mr. Welling by the contractor, with the consent of the Board. In July last the attention of the Clerk of Works was called to the fact that the work in certain places, but by no means generally, was not being done in accordance with the specification, the cement being mixed with putty. The circumstances were fully investigated by the Board's Surveyor (the architect of the building), and he considered that it was not proved that Mr. Welling was aware of the adulteration. There is no doubt that there was a strong local feeling against Mr. Welling, and being unable to determine on what side the fault lay, the Board did not feel justified in inflicting on him the heavy loss that would have been entailed on him by the withdrawal of the work from him in the middle of his contract. The job, on the whole, has been very well done, and the defects referred to were promptly remedied by Mr. Welling. In view of the strong feeling that has been excited by the case, the Clerk of Works has objected to the continued employment of the men who were shown to have taken part in the adulteration, but not of others. The case has already been very fully investigated, and further inquiry seems unnecessary.

CASE OF CATHERINE HARDWICK.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can now state his decision in the case of Catherine Hardwick?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have ascertained that the Magistrates are prepared in this case to give time for the payment of the fine, which has not yet been demanded, and will not be applied for till the girl is restored to health. I will take care that the girl is not subjected to imprisonment so long as she is unfit to bear it; but I do not propose, under these circumstances, to interfere further with the decision of the Magistrates.

THE EDUCATION CODE.

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, when revising the Code for the ensuing year, he will take into kind and favourable consideration the following points, in addition to the benefits conferred by the present Code, namely, the substitution of a single fixed grant to infant schools for the alternative grants of 9s. or 7s. and the variable grants for needlework and singing; the simplification of the grants under Article 101 by substituting one fixed grant for the principal grant of 14s. or 12s. and the various grants for discipline, needlework, singing, and class subjects; the modification of the existing distinction between "trained" and "untrained" teachers by substituting the term "independently trained" for "untrained" or by some other means?

SIR W. HART DYKE: My hon. Friend must be aware that I am always prepared to give a kindly consideration to any proposal which emanates from him, but he can hardly expect me, before the Code has been in operation three months, to undertake to introduce changes entirely eliminating the variable element from the grant at the risk of reducing all schools to one dead level of minimum efficiency. The modification asked for in the last part of the question has already been made, and the term "untrained" will no longer be found in the Code.

IRELAND—LOANS FOR DRAINAGE.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Mayo, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a copy of a Resolution from the Magistrates and cesspayers of the Costello barony, assembled at Presentment Sessions at Ballyhaunis, 25th November, 1890, requesting the Government to institute and grant loans for drainage and other works, and thus give employment to the labouring classes of the district, who are suffering owing to the failure of the potato crop; whether he has considered the matter of this Resolution; and what he proposes to do to prevent the awful consequences which must ensue if action to meet the emergency be not promptly taken?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The hon. Gentleman is probably aware that I indicated to a Committee of this House on Thursday last that the Government intend to offer loans for relief works. The Memorial referred to by the hon. Member has been received, and as, in all other cases, will be considered.

THE PROPOSED IRISH LIGHT RAILWAYS.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will have the course of the proposed new railways marked upon a large scale map of Ireland and placed in the Tea Room?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe that the suggestion is a good one, and I will endeavour to carry it out.

RELIEF WORKS IN CLARE.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state what works for the relief of distress he contemplates carrying out in County Clare?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think that, pending the discussion which is to take place in the House, it would be desirable or convenient to make a statement. I have nothing to add to the statement which I made on Thursday last.

CLARE SLOB LANDS.

MR. COX: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can state in what size lots it is intended to offer for sale the Clare Slob Lands?

MR. JACKSON: I think it would be advisable to offer the Clare Slob Lands in one lot; and, if they are not sold, they can be put up in lots to suit purchasers.

PURCHASE OF LAND BILL.

MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state what class or classes of money are to be paid into the Sinking Fund under the Purchase of Land and Consolidated Districts (Ireland) Bill; whether Her Majesty's Government have provided that this fund should perform the function of a Guarantee Fund to secure the re-payment of advances; if so, what means have they provided for the redemption of the land stock in the event of the failure of tenant purchasers to meet their yearly instalments; and whether he has as yet verified the statement that the re-lendings under Clause 6 (3) will result in an unsecured liability to the country of about £26,000,000?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Sinking Fund consists of an annual sum at the rate of 1 per cent. on the nominal amount of the capital stock advanced. The Government have not provided that this fund should perform the function of a Guarantee Fund for securing the re-payment of advances. There is no ground to believe that the re-lendings under Clause 6 (3) will have the result indicated in the last paragraph.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return, in amplification of Return No. 134, based on the estimate that the original advance to be made under the Land Purchase Bill of £29,717,000 will be exhausted in 10 years by equal annual purchases of holdings, and showing what amount will be available in each year, under Clause 6, Sub-section (3), in respect of the Sinking Fund payments for re-lending, until the principal sum advanced in the first 10 years shall be paid off, and also showing what, in each year, will be the total amount of all the purchase annuities due to the Government, upon the assumption that fresh advances are yearly made to the full amount which has passed through the Sinking Fund?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman will see the difficulty of answering a question of this kind, based on a hypothetical state of things. I hardly think that any good would result from the granting of such a Return.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I will make some observations on the subject when the Bill comes on.

CASE OF MR. WALSH.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he is aware that Mr. Walsh, of the Cashel Sentinel, was sentenced to three months' imprisonment for conspiracy at Tipperary, and arrested instantly on conviction; that several days before he had been (on appeal) sentenced to two months' imprisonment for the publication of a speech in his newspaper; but that the police held over the first warrant, commanding them to arrest him on the latter charge, in order to see what would be the result of the Tipperary prosecution; under what authority was this done; do the Government still hold over the warrant; under what Statute do the police exercise this suspensory power; and what officer is responsible?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): I answered the question of the hon. and learned Member on Friday.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The question I have put now has not been answered. What I want to know is this: Will the Government state why the warrant against Mr. Walsh was held over and under what Statute it was not enforced? Where is there any suspensory power?

*MR. MADDEN: If the hon. and learned Gentleman desires a further explanation I must ask him to put a question on the Paper.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I think I am entitled to know who signed the warrant, and who is responsible for its execution.

*MR. MADDEN: The matter went back to the Magistrate who signed the warrant.

MR. T. M. HEALY: By what contrivance was it that the County Court Judge allowed three months to elapse? Mr. Walsh was already in gaol, and the effect was to secure that he should undergo three months' imprisonment before the first warrant was executed.

*MR. MADDEN: The matter rested entirely with the County Court Judge. I am informed that the warrant is now signed.

ELECTORS' REGISTRATION (ACCELERATION) BILL.

In answer to Mr. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.).

*MR. W. H. SMITH said: It is not intended to take the Second Reading of the Electors' Registration (Acceleration) Bill to-day, although it has been necessary to put it upon the Paper.

MR. T. M. HEALY : Will it be taken before Christmas ?

*MR. W. H. SMITH : No, Sir.

THE CHRISTMAS HOLIDAYS.

MR. W. H. SMITH : When the Land Department (Ireland) Bill has been read a second time and the House has gone into Committee upon it, the programme of business which the Government has asked the House to undertake in the ante-Christmas Session will be fulfilled, and it will then be my duty to move that the House do adjourn until Thursday, the 22nd of January. If the Bill is not got into Committee to-night I shall make the Motion to-morrow. It will be necessary for the House to meet to-morrow in order that the Royal Assent may be given to the Seed Potatoes Supply (Ireland) Bill and the Transfer of Railways (Ireland) Bill.

THE REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS BILL.

In answer to Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe),

MR. MATTHEWS said : The reception given to the Reformatory and Industrial School Bill last Session was not such as to give much encouragement to its re-introduction. I will consider during the Recess whether it will be worth while to re-introduce it this Session in the same form as last Session or with some modifications, so as to make it more acceptable to the right hon. Baronet and his friends.

CROWN PROSECUTORS IN IRELAND.

MR. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary whether it is the fact that Mr. Robert Olphert has been appointed by the Attorney General for Ireland to prosecute for the Crown on the North-West Circuit at the Winter Assize in Ireland, and whether that gentleman was a land agent, and was concerned on his father's estates in questions which arose between the landlord and his tenants ?

*MR. MADDEN : I have appointed Mr. Olphert because he is an efficient and able member of the Bar, who will certainly do his duty. The statement that he is his father's agent is absolutely without foundation.

MR. MACNEILL : It is strictly true.

MR. T. M. HEALY : How many years is it since Mr. Olphert was given a brief on behalf of the Crown or of anyone else ?

*MR. MADDEN : I certainly shall not answer that question.

MR. MACNEILL : Is it not a fact that Mr. Olphert does not attend the Four Courts Library ?

*MR. MADDEN : No, Sir.

DISTRESS IN IRELAND.

MR. J. MCARTHY : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland a question of which I have been unable to give him notice, namely, whether, in view of the failure of the potato crop and the distress in Ireland, the provisions of the Land Act of 1887 enabling judicial rents to be reduced will be re-enacted with suitable modifications ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : As the hon. Member is aware, the cases in which temporary modifications of judicial rents were obtained under the Land Act of 1887 depended upon, and were caused by, a fall in prices. I believe that, so far from the price of potatoes having fallen this year, it has risen, and the result of re-enacting these clauses, so far from operating in the way the hon. Member desires, would have the effect of raising the rents.

MR. T. M. HEALY : Will the right hon. Gentleman allow the Land Commission to revise the judicial rents, having regard to the yield of potatoes this year ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : No ; I am afraid it would be hopeless.

WEIGHING MACHINES.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether there is any intention on the part of the Treasury to grant an extension of time for the stamping of weighing machines ?

*MR. W. H. SMITH : The hon. Gentleman has not given me notice of the question.

MR. CAUSTON : May I take the opportunity of impressing on the Government, in the absence of the President of the Board of Trade, the importance of this matter ?

*MR. W. H. SMITH : The hon. Member must give notice.

PURCHASE OF LAND AND CONGESTED DISTRICTS (IRELAND) [ADVANCES, &c.]

Committee to consider of authorising the payment of certain sums out of the Consolidated Fund and out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, for the purposes of any Act of the present Session relating to the purchase of land in Ireland, the Land Commission, and the improvement of the Congested Districts in Ireland (Queen's recommendation signified) to-morrow.

CHARITABLE ENDOWMENTS (DENBIGHSHIRE).

Return ordered—

"Comprising the Reports for the County of Denbigh of the 'Commissioners for inquiring concerning Charities 1818-37,' arranged separately for each parish in that county, and completed up to the 31st day of December, 1890, in the result of local inquiries, held by the Charity Commissioners in every parish wholly or partly within that county, into all Endowments known to be subject to the provisions of the Charitable Trusts Acts:"

"A Digest, in tabular form, of those Reports, showing, in the case of each such parish, whether any, and, if any, what Endowments subject to the Charitable Trusts Acts are recorded in the books of the Charity Commissioners in the Parish:"

"And, an Index, alphabetically arranged, of Names and Places mentioned in those Reports."—(Mr. James William Lowther.)

MOTIONS.

TRAMWAYS ORDER IN COUNCIL (IRELAND) (ATHENRY AND TUAM RAILWAY) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Attorney General, Bill to confirm an Order in Council of the Lord Lieutenant and Privy Council in Ireland, relating to the Athenry and Tuam (Extension to Claremorris) Railway, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Attorney General for Ireland and Mr. Jackson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 157.]

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is there any objection to the Bill being read a second time now?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: As far as the Government are concerned, they are extremely anxious to pass the Bill without delay.

*MR. MADDEN having gone to the Bill Office, on returning, said: There is no copy of the Bill in the House, and I must, therefore, postpone the further stages of the Bill until to-morrow.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway): Never mind the copy.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SEED POTATOES SUPPLY (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 148.)

Bill, as amended, considered; read the third time, and passed.

LAND DEPARTMENT (IRELAND) BILL. (No. 112.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(4.15.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

Debate arising;

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to move that the Debate be now adjourned. This is a most contemptuous way of treating the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): In what way is there contemptuous treatment? The hon. Member was not in the House when I introduced the Bill and explained the purport of it. It is substantially the very Bill that was read a second time in the course of the present year. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that in the course I have taken no discourtesy was intended to the House.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I certainly think that I have some reason to complain of the remarkable manner in which the right hon. Gentleman has acted. The right hon. Gentleman seems to imagine that the way in which he obtained the Second Reading of the Land Bill without criticism was owing to the fact that the action of the Irish Party was entirely paralysed. I beg to assure him that he is absolutely mistaken on that point, and I can further assure him that a more thoroughly bad Bill has never been brought in by a thoroughly bad Administration. The Bill is a reversal of the policy of 1885.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman cannot enter into a discussion of the merits of the Bill on a Motion for Adjournment. The hon. Member if he goes on will deprive himself of his right to speak on the Bill.

(4.17.) MR. T. M. HEALY: In that case I shall persist in my Motion for the Adjournment of the Debate. I would advise the Government, unless they want a series of these Motions, to take another course. The Bill is a reversal of the policy of the Act of 1885, and on that account I take exception to it. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, order! The question is that the Debate be now adjourned.

(4.18.) MR. M. HEALY (Cork): I think it is rather hard that we should be asked to proceed with the Debate on the Bill until we have some information as to who are the persons to be charged with the administration of it. The working of the Bill will depend very much upon the person who is to administer it. Judge Litton is dead, and the vacancy has not yet been filled up.

MR. T. M. HEALY: As I understand an Amendment is to be moved to the Second Reading of the Bill I beg leave to withdraw the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

(4.20.) MR. M. HEALY: I beg to renew the application I have already made for information, and, to afford the Government an opportunity to give it, I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time on this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

(4.21.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I wish to ask Mr. Deputy Speaker whether, by replying to the small point raised by the hon. Member, I shall be precluded from addressing the House again if any serious objection is raised to the Bill?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I apprehend that the mere answering of a question is not joining in the Debate.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It cannot be denied that a very short time has elapsed since the death of the Chief Commissioner, and as there is no connection, direct or indirect, between the Bill and the appointments, I do not think that the Government ought to be called upon to state their choice upon the present occasion.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The Bill is a reversal of the policy of 1885, when the Ashbourne Act was passed. There was then a Treaty between the Tories and the Irish Members, the latter insisting upon a remarkable change in the original draft of the Bill. That draft proposed to create a Land Department, and to leave to the existing Land Commission the power and the duty of dealing with the question of purchase. At that time the Land Commission consisted of Mr. Justice O'Hagan, Mr. Litton, and Mr. Vernon, who were appointed by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) in 1881. All of those three gentlemen are since dead. The Irish Members objected then, as they do now, to any merging of the powers of the Land Commission with the powers of the Purchase Commission; and the Government communicated to them that if they moved an Amendment severing the two Departments, it would be accepted. This was done, and, so changed, the Bill passed. Therefore the present proposal of the Government is the renewal of a proposal which was formerly abandoned by themselves. The object of the Government in now seeking to merge the power of the two Commissions is to embarrass English Members, Irish Members, and the House generally. The splitting of the Bill into two is a trick intended to deceive the House. We objected in 1885 to the appointment of Mr. O'Hagan, Mr. Litton, and Mr. Vernon. In discussing the principle of land purchase, one of the main questions we have to consider is the personnel of the Commission who are to shovel coals to the Irish landlords. When the vacancies were filled up by the appointment of Mr. John George McCarthy and Mr. Stanislaus Lynch no dissatisfaction was expressed; but some of their decisions have been complained of. The Government now intend to rig the Commission with a Tory personnel, and in their hands the £30,000,000 would not go a very long way. A momentous change is to be made in the payment of the salaries of the Land Commissioners. Under the Act of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian the salaries were placed upon the Estimates, so that from year to year the policy of the Commissioners could be criticised, as it has been from both sides of the House; but now such criticism is to be evaded by placing the salaries on the Consolidated Fund. The policy of the Government in separating the Bill that deals with the money from that dealing with personnel is a policy of blind man's buff, and of throwing dust in the eyes of the House of Commons. The Government's land purchase scheme is as great a novelty in 1890 as was that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in 1881. Why is it, I ask, that you are afraid to face criticism—an annual criticism of your own policy? If ever a case demanded close scrutiny, it is this policy of paying money out to Irish landlords. We are told, and I have no doubt I shall be told, that I was the very first to press that the appointments of the Land Commissioners should be permanent. Yes, I did press for permanent Commissioners, and I do so now, but I never asked that they should be sheltered from criticism. I held it necessary that anyone dealing with the money of the people should hold permanent appointments, and I wish a similar policy were followed in regard to the Resident Magistrates. But the House will not allow the rental of a single landlord to be cut down one fraction except by three Sub-Commissioners, with a right of appeal, first, to the Head Commissioner, and then to the Court of Appeal. But you entrust the liberties of the people of Ireland to two Removable Magistrates, in most cases without appeal. I say that this Bill in every detail is intended to subserve the landlord's interest, and is framed accordingly. No doubt, in a matter which involves so much litigation the Government is justified in endeavouring to secure that it shall be dealt with in a single Court; but why stop at that point—with the question of rent reduction or of land purchase? Why do you not take away from the Common Law

Judges all power over matters affecting the land, and leave every question connected with land, rent, rates, and evictions, to the Land Department; and why not, above all, give to the Land Department those powers of conciliation which the Government declared to be so useful, and which were embodied in Section 30 of the Act of 1887? That would be a natural policy. But you are not doing it; you are, instead, preparing a Court for some kind of jobs and jobbery. You are not going to deal with the agrarian situation in Ireland. This Bill is a piecemeal Bill, though it may, in the abstract, be considered as a proper measure of reform. I declare that the Bill, for the purpose of dealing with the question as a whole, is not only inefficient, but that it bears upon its face traces which entitle me to denounce it as flagrant jobbery. There are many matters in this Bill to which strong objection must be taken. Out of the six Commissioners any two may make a grant of money, while under the Bill of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian two Commissioners out of three were required to act. We all know how at elections in former days it was a practice for a man whose face was unseen to bribe voters through a hole in the wall. Well, this Bill is a sort of hole-in-the-wall bribery for the Irish landlords. From previous experience we know what the characteristics of the Commissioners are likely to be, the present body of 70 or 80 Commissioners being composed almost exclusively of landlords and land agents; indeed, with the exception of the brother-in-law of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, everyone comes within that category. I suppose I may take it that the Northern Whig represents in the North of Ireland to some extent the Government, and has given it the information at the disposal of the Crown. Well, it is stated on the authority of that paper that the other day the Chief Secretary held a kind of competitive examination among the Commissioners with a view of sifting their qualifications to act under this Bill. Is that statement right or wrong? I challenge a reply. The right hon. Gentleman answers not; he remains in beatific repose, and so we must assume that to this already landlord-saturated body is to be added a further crop of landlord appointments under this Bill. To ask the House of Commons suddenly, without a word of explanation, to read this Bill a second time is little less than trifling with the House. Two of the Irish Bankruptcy Judges, whose salaries are never taken on the Estimates, receive £2,000 a year each, but under this Bill two gentlemen are to be appointed—bribed—at the rate of £3,500 a year, while the remaining four are each to have a salary of £500 a year more than these two Bankruptcy Judges. Perhaps I ought to say, looking at this matter from the point of view that the expenditure will take place in Dublin, “the more the merrier,” because the more it costs English tyranny to govern Ireland the better I am pleased. But to pretend that a Bill of this sort, issued only this morning, can be read by a wave of the magician’s hand—the hand of the Chief Secretary—and, although it is of such magnitude, is entitled to no consideration, is, I maintain, a most high-handed policy even for the Irish Secretary. The proposal contained in the 9th clause is a Brobdingnagian one, giving an appeal in the Land Department from two gentlemen who get £2,500 a year to one gentleman who gets £3,500, the only basis which I can conceive for the proposal being that the man who gets a bigger salary will give a bigger price. That is a proposal which the Government wish to pass into law without a solitary word of explanation. Their action in this business has been brazen throughout; and if the House of Commons is to be brought down in the fogs of November to discuss Bills of this kind without getting one word of explanation, it seems to me that the Government regard the House as a kind of mere registration machine—put a penny in the slot, and “hey, presto!” the House of Commons will give you £30,000,000! I can only say that I have always been personally in favour of a policy which will root the tenants of Ireland in the soil at a fair price, but that policy of purchase must never be allowed to degenerate into a policy of swindle. The Irish land is worth something, and we are willing to pay the price of the land, but not the landlords’ price. I believe that there is yet sufficient spirit, even in the majority of this House, to resent the manner in which we have been treated by the Government in this matter.

*(442.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I have listened to the speech of the hon. and learned Member in hopes of ascertaining what reason he alleges why this Bill should not be read a second time. The hon. and learned Member has addressed a great many questions and a great many complaints to the Government. He has complained that this Bill was not circulated until this morning. But, as was fully pointed out by my right hon. Friend when he obtained leave to introduce the Bill, it is identical in substance with the Bill which was read a second time during last Session. There are various matters of detail, such as the 9th section, which have been introduced into this Bill, but those are obviously matters for discussion in Committee. The hon. and learned Member wants to know who are to be Land Commissioners under this Bill. If the hon. and learned Member had read the first portion of the Bill attentively he would have seen that the First Commissioners are the existing Land Commission: therefore there is no foundation for the suggestion that the Government are withholding information as to the personnel of the Commission. The fact that there is a vacancy on the Land Commission, which we all regret, is not a reason why the Bill should not be read a second time. With regard to the more permanent tenure of office conferred on the Commissioners, there will still be an opportunity on the Votes of discussing the policy embodied in the Land Commission generally, and I think that the advantage of putting the Commissioners on a more permanent footing has been admitted by the hon. and learned Member himself. As regards the principle of this Bill, it carries out a policy which I think will recommend itself to every Member of this House. It has been recognised by all persons for a long time that extreme inconvenience and a great waste of power and of public money are caused in Ireland by the existence of a variety of Departments dealing with a subject-matter which can really conveniently be dealt with by one consolidated Department, namely, sale of land, and the valuation of land, whether for the purpose of sale or of fixing a fair rent. These important functions are now divided between the Land Commission, the Land Judges, Court, who carry out sales in cases outside the immediate operation of the Land Purchase Act, and the Valuation Department. A very great waste of judicial power arises in this way, and the object of the Bill is to bring the work, judicial and non-judicial, within one single Land Department, whereby, in the opinion of the Government, it will be better done and the charges ultimately reduced. I think the fact that the Bill effects that object forms an ample reason why it should be read a second time. Of course, the questions raised by the hon. and learned Member will come up for discussion in Committee, and, for my own part, I will reserve any remarks upon these questions until then, with the exception of one point. The hon. and learned Member has called attention to an important addition to the Bill of last year, I mean Clause 9, under which, when the Land Department has sanctioned an advance under the Land Purchase Acts to a tenant who is purchasing his holding, it shall be lawful for any person interested in the purchase money other than the landlord to apply in the prescribed manner, and within the prescribed time, to a judicial Land Commission, who is to inquire into the sufficiency of the price agreed on and to refuse his sanction to the transaction if he is of opinion that the agreement for sale is not an undervalue. As hon. Members are aware, tenants for life possess very considerable powers for sale of the fee-simple of the land, but they may not be aware that it may be in the power of a landlord whose estate is so encumbered that he has no substantial interest in the purchase money to enter into a contract of sale with the tenants for something under the fair value of the land, thereby causing great loss to the encumbrancers. The clause in question is for the protection of encumbrancers and remaindermen against sales not an undervalue. So much for the first portion of the Bill. The second portion introduces various Amendments in detail, but it is in substance the same clauses as were contained in the Bill of last year. The whole Bill is, in substance, the Bill of last year, minus the clauses and provisions introduced in Bill No. 1, already read a first time, and I believe that the House will have no difficulty in affirming its general principles by reading it a second time.

*(5.3.) SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I do not rise to make a long speech, but I wish to give the reasons which to my mind render it absolutely imperative that those who voted against the Second Reading of the principal Land Bill the other evening should vote against this Bill, and that many who did not vote on that occasion should vote on this occasion. The most essential part of the Bill is the consolidation of the Land Department and the salaries paid to the Land Commission. As a British taxpayer I denounce as an absolutely indefensible proposal the consolidation of the Land Department and the crystallisation and prolongation to absolutely unknown time of an extremely highly paid department. As the Bill stands there will be four Civil Administrative Commissioners, who will receive practically £3,000 a year each. They will get it in meal or malt; they will get a consolidated salary of £2,500 with a prospect of a pension which is very moderately stated at £500. There will be two Judicial Commissioners, who will receive £3,500, with the prospect of a pension which will be estimated very low at £1,000 a year. That is £12,000 a year for the Administrative Commissioners and £9,000 a year for the judicial, or £21,000 a year for the superior officers of a Department which carries out the administration of, perhaps, some £3,000,000 of public money per annum. Just imagine any public Department of any description on this side of St. George's Channel in which £21,000 a year is paid to the permanent officials who have to deal with only a sum of £3,000,000. If this Bill once passes, Parliament will have given its sanction to this system of land purchase being one of the settled institutions of the country. It is not merely a question of £5,000,000 with which we had to deal on the last occasion that this question was brought before us. This Bill contemplates that the system shall go on while these gentlemen are getting old and getting superannuated, and while their successors are getting old and getting superannuated too. It is not for 10, or 20, or 50 years we are passing this Bill, but in all probability this system of land purchase in Ireland will continue for 70, 80, or 100 years. I object altogether to the proposed system of land purchase. I will not argue the point now, but simply direct attention to certain clauses in the Bill which render it absolutely imperative on anyone who is opposed to buying up the land of Ireland to vote against the Bill. Will hon. Members turn to Clause 21—the most important clause? We are told that this is a system of land purchase by the tenant. It is no such thing. In previous Bills the tenant was a part purchaser, but in this Bill it is a purchase of the landlord's property, not by the tenant, but by the State exclusively. It is a very common thing when an estate is purchased to leave a part of the money on mortgage; but now, for the first time, the Government ask the State to purchase landed property from certain landlords, and to leave not a part but the whole of the money on mortgage. If this proposal was made to a private English capitalist he would say, "The man who makes it must think me a fool," and yet that is the proposal the Government makes to the taxpayers of this country. In order to make some show of appearance that there is a proper guarantee for the repayment of the purchase money strong powers are put into the hands of the Commissioners, for the purpose of exacting the instalments, because the instalments are the only means by which the State is supposed to recover the money. Under Clause 21 the Commissioners are empowered, if the instalments are not paid, to sell up the tenant. If they cannot sell the farm they have power to work it themselves. The Commissioners are enabled to sell the farms, but, like a landlord's agent who tries to sell an evicted farm, they will not be able to sell. Irishmen will be no more desirous to buy the farm of a tenant evicted by the State than the farm of a tenant evicted by the landlord. That being the case, the Land Commissioners will be forced to enter into possession of the holdings, and to work them for the benefit of the State. The Chief Secretary argues that the Irish tenant who is evicted will say, "It is true I am evicted by the State, but I am evicted in the interest of my neighbours, the rate-payers; I am evicted in order to protect them from having the payments from the Exchequer confiscated." Does anybody who knows human nature, and especially Irish human nature, and the human nature of the Irish evicted tenant, believe that the evicted tenant will make such a nice distinction as this? Will he not say, "I am being turned out by Dublin Castle"? or will he not say, "I am being evicted by the British people on the other side of the Channel"? Under Clause 21 you will have this state of things, that, with rare exceptions, all the rent of Ireland, a country almost exclusively devoted to agriculture, will pass over the Channel to this country to be paid into the pockets of the British taxpayer, who will be the great absentee landlord of all Ireland. It is under this Clause 21 that the process of evicting the tenant who does not pay the rent will be carried out. As an economist and patriot I thought it right to declare that I apprehend that in future days the relations between the two countries will be greatly strained if all the rent of Ireland is sent over to England to be paid to the English taxpayer.

*(5.18.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I always listen to the hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) on land questions with interest, but I think his absence from the House during the last fortnight has probably misled him in this matter. My difficulties on this occasion are not his. The Government have split the Bill into two, and I think Bill No. 2 is in great danger of not being carried, and the Government do not much care whether it is carried or not. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: We will smash it.] Well, in smashing it, the hon. and learned Member must remember he is also smashing the long leaseholders at the same time. A great many valuable provisions for the tenants have been left out of Bill No. 1, and now form part of Bill No. 2, and, as I said the other night, it is very possible that Bill No. 2 will be caught in the toils of the Assisted Education Bill. I hope the hon. and learned Member for Longford will look a little more closely into the Bill than he has done, according to his own admission. I sympathise greatly with one part of his speech, and that was the part in which he referred to the constitution of the Land Department and the way in which the Land Commission is being handled. In 1881, after the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was passed, there were three appointments made, and the public understood that the appointments were made on these lines: Mr. Vernon was fairly taken as the representative of the landlord interest; Mr. Litton, a lay Commissioner, although a lawyer, was chosen because he was the representative of the tenant farmers of Ulster; and there was a judicial Commissioner, Mr. Justice O'Hagan, who had no recommendation save that of high character. When Mr. Vernon died another landlords' representative was appointed, in the person of Mr. Wrench. I do not challenge the appointment. Then Mr. Justice O'Hagan died, and again I think the Government did right. Mr. Justice Litton was chosen to succeed him. But in Mr. Justice Litton's place was any representative of the tenants placed? I say no. Mr. Fitzgerald was Chairman of Quarter Sessions in County Westmeath—

MR. T. M. HEALY: Well, it is not a bad appointment.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I think it is a bad appointment. At one time the dissatisfaction with this gentleman's decisions was very great.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I explain that the appointment was a bad appointment in 1881, but he has since learnt a deal of sense, and has been behaving very sensibly.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I say that in no way can it be said that Mr. Gerald Fitzgerald was a fit man to put in the place of the tenants' representative on the Commission. The hon. Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) has had a good deal of experience in the Land Court, and I am glad to hear him say that Mr. Gerald Fitzgerald has learnt a great deal. Well, here comes the pinch. There is on the Commission a landlords' representative in the place of Mr. Wrench, we have Mr. Gerald Fitzgerald in the place of Mr. Justice Litton, and I want to know who is to get the fresh appointment. Is he to be a Judge, is he to be a man who has human sympathy and who has a grasp of the land question, not only in its legal aspects, but in its broader and wider effects upon the people of Ireland? I say the people of Ulster are practically shut out from all influence upon this Commission now, and I would ask the Government, and I think I am justified in asking the Government, to look for a man who is not merely an able lawyer but who has some human sympathy in his breast and knows something about the land question. Although I agree with the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) in very little, I have always valued his opinion on these questions, and I would put this point to him. I do not think he exactly conveyed his meaning to the House when dealing with the question of salaries. There are five Land Commissioners. The new Bill proposes to add another, but not to add anything to the expenses of the country, because it simply contemplates the addition of the Land Judge who has his salary of £3,500 a year now. There is something to be said about these salaries not being put on the Estimates, but being charged to the Consolidated Fund. These are, however, matters which do not touch the principle of this Bill, as to the wisdom of creating a great Land Department to take the whole question in hand, and, inasmuch as the Government, rightly or wrongly, have introduced into the Bill a great many provisions to which the tenants of Ulster attach enormous importance, I shall vote for the Second Reading.

*(5.25.) MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): There is one aspect of this Bill on which I think a Member from this side of the St. George's Channel may venture to express an opinion—the economical aspect—and I cannot agree with the hon. Member who has just sat down in thinking that it does not affect the principle of the measure. This is a Bill creating machinery, and the economical aspect of that machinery strikes at the root of the whole matter. We have more than once in this House made attempts to call attention to the extravagant expenditure on the judiciary in Ireland, and we have always been met with the difficulty that the salaries of Judges are placed on the Consolidated Fund. This is an attempt on the part of the Government to add to the number of officials who are to be placed on the Consolidated Fund. The Government can only make such a proposal on the ground that these gentlemen are to be Judges—that they are to be an addition to the already overgrown judiciary. If they are to be Judges why not detail some of the existing Judges for the purpose of performing these duties? It is admitted that the Judges are too numerous, and it would be easy to carry out this suggestion. If it be said that these gentlemen are not to be Judges—and I apprehend that their duties are to be to a large extent administrative—why put them on the Consolidated Fund, and why pay them such excessively high salaries? It seems to me most desirable that when such a Department as this is to be reconstituted on a new basis—and I think there is a great deal to be said for amalgamating the duties of the two Departments which now exist—it is most desirable that the salaries should be put on the Estimates, especially when we hear criticisms from various quarters of the House respecting the way in which the Commissioners are supposed to represent different particular interests, whether of the landlords or of the tenants. With regard to the salaries, I am sure if this body were to be set up in any other part of the country but Ireland, where money is so lavishly spent on objects which are often believed to be questionable, whilst it might be admitted that there should be one high judicial officer at the head, salaries of £2,500 a year, with a pension, for subordinate officers would be regarded as absurdly extravagant.

(5.29.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I entirely agree with everything that has been said by my right hon. Friend beside me, but there is a special point to which I desire to call attention of the Chief Secretary. I put a question on the Paper to-day with reference to the probable financial effect of the whole proposal, and I think the House does not understand how great is the magnitude of the operation that will take place under this Bill. I believe the House is under the impression that the amount will be limited to purchases to the amount of £30,000,000. I think that under the process of the Sinking Fund the amount that will be ultimately advanced will be much greater. I wish particularly to call the attention of the Chief Secretary to this point that he may see that I am right. As I understand, the amount of the Sinking Fund is £300,000 a year. You go on increasing the amount every year, and so far as I can make out at the end of the first 10 years the amount which can be re-invested or re-lent by the State will be £3,300,000, involving interest to the amount of £134,000 a year.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman must address himself to the question of the Second Reading of the Bill, and not to the discussion of the clauses of another Bill.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The money clauses involve the power of the Commissioners to evict those who do not pay; therefore, I apprehended I was fully entitled to enter on the question as to what ultimately would be the liability that the Commissioners to be appointed would be entitled to undertake. Cannot I go into that question at all? Under Clause 21 the liabilities on which the Commissioners to be appointed under the Bill will be entitled to insist, and to evict purchasers if they do not pay, will be infinitely larger than the House, I think, understands it to be—£30,000,000, and will be £40,000,000.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It would be irregular to discuss that.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I wanted to show that the Guarantee Fund would not cover it, if you would allow me. But I will take some other opportunity.

(5.32.) MR. ATKINSON (Boston): I think I may congratulate the Government upon coming events which cast their shadows before. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division (Sir G. Trevelyan) seems to have some anxiety that the British people will be bad landlords and will excite bad feeling among the tenants. But it seems to me rather strange that the right hon. Gentleman does not give the British people credit for the desire to engender good feeling with the Irish people. If they do become landlords as the result of this legislation and advancing this money, it is not likely they will be bad landlords or treat the tenants in the cruel way the right hon. Gentleman fears they will. Probably he has an idea that he and his friends will get into power very soon. But I think we shall see the Government hold their own through the next General Election, and so the right hon. Gentleman's fears will not be realised. Then the right hon.

Gentleman made a point, as he thought, from a business-like view, when he said no man in his senses—nobody who was not a fool, I think he said—would allow anybody to borrow to the full amount of the estate he is buying. Well, I must confess, though I have had some 25 years' experience, I must be included under the category the right hon. Gentleman mentions. Last week I offered for sale a good estate, and it will be sold I anticipate in a short time, and I offered to allow the whole of the purchase money on the estate to remain at 4 per cent., and to give an undertaking that I will not call it in. This is a case in point. The right hon. Gentleman thinks it is foolish to allow the whole amount on the land. I say it is sense, for I know the value of the security, and I get 4 per cent. instead of $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. from the Bank of England, or 3 per cent. in Consols. I represent the British taxpayer as hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite and all of us do, and the British taxpayers I represent are dissatisfied at the manner in which they have been treated in relation to Irish affairs. It is true we have voted, and voted straight, but there has been so much talking from the other side, from the Parnellite Party and the Gladstonian Party—["Order, order!"]—well, from all the elements of the Liberal combination, that word had to be passed that, however anxious our constituents were, we were to sit still in order that those who were obstructing business by much talking might not prevent Bills being carried at all. So we passed a "self-denying ordinance." We said nothing, but we got our Bills, and the present pacific state of Ireland is the result of our "self-denying ordinance." The hon. Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) has declaimed against governing Ireland by tyranny, but my opinion is that tyranny has been exercised in favour of Ireland for the last four or five years. Ireland has been petted like a spoiled child, and other interests as far as possible have been thrust aside, though we could by our votes have swept away Home Rulers and so-called Liberals. Yet we remained quiet, and allowed our claims to remain in abeyance, our opinions to remain unexpressed. But the opinion of the British taxpayer is that too much of the time of Parliament has been given up to Irish affairs, and so you would all think if you were Representatives of English taxpayers. Judging by the relative importance of different parts of the kingdom, Ireland has had 10 times her fair share. It is not my intention to occupy more than five minutes, and I will only allude to an unfortunate remark from the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy). It is dangerous, said he, to attempt to deceive the House Commons. Now, we could not but be reminded of a historical event of that kind on the part of the political leader of the hon. Gentleman himself, who admitted in the witness box that he did attempt to deceive the House of Commons, and succeeded in the attempt. It is remarkable that the hon. Gentleman should by his words remind us of that incident. Well, if you will continue to dilate at this length upon Irish affairs we shall pass no more self-denying ordinances. I shall express my opinions to the full extent, and if you will talk for an hour I will talk for an hour.

* (5.38.) MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): Other occupations have not left me sufficient leisure to make myself acquainted with the details of this Bill.

An hon. MEMBER: It was not circulated until this morning.

MR. MAHONY: Anyhow, the fact remains, I have not mastered the Bill. But I know well how very important the question of the personnel of this Commission is, what important consequences may follow the appointment of this Land Department of persons whose names we do not as yet know. But apart from that there is one point to which I wish to direct attention. I see that by one of the clauses power is to be given to those interested in the purchase money the landlord is to receive to apply, not to the Land Commission as a whole, but to the Judicial Land Commissioner to intervene and stop the sale on the ground that the landlord will not receive sufficient value for the land. Now, if that power is given it also ought to be given to those who are interested on behalf of the tenant, and the amount to be paid by the tenant, and those persons are the taxpayers in Ireland, whom the Government propose to force against their will to give a guarantee. I say you cannot with any show of reason, if you give this power of intervention on behalf of the landlord, on the ground that the price is too low, you cannot with any consistency refuse a similar power to those who are interested in the tenant, to prevent the landlord from receiving too high a price.

(5.41.) MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I do not intend to prolong this discussion on the general merits of the Bill, but one point I want to impress upon the Chief Secretary for Ireland. My hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) has referred to the administration of the Bill, and I do wish the Chief Secretary would spend a little more time in looking after the administration of the Department. It is of no use our passing good Acts here unless they are afterwards properly administered. We have to regret the loss of Mr. Justice Litton, and from association with him I know the value of his services. His death is a great loss to the administration of the Land Act. I am sure the Land Act of 1881 would not have been worked so well without the administration of Mr. Justice Litton. We are extremely anxious to know who is to be his successor. I do not press the right hon. Gentleman on that point now, but this I will say, that if the Land Commission is to have the confidence of the people it must not have only landlord representatives upon it. My hon. Friend (Mr. T. W. Russell) has referred to this, and I wish the Chief Secretary would give us the satisfaction of his declaration that it is not desirable that the Department should be administered by the representatives of one Party. There is another side to this. There are four Commissioners now, and from what we hear we may expect there will be a fifth. All the present Commissioners come from the South of Ireland. Ulster is not represented at all, and there is a very sore feeling in the North of Ireland on the point, because, after all, in the fixing of fair rents Ulster has considerable interests, and it is considered very hard that Ulster has not a representative on the Commission. I do not know whether circumstances permit of the successor to Mr. Justice Litton being found in the North, but I may suggest to the right hon. Gentleman another way. There has been a good deal of delay in hearing appeals, and much has been said of the salaries of the Commissioners, and I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that if he reduced by £500 the salaries proposed by the Bill, and appointed a new Commissioner, then he might remove the block in the Appeal Court and enable all appeal cases to be heard quickly. I do not know what possibility there is of appointing a Commissioner from Ulster, but I do think that Ulster has a fair claim to be represented.

(5.44.) MR. J. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): What I desire to say has reference to a point of order, and the ruling from the Chair. The Bill was only circulated this morning. I desire to point to line 3 on page 15; and, Sir, if your ruling will allow me to proceed, I am prepared to show that the direction in the Bill there, namely, that the instalments not paid by defaulters should continue to be charged on, and paid out of the Guarantee Fund is a financial impossibility, for the Guarantee Fund will be bankrupt on the very first re-lending taking place. I would like, if I may, to ask the House to listen to a recital of the manner in which this Guarantee Fund will become bankrupt on the first occasion of re-lending, and which will make it impossible for the direction in this third line I have mentioned to be fulfilled—

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member must reserve such questions of detail until in Committee the point is reached.

MR. J. SEYMOUR KEAY: I bow to your ruling, Sir, but I am prepared to show how financial stability is impossible under this provision.

(5.46.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): The answer of the Attorney General for Ireland is not altogether satisfactory. In replying to the argument that the salaries of the Commissioners should be placed upon the Estimates, he said the functions of the Commissioners were of a judicial character, and for this reason it was not desirable that their salaries should appear on the Estimates. But surely a main portion of their work is of an administrative more than of a judicial character? If the argument of the Attorney General for Ireland holds good, how comes it that the salaries of County Court Judges are annually provided by Parliament? Upon this item in the Estimates it is possible to raise debate, although these County Court Judges fulfil functions of a purely judicial character. I strongly object to administrative duties of the character of those to be conferred by this Bill, and which have been conferred on the Commissioners, being placed outside the pale of Parliamentary criticism. It is not a sufficient answer to say that there are certain expenses we can criticise, for previous experience connected with Irish Judges shows us that the opportunity for Parliamentary criticism is in such a manner altogether impossible, and so it will be impossible to criticise in a sufficient manner the conduct of the Land Commissioners under this measure. I have not sufficient knowledge as to the point raised by the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) as to Clause 9. But Clause 9 involves a principle which seems to be at the root of the whole Bill, and upon which the whole superstructure of the measure is based, for under that clause it is possible for the Commissioners to intervene and prevent the sale of any land on representation from the mortgagee, or remainderman, or person for whose benefit the estate is encumbered, that the sale has taken place under what they are pleased to call the value of the land. Why is this allowed? It seems to point to the fact that this measure, like the previous measure, to which a Second Reading has been given, is to enable Irish landlords to dispose of unsaleable land at a price above the market value, above what purchasers would be willing to pay in the open market—to enable such sales to take place to the benefit of the landlords, and to the detriment of the interest of the tenants.

(5.50.) MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): Before the Chief Secretary replies there is just one question I should like to put to the right hon. Gentleman in reference to the operation of Clause 9. It will be seen that the clause, which has not hitherto been referred to, deals with the guarantee deposit and its amount, which may be reduced to a tenant, or, indeed, altogether abrogated under certain circumstances. I think, perhaps, I might better explain by a concrete instance. I assume the case of a holding of £600 value. If the amount to be advanced is only £450, or three-fourths of the value, then no guarantee deposit will be required, but, assuming that a larger sum than three-fourths is advanced, it would seem the guarantee is only reduced. Assuming that a sum of £500 is required to purchase a landlord's interest in a holding, 20 per cent guarantee deposit is required; that is to say on £500 it would be £100. I should be glad to have this explained. Are we to understand that this would be reduced to £50, which would be the difference between the £500 and the £450 advance, which also is three-fourths of the whole? It seems to me some verbal amendment will be required in the clause. I may refer for a moment to some of the remarks made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division (Sir G. Trevelyan), who seems again to have fallen into the mistake of considering that the repayments that are to be made by the occupying tenants by instalments are to be looked upon as rent, and therefore the British taxpayer becomes a great absentee landlord. I think that fallacy underlies a great deal of the misconception in the view taken by opponents of the measure as to the dangers that may arise. The British taxpayer will not be a landlord. He will be in the position of a mortgagee, who holds good security and receives repayment of the amount advanced in annual sums of principal and interest. I have more than once put this view before the House, but it seems almost impossible to get it impressed on the minds of the right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench.

*(5.55.) MR. M. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): Naturally anxiety exists as to the Commissioner who will succeed Mr. Justice Litton, as the usual difficulty is sure to arise in the working of the Act in view of the fact that certain Commissioners have no legal qualifications at all and yet will deal with purely legal and technical affairs. The Attorney General for Ireland is a high authority, and I suppose nobody knows more about the working of the Encumbered Estates Act, and how necessary it is that questions of a legal character should be disposed of by a lawyer of experience. If hon. Members will look at Clauses 4 and 5 they will see how jurisdiction under the Common Law in Ireland is transferred to the new Commissioners. The administration of important questions under the Judicature Act of 1877 is transferred to gentlemen who, perhaps, never read the Act. Now, the Irish Bar met some time ago and arrived at a series of resolutions which, as they were published in the newspapers, and especially in the Irish Law Times, doubtless were brought under the notice of the Attorney General for Ireland. In the first place, the members of the Bar pointed out that the duties to be performed by non-legal persons were such as non-legal men could not discharge; questions affecting settlements, incumbrances, conditions of trust, and a number of points I need not go into. They then go on to suggest a way out of the difficulty, that the services of some of the existing Judges of the Common Law Division should be utilised in dealing with purely legal affairs. I believe there will be no difficulty in obtaining Judges from the Common Law Division who have sufficient spare time on their hands to discharge such duties as they arise. Questions of a purely administrative character may be left to the non-legal Commissioners; and two Common Law Judges might be selected by rota, or in any other way suggesting itself to the approval of the Judges, to deal with legal questions. Again, under Clause 9 there is a most distinct violation of principle. It deals with the value of land. This is not a technical question at all; but, nevertheless, is withheld from the lay Commissioners, who have no power to assist in giving a final decision on these points. Under certain circumstances appeals are given to the Court of Appeal in Ireland, but under Clause 9 there is no appeal from the legal Commissioners, who, by the way, are deprived of the assistance of assessors or lay Commissioners. There is a further defect in Clause 9, either in withdrawing jurisdiction from the lay Commissioners or in not allowing an appeal to the Court of Appeal in Ireland. I put these objections before the right hon. Gentleman. I do not profess to speak as the mouthpiece of the Irish Bar, but I am speaking on subjects as to which declarations have been made by the Irish Bar; and I trust that in doing so I am not misrepresenting the views of my professional brethren.

(6.2.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will endeavour to touch on all the points which have been raised in the course of the Debate, and I will begin with the observations of the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down. He has very accurately represented the views of the Irish Bar and the Irish Judges. If the hon. Member will look at Clause 8, Sub-section 2, which is new in this Bill, and is also in Bill 1, he will see that the Government have endeavoured to meet the views of the Irish Bar, and to introduce judicial strength into the Land Commission from the general number of the Irish Bench. From the observations that some hon. Members have made upon Clause 9, they seem to think that this is an attempt made on the part of the Government to construct machinery for the artificial raising of the price of land in Ireland. I need not say to anyone who has read the clause attentively that there was no such object in the mind of the framer, and that the Government had no such view. The sole object we had in view was, this: It may happen—not often, but it may happen—that a landlord has no practical or substantial interest in the land of which he is the legal owner; and it may happen that under such circumstances he will find it to be his interest to part with the land to his tenant at a price far lower than the tenant will be ready to give, and far lower than the fair price of that land. In such circumstance, who will be the person to suffer by the transaction? Not the landlord but the mortgagee, and under this Bill, as stated last year, he has no voice in the sale at all. Everyone, I think, will admit that it is only fair to give the man the chance of having his case heard by appeal to some judicial tribunal; but whether the machinery provided by the Government for this purpose is the best that could be adopted will be for the Committee to decide rather than the House itself. No doubt there is something to be said for the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman who last addressed the House, that there should, under certain circumstances, be an appeal to more than one Judge. That it seems only right to give the mortgagee an appeal under the circumstances I have pointed out is a proposition no one will deny. The object of Section 17, which was also in last year's Bill, is that in case the price, or a considerable portion of the price, is found by the tenant from other sources than public loans, and in case, therefore, the amount advanced for the holding is considerably less than the value, the Land Commissioners will be empowered to dispense with the Guarantee Fund. That will throw no additional risk on the State, and it will facilitate sales in some few cases. The greater part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division (Sir G. Trevelyan) was directed rather to the Bill which has already been read a second time than to this now before the House. His main objection to the Bill, however, was applicable to both Bills, and it was founded on this proposition: that as soon as purchase has gone on to a considerable extent the English Government will become the landlord of the Irish tenant, that they will have to evict and sell the holdings in case of non-payment, and that they will be as unable to sell the lands of evicted tenants as are certain landlords in such cases now in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman made some very gloomy vaticinations on this point, but I think there is abundance of evidence which may reassure him. I have glanced at the Report of the Land Commission, and find that of 13,000 cases of holdings sold, the actual number in the possession of the Commission which they have been unable to dispose of is only three. I do not think the British taxpayer need tremble if only three holdings are unsold of 13,000. The hon. Members for South Tyrone and Derry and one or two other Members below the Gangway have made some remarks about the personnel of the Land Commission. It is true that there is a vacancy, but it is not a fair question to ask me now who is to fill it. I can only say that the matter will receive careful consideration from the Government, but it is obvious at all events that, from the nature of the functions to be discharged, it is absolutely necessary that a man of high legal standing should be appointed. The hon. Member for South Tyrone asked why one of the existing Judges of the Supreme Court should not be appointed. I should be extremely glad if one of the Judges of the Supreme Court would accept the position, but the hon. Gentleman must be well aware that the position is one which is not coveted by Judges of the Supreme Court. Though the salary may be higher the duties are certainly more disagreeable, and I fear there is little chance of inducing a Judge of the High Court to exchange voluntarily. Such an exchange

could only be made voluntarily; there is no power to compel it, and I do not think there ought to be. The hon. Member also criticised the appointment of Mr. Fitzgerald as a landlord appointment. I cannot understand upon what that objection is founded, for Mr. Fitzgerald is neither a Conservative in politics nor a landlord. Mr. Justice Litton was a landlord, but is it possible for anybody to suggest for a moment that that fact ever warped or unfairly influenced his decisions, or made him more a landlord's man than a tenant's man? I am perfectly certain that every one who has had an opportunity of watching the manner in which Mr. Fitzgerald discharges his duties will not agree with the criticism of my hon. Friend as to that appointment, but will rather regard the appointment as a very successful effort by the Government to discharge one of the most disagreeable and onerous parts of their functions. It has been asked why we propose to put the salaries on the Consolidated Fund, and the hon. Member for Longford and one or two Members above the Gangway have accepted the principle that while the Judges hold permanent office their salaries should be voted by Parliament. It is perfectly true that with the Bankruptcy Judges permanent tenure is combined with salary voted by Parliament, but I cannot but believe that that was an oversight in the drafting of the Bill. I believe this course is absolutely anomalous; there is not a single case in England of a similar kind, and I believe that as a general rule it is more honoured in the breach than in the observance. There is a radical inconsistency between subjecting Judges to criticism in this House, and yet putting them in a position from which the House cannot oust them, and the arrangement to give a permanent appointment and leave the salary to be voted by Parliament is one which this House has not accepted in the past, and will not, I think, accept in the future. One hon. Member has referred to the case of County Court Judges in England, but I am not familiar with the tenure of those Judges, who, I believe, are appointed by the Lord Chancellor. If that is so, the arrangement is fundamentally different from that for the payment of the salaries of the Irish Judges. They cannot be dismissed, and the arrangements for their salaries are entirely in accordance with the arrangements of this Bill; their salaries are charged on the Consolidated Fund. The point which has received most criticism and attention is the question of economy. One of the most frequent complaints made in the course of the Debate was that an additional charge is thrown on the English taxpayer by the new arrangement. I can assure the House that not only is that not the fact, but it is directly the reverse of the fact. This is a Bill calculated to produce great economy. It is true that two salaries are raised thereby—the salaries of Mr. Lynch and Mr. McCarthy. It is true that those gentlemen now get £2,000 a year, and that they will get £2,500 after the Bill passes, and a pension. But it seems to me to be an invidious and inexpedient course to make a homogeneous Land Department of this kind, and leave an inequality of salary between the Commissioners of 1881 and the Commissioners of 1885; and for that reason I would strongly advise the House to accede to an increase of salary in the case of those two gentlemen. But in the case of the other members of the Land Commission, their salaries will in the future be what they are now. I ask the House whether it will be prepared in constituting a new Land Department, having thrown upon it duties of a very onerous kind not contemplated by previous legislation, to take this opportunity of diminishing the salaries of gentlemen who have, after all, done their duties to the satisfaction of the public. If, however, we look to the future, the economy which this Bill proposes to effect is a large and substantial economy. At present the land work of Ireland is carried out by a Judge of the Landed Estates Court with a salary of £3,500 a year, by a Judicial Commissioner with £3,500 a year, by two Lay Commissioners with £3,000 a year, by two Purchase Commissioners with £2,000 a year, and by a Valuation Commissioner with £1,200 a year. The total cost is somewhere over £19,000 a year. But as vacancies occur that cost will be reduced until it comes to about £8,500—in other words, the cost of administering land in Ireland will be diminished by more than £10,000 a year. Now, I think that, under these circumstances, whatever other criticisms may be brought against the Bill, and they have not appeared to me to be of a very satisfactory character, at all events the criticism of extravagance cannot be brought against it. It is a Bill that, among its other merits, certainly has this, that the charge now thrown on the British taxpayer for the purpose of administering Irish land will be largely and permanently reduced. I think I have now dealt with every single point raised.

MR. KEAY: Will the right hon. Gentleman defend the Guarantee Fund against the charge of rottenness?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, the hon. Gentleman was ruled out of order when he raised that point, and as I do not wish to draw down upon myself a similar rebuke from the Chair, I think I must defer till a more convenient time the discussion of that question.

(6.21.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): The question how you deal with these officers in Dublin, and whether you chop them about, and give one man a little more and another a little less, is of very little importance to the taxpayers, and of very little interest to my constituents. There is one point, however, on which I wish for some explanation because it may become one of some importance after the Christmas Recess. The clause which relates to turbary is one in which the keenest interest will be excited amongst the small tenants who may purchase in the West of Ireland. The clause regulates the manner in which turbary is to be purchased, and the way in which it is to be divided among the tenants. Now, that being the case with turbary, why should it not be the case with grass lands also? I want to see the poor tenant in the West of Ireland put into a position in which he can purchase grass farms near his holdings. If there were a similar section to the turbary clause relating to grass land and grass farms in reference to tenants holding not more than 10 or 15 acres of land it would probably satisfy all the wishes of the small tenants in the West of Ireland. It is very important that we should get an answer to this question before the Recess. I am glad that these two Bills have been put in before the Christmas Recess, because we shall have ample time to consider them and to draft Amendments to them. I wish, however, to know from the Government upon which Bill a clause regulating the purchase of grass lands could properly be brought forward? The question is one of enormous importance, because another 500,000 of Irishmen must go out from the West and South of Ireland unless their holdings are increased, and I have no hesitation in saying that the landlords' position would be improved by selling their grass land to these poor tenants.

(5.27.) MR. MADDEN: It is only by the indulgence of the House that I can reply to the question. I do not think that such an Amendment as the hon. and gallant Gentleman suggests could be properly introduced upon the Land Purchase Bill. The measure now before the House deals with a Land Department, and amends in certain particulars the existing machinery under the Ashbourne Act. The provisions with respect to turbary naturally fall within the scope of this Bill. It would be quite in order for the hon. Member to propose to introduce provisions of the kind he mentions into the measure now before the House, and any Amendments of that kind would meet with the most attentive consideration of the Government.

(5.28.) MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I know the opinions I shall advance are shared by so small a number of Members that to dwell on them at any length would be something like an impertinence. I know my opinions are unpopular, but that will not prevent me expressing them, because they are held by many outside this House who wish their views to be made known on this question of pledging the credit of the British taxpayer in reference to Irish land. The object of the Bill, as I understand it, is to create a peasant proprietary in Ireland. I do not pretend to have any special knowledge of Ireland, or to have any knowledge of Ireland at all, but I suppose there is no special set of circumstances to be observed in Ireland which is not to be found in other countries. This is an attempt to induce the Legislature to introduce a similar state of things into Ireland to that which—

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member's argument belongs to a Bill which has already been read a second time.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: In that case I will bow to your decision, I merely enter a formal protest against creating a peasant proprietary in Ireland on conditions which are to be terminated in 49 years. I would continue in perpetuity the land of Ireland to the Irish people. I regret that I have not an opportunity of dealing with the absolutely rotten character of the guarantee on which the Bill is founded. As, however, I appear to be out of order all round, I shall conclude by saying that we have had many protestations from leading Members of the Opposition, both in outside speeches and in debating speeches, that their intention is not to allow the credit of the British taxpayer to be neglected on questions like this, and that they will fight this Bill on every occasion, in order that through their agency it may be left to the Irish people to settle their own land question, instead of forcing it upon the English House of Commons.

*(6.33.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): Sir, the Chief Secretary, in replying to comments made on the 9th clause, admitted that in the Bill of last year Her Majesty's Government did not introduce provisions which gave the same protection to the encumbrancer and mortgagees as they have seen fit to put into this Bill. I think that is a very extraordinary admission. I really think the Chief Secretary ought to throw some light on the omission of those provisions in the Bill of last Session.

MR. MADDEN: There were provisions introduced into the last Bill, though those in the present Bill give another kind of protection to the encumbrancer.

*MR. CHANNING: They were not anything like the provisions introduced into this Bill. The 9th clause, in fact, places very nearly a compulsory power in the hands of the mortgagees to exact from the Land Commission that the price of the land shall not fall below the value at which the land has been mortgaged. Hon. Members are aware that there are mortgages on most of the land of Ireland, and where the mortgages are the heaviest on the holdings obstacles will be placed to purchase under this clause. Her Majesty's Government have in this clause created a new leverage for artificially raising the price of land to be sold under their land purchase proposals. They have not seen fit to introduce provisions such as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) introduced into his Bill in 1886, giving the Land Commission means of seeing, in the interests of the tenants, and in the interests of the taxpayers of England, that the purchase price was fair and reasonable. The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway referred to a most important question, namely, the power to buy grass land in neighbouring districts to facilitate migration from congested districts. That is a point which I hope will meet with the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. The hon. Member for South Tyrone complained of our opposition to this Bill, because we would risk the valuable clauses relating to turbary, and the 29th clause, which gives power in the case of long leases to come within the Land Purchase Bill. I would remind him and other hon. Members that we are placing no obstacle in the way of these particular proposals, which might be introduced into the first Bill in the form of Amendments. Referring once more to this question of mortgages, Her Majesty's Government are losing a great opportunity of dealing with the question of their revision. The whole of the question of land purchase hinges upon the point of what is the real value of the land. The mortgages on the land stand in the way of a fair price for it, and constitute an obstacle to land purchase in Ireland. I for one, as a hearty opponent of the principle of land purchase, record my vote against the Second Reading.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Mr. Deputy Speaker, the Attorney General for Ireland started an extraordinary doctrine just now. He said the principle of this Bill was accepted last Session, that we were not to oppose it, but were to agree to it without having had the time to read it. I opposed the Bill last Session, I shall oppose it this Session, and I hope I shall have the opportunity of opposing it next Session; if I may judge of what occurred last Session, very possibly I shall. I will vote against this Bill for the very excellent reason that it is the complement of the first Bill. I object to the whole system of land purchase on an Imperial guarantee. This Bill would not have been brought in but for the other Bill, of which the Attorney General will not deny that it is an integral portion. Under these circumstances I intend to vote against every clause, if I get a chance, both of this Bill and the other.

(6.41.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): Sir, I only wish to advance one reason why I will vote against every clause, letter, and syllable, of this Bill. Our contention is that the tenants will be compelled to pay far more than the value of the land in purchasing their holdings. They will be compelled to purchase their own interest in their own improvements at a long price. It is probable that a great portion of the land will be made utterly unmarketable in the open market, by reason of the fictitious prices created through the machinery of this measure. And this is the reason: So long as the régime of coercion exists, the tenants will be prevented from combining in protection of their own interests. So long as coercion is rampant in Ireland no attempt should be made to compel the tenants to purchase their holdings at the risk of the British taxpayer. Coercion, directly or indirectly, is employed for the purpose of compelling the tenants to pay artificial prices for their holdings. It is perfectly well-known that the Ponsonby tenants had an opportunity of very nearly coming to an arrangement with the landlord to obtain their holdings, when Smith-Barry and his syndicate intervened with the whole machinery of coercion, in order to defeat the tenants and compel them to pay the enormously advanced prices which Smith-Barry and his syndicate chose to impose upon them. Therefore it is, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I regard with the utmost aversion the whole of this scheme, and I will do whatever I possibly can to defeat it. I feel that so long as the régime of coercion is continued by this Government in Ireland, we ought to resist every attempt which is made to compel the tenants to purchase their holdings.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to Transfer of Railways (Ireland) Bill, with Amendments.

TRANSFER OF RAILWAYS (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 113.)

Order read for consideration of Lords Amendments.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): As a point of Order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may I ask, have the Orders of the Day been gone through?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: They have not.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then I submit to you, Sir, that if it is open to the Government to interpose a Bill, and consider it at any time, it is equally open to any private Member to interrupt the Orders of the Day.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: This is a Bill that has been sent up from the other House with an Amendment. The question is that the House do agree with the said Amendment.

Mr. Conybeare

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Perhaps some Member of the Government will state for the information of the House what is the exact scope of the Amendment which has been made to the Bill?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): This Amendment has been made under these circumstances. A certain meeting of the shareholders of the existing Railway Companies coming under the operation of this Bill has to be called after the Bill comes into force; but it has been found that one of the companies has a special Act of its own, which requires a meeting to be called at an earlier date, and the Amendment has been inserted to remedy this.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What is the name of that company?

MR. JACKSON: The Great Southern and Western.

Lords Amendments considered, and agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

*(7.3.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): As the Government are not prepared to proceed with the consideration of private Members' Bills at this stage of the Session, it is my duty to move the adjournment of the House at once; but before I do so I would appeal to the hon. Members who have Bills on the Paper to postpone them until after Christmas.

MR. J. MORLEY: What will be the business when the House re-assembles?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: On Thursday, January 22nd, it is proposed to take, first, the Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill, to be followed by the Tithe Bill, and to go on with the Tithe Bill on the Thursday and on the Monday following.

House adjourned at five minutes after Seven o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Tuesday, 9th December, 1890.*SEED POTATOES SUPPLY (IRELAND)
BILL.

Read 2^a (according to order): Then Standing Orders Nos. XXXIX. and XLV. considered (according to order), and dispensed with; Committee negatived: Bill read 3^a, and passed.

HARES PRESERVATION BILL [H.L.]
(No. 4.)ARCHDEACONRY OF CORNWALL BILL
[H.L.]—(No. 8.)

Read 3^a (according to order), and passed, and sent to the Commons.

TRANSFER OF RAILWAYS (IRELAND)
BILL.—(No. 15.)

Returned from the Commons with the Amendments agreed to.

COMMISSION.

The following Bills received the Royal Assent:—

1. Transfer of Railways (Ireland),
2. Seed Potatoes Supply (Ireland).

House adjourned at ten minutes past Four o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 9th December, 1890.

MR. SPEAKER'S CONTINUED ABSENCE.

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House that Mr. Speaker was again unavoidably prevented from taking the Chair of the House this day.

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

VOL. CCOXLIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

QUESTIONS.

NATURAL HISTORY MUSEUM—
ELECTRIC LIGHTING.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, considering that the public are now deprived of the use of the Great Natural History Museum, not only in the afternoons and evenings, but also on foggy winter days, and that the facilities of lighting are now such that the Museum has already been temporarily lighted by electricity for societies meeting there, the Treasury will again consider the advisability of providing funds to light the Museum?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Temporary arrangements for electric lighting have occasionally been made by societies who have been allowed the use of the Natural History Museum, but until further experience has been obtained of the effect of evening opening at the British Museum it is not proposed to take up the question of making a permanent installation for electric light at the Natural History Museum.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I wish to know whether the Government, in considering this matter, have had regard to the fact that the British Museum is an institution of an unpopular character, whereas the South Kensington Museum is one of an extremely popular kind; and whether, therefore, some opportunity should not be given of seeing the latter in the evening?

MR. JACKSON: I do not think the hon. Member's description of the British Museum accords with the description given in the House when the Government were pledged to introduce the electric light into the Museum, and I may add that the experience there is not extremely satisfactory—[Sir G. CAMPBELL: "Hear, hear!"]—because evening attendance, which in February averaged 635, fell in March to 367, and has continued to fall since, until in November it was only 145.

THE CITY PAROCHIAL CHARITIES.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER (London): I beg to ask the Vice President of the

2 G

Committee of Council on Education whether, inasmuch as in respect of applications to be heard on objections against the Central Scheme framed under "The City of London Parochial Charities Act, 1883," the Education Department, in April last,

"Decided to approve the scheme without further delay, so as to allow time for its consideration by Parliament," and that the Education Department approved the scheme and laid it upon the Table of the House on the 2nd December, without hearing any objectors and without publication, and having regard to the fact that on the 31st January it will only require the Royal Assent to become law, the Government will undertake to give any, and what, opportunity for its consideration by Parliament?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): My hon. Friend is in error in supposing that the scheme was laid on the Table of the House without publication, and in assuming, as he appears to do, that no hearing has been given to objectors. All the objections to the scheme have been carefully considered, and not only were its general features the subject of a Debate in this House early last Session, when an almost unanimous feeling in its favour was elicited, but the scheme itself lay on the Table without challenge for seven weeks, from July 3rd to the prorogation in August last. Looking, therefore, to the delay which has already taken place, and to the magnitude of the interests depending upon the success of the scheme, I can only refer my hon. Friend to the opportunity that will still exist of moving an Address to the Crown when the House meets again in January.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING IN LONDON.

MR. RICHARD CHAMBERLAIN (Islington, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the long continued default of the Chelsea Electric Supply Company to furnish the statutory currents of 100 volts, and to the serious loss of illuminating power sustained by consumers in consequence; whether the Board of Trade have allowed this company a margin of four volts either way, and that the latter have taken advantage of this concession to give an average during lighting hours of 97 volts instead of the 100, to which consumers are entitled; whether complaints of this default were made to the Board 12 months ago, and assurance then made by the company of immediate amendment; and whether he will take steps to compel this company to keep faith with the public or to forfeit their concession?

Sir Robert Fowler

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Last winter the hon. Member complained to the Board of Trade of the deficiency in the standard pressure of the current supplied by this company. The Board of Trade communicated with the company, and were informed that the cause of complaint had been removed. Under the regulations imposed upon the company under their order, they are bound to declare to the consumer the constant pressure at which they propose to supply him with energy, and the variation from the pressure so declared must not exceed 4 per cent. under a penalty not exceeding £5 for each default, and a daily penalty not exceeding £5 so long as the default continues. If the regulations are not complied with, it is open to the consumer to proceed against the company for penalties.

MR. R. CHAMBERLAIN: May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman's attention has been called to the fact that the variation mentioned has been taken advantage of in order to supply the consumers not with an average of 100 volts, but of 97, in that way taking advantage of the concession of the Board of Trade?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: However that may be, if the company are in default the consumers have their remedy. It is not for the Board of Trade to enforce the law.

MR. R. CHAMBERLAIN: I understand from the right hon. Gentleman that we have no remedy unless they get below 96—the 4 per cent. referred to in the answer just given?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Yes, Sir; that is so.

THE WAR OFFICE AND PRIVATE ESTABLISHMENTS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanarkshire, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War why should men be discharged and machinery stand idle in the Arsenal while the work is being done by private contractors?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): It is the policy of the War Office to give a share of its orders to the trade with the special object of having large sources of supply to rely upon in case of emergency. The Ordnance Factories have got through their share of work quicker than the trade.

In reply to a further question by Mr. GRAHAM,

*MR. E. STANHOPE said: I admit that the work done by the Ordnance Factories yields more profit to the Government than work done in private establishments, but it is of advantage to obtain a supply, not only from our own factories, but from private firms.

THE MANCHESTER SHIP CANAL.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanarkshire, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will lay upon the Table a Return of the number of accidents, fatal or otherwise, that have taken place upon the Manchester Ship Canal during its progress?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have not this information in my possession, nor have I the means of ascertaining with anything like certainty what non-fatal accidents have taken place.

ROYAL WARRANTS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been drawn to a letter in the London Times, of 7th January, 1890, headed "Royal Warrants," and signed "D. Jamieson, Pensioner, Regimental Quartermaster Sergeant," complaining of Royal Warrants being interpreted to his disadvantage and also to the disadvantage of soldiers by the War Office; and whether the statements are well founded; and, if so, whether he will take any steps to rectify the grievances therein complained of?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: This man could have been pensioned either under the Warrant of 1878 or under that of 1881. Under the former he would have been entitled to a pension of 2s. 6d. a day; under the latter he has been granted 2s. 9½d. He cannot have the advantage of both Warrants conjointly, as he suggests, in order to increase his pension still further. I may add that his case has been repeatedly under the consideration of the War Office and of the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital.

THE CAVALRY BARRACKS AT WINDSOR.

SIR SAMUEL WILSON (Portsmouth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the Cavalry Barracks at Windsor are in a most insanitary condition at present, and whether some cases of typhoid fever have occurred there recently; and is he prepared to take such steps as may be necessary to prevent further risk of disease from the cause referred to amongst Her Majesty's troops now stationed there?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The sanitary state of the Cavalry Barracks at Windsor is reported to be very good. Two cases of enteric fever have occurred in the Royal Horse Guards. In one case the disease was probably contracted while on leave; the origin of the other case cannot be traced.

TRUST FUNDS AND COLONIAL SECURITIES.

MR. PETER McDONALD (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he can now state the result of his consideration of the question whether permission be given by the Government to Trustees to invest their Trust Funds in Colonial Securities?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I have had no direct communication, as far as I can remember, from the Agents General since the Committee reported, urging me to take action in the matter, TELEGRAPH MESSENGERS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether telegraph messengers are being employed on postmen's duties; and, if so, what wages they are receiving, and whether the proper duties of the telegraph messengers now so employed are performed by boys at wages lower than those usually paid to telegraph messengers?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): A certain number of the older telegraph messengers are being employed upon postmen's duties to fill temporary vacancies, and in order that they may have an opportunity of learning the work. These youths, if found suitable, will be appointed to the postmen's class, and in the meantime are paid wages of 17s. a week. The duties of the telegraph messengers, withdrawn from their ordinary work, are performed by temporary substitutes at the minimum of the telegraph messengers' pay, in accordance with the general rule of the Service.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Can the right hon. Gentleman say how many telegraph messengers are now employed in postmen's duty?

*MR. RAIKES: No, Sir; but I will make inquiry, and let the hon. Member know.

THE DISMISSED POSTMEN.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, having regard to the good character of the dismissed postmen and their urgent distress, he will give them the preference for temporary employment during the Christmas "pressure" of work? I have also to ask whether postal employés will render themselves liable to dismissal or other official punishment by collecting subscriptions, either from the public or from their brother officers, for the dismissed postmen, who, with their wives and families, are on the verge of starvation?

*MR. RAIKES: For the reasons given yesterday in reply to the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, I regret that no employment in the London Postal Service can be given to the dismissed postmen. Post Office servants can, of course, collect what money they please among themselves; but, except in the case of Christmas boxes, they are forbidden to collect from the public for any object. To this prohibition I regret that no exception can be made.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. JOHN KELLY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can state whether a Treasury Minute, explanatory of the Order in Council, in August last, dealing with the First Division of the Civil Service, will be issued; and, if so, at what date it will be published?

MR. JACKSON: Some Heads of Departments have addressed questions to the Treasury on two or three points in connection with the recent Order in Council, and the Treasury reply, which will most conveniently be in the form of a Minute, is on the point of being issued.

QUEENSLAND.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it is the intention of the Secretary of State for the Colonies to lay upon the Table of this House any further Papers having reference to the erection of the northern portion of Queensland into a separate colony; whether the subject of the formation of such colony has occupied the attention of the Cabinet; and whether he is in a position to state the intention of the Government in the matter?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): It is not proposed to present any Papers immediately, as the correspondence is in an incomplete state, but Papers will be presented at the proper time. The subject has received the attention of Her Majesty's Government, but I am not yet in a position to make any statement with regard to it.

HOUSE DUTY AND INCOME TAX.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will take steps to allow to owners of houses under £25 assessment a discount off the House Duty and Income Tax, as is now done by the Local Authorities with regard to the Rates, on condition that the owner pays for the whole year, whether the property is let or unlet?

*MR. GOSCHEN: There is no reason for allowing a discount "to owners of houses under £25" off House Duty and Income Tax, because House Duty is a tenant's tax and payable by him, and because an owner is only bound to allow Income Tax (Schedule A) on actual rent received; and if the house be void for any quarter, relief is afforded from the Income Tax charge under the 70th section of the Act 5 & 6 Vic., cap. 35.

MR. MORTON: I beg, further, to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will take steps to make the assessment of property on which House Duty and Income Tax are collected the same as that used (the rateable value) by the Local Authorities, so that the assessments for Imperial and Local Taxation may be uniform?

*MR. GOSCHEN: A common basis of value is an almost indispensable condition of the proposal of the hon. Member; but the whole suggestion involves Budget considerations of too great a difficulty to be dealt with in the limits of an answer across the floor of the House.

WATER SUPPLY IN EGYPT.

SIR JOHN SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any communications have been recently received from Her Majesty's Agent and Consul General in Egypt with reference to the summer supply of water in that country for agricultural and sanitary purposes; whether the repairs of the barrage have given satisfactory results; whether the water supply of Alexandria during the season of low Nile in 1888, 1889, and 1890, has been improved in quality and quantity by the changes effected by the Irrigation Department; and whether, in case communications relating to this subject have been received by Her Majesty's Government from Her Majesty's Agent and Consul General in Cairo, these communications, or the substance of them, will be laid upon the Table?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): As to the first and fourth paragraphs, information with reference to the summer supply of water will be given in the Papers respecting the condition of Egypt about to be distributed. The repairs to the barrage have given very satisfactory results. We have no information as to the water supply of Alexandria during low Nile.

THE POSTAL AND TELEGRAPH SERVICE.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he can state when the revised scheme for the superior officers of the Postal and Telegraph Service, which has already been applied in Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Newcastle, Bristol, and Leeds, will be extended to Nottingham, Derby, Leicester, Oxford, Northampton, Cambridge, Coventry, and to offices in similar towns?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that the case of most of the larger post offices is under examination at the present time with reference to the pay and position of the superior officers, but I am not yet able to state what changes may be found necessary in the particular instances referred to. I can, however, assure the hon. Member that the matter is receiving my anxious consideration, and that there shall be no avoidable delay in dealing with it.

THE CUSTOMS.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the agreement which, on the 24th April, 1890, had been practically arrived at between the Commissioner of Customs and the Treasury as regards the future status and rates of pay of the men engaged on statistical abstracting in the Customs Department, has yet been put into formal shape; and, if not, whether he can state the cause of the delay?

MR. JACKSON: Some difficulties of detail occurred in giving effect to the re-arrangement of the Statistical Abstrating Department of the Customs, to which the hon. Member refers. These difficulties have now been solved, and we shall at once inform the Customs of our decision in the matter.

THE IRISH MAILS.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that, by the proposed mail route from London, via Stranraer and Larne, to Belfast and the North of Ireland, the English mails would reach Belfast at 8.47 a.m., Ballymena at 9.2 a.m., and Derry at 11.22 a.m., whereas the earliest hour at which the English mails, via Holyhead, now reach Belfast is 10.25 a.m.; whether he will state at what time they reach Derry and Ballymena; and whether, considering the great advantage which these and many other towns in Ulster would derive from the accelerated service by Larne and Stranraer, he will state when he can give a definite answer as to the adoption of this route?

*MR. RAIKES: I am not unaware of the advantages which might be expected from the adoption of the Larne route, but a proposal has been made to me for an acceleration of the existing service from Dublin to Belfast, and this must be carefully examined in conjunction with the first scheme. According to the Time Table furnished in connection with the proposal to which the hon. Member refers, the English mails would be due at the times mentioned. They now reach Derry at 12.15 p.m., and Ballymena at 12.18 p.m.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he has not been carefully considering the subject for some time with the view of solving the difficulty?

*MR. RAIKES: No time will be lost by me in arriving at a decision.

THE CASE OF MR. WALSH.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland when the first warrant for Mr. Walsh, of the Cashel Sentinel, was signed, and who signed it, and on what ground was it delayed?

Mr. Jackson

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): I have already said that the County Court Judge, with whom the matter rested, is not under the control of the Government.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Why was the second warrant held over and not put in force? Under what statute did the police act?

MR. MADDEN: I have already told the hon. Member that the second warrant was put in force after the termination of the imprisonment under the first warrant. This course is in compliance with the regulation of the Royal Irish Constabulary.

MR. T. M. HEALY: This is a matter of vital importance. I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that there is no statute, and that it was only the regulations of the Constabulary that were acted upon. Are those regulations in accordance with the law? I ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman as a lawyer to examine the statute, and to see whether what has taken place is in accordance with the Petty Sessions Act. Will he as a lawyer say that the Royal Constabulary Code is in conformity with the statute?

MR. MADDEN: Yes.

MATRONS AT POLICE STATIONS.

SIR ROBERT FOWLER: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent progress has been made in the employment of women as resident matrons or caretakers at police stations in London and the provinces; and have any police stations in London and the provinces been yet appropriated exclusively to the reception of females under arrest; and, if so, how many are there of such stations?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Commissioner of Police that this question is now under the consideration of a Board of experienced officers, who will shortly make a Report; and I await that Report before taking any further steps. The answer to the last paragraph is in the negative, as far as London is concerned, and I am not aware that any police stations are appropriated to this purpose in the provinces.

SAVINGS BANK DEPARTMENT.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General, with respect to the fact that the two officers who happened to deliver a Memorial addressed to the Treasury, and signed by upwards of 350 officers of the Savings Bank Department, have been transferred to other branches of the Post Office, it being alleged against them that they are responsible for the publication of the Memorial in the Evening News and Post, notwithstanding their emphatic denial of the charge, whether either the Postmaster General or the Controller of the Savings Bank has received a further request that the Memorial be withdrawn from further consideration; and whether, in view of the foregoing, and also of the increasing difficulties connected with the work of the Department, he will take steps to appoint a Committee of Inquiry into the grievances complained of by the officers concerned?

*MR. RAIKES: I beg to say, in answer to the first question of the hon. Member, that I have received a request from certain officers of the Savings Bank Department that the Memorial to which he refers may be withdrawn from further consideration. In reply to the second question, I beg leave to say that I see no necessity for the appointment of a Committee of Inquiry. It is the fact that the two officers referred to, and to whom a confidential communication from myself to the memorialists was entrusted, have been transferred to other branches of the Post Office in consequence of these documents having been divulged. They were afforded an opportunity for explanation, but failed, in my judgment, to divest themselves of responsibility for this proceeding. Every officer in the Department is well aware that official communications between the Minister and the staff are strictly confidential; and it would, indeed, be impossible for departmental questions to be discussed freely between the Head of a Department and his officers if this honourable obligation is not recognised. I felt it necessary, therefore, to mark my disapprobation of what has occurred by transferring to other branches officers in whom I could no longer place confidence as intermediaries in any question affecting the Savings Bank.

SCALES AND WEIGHING MACHINES.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware of the great pressure that is being put upon scale and weighing machine manufacturers in order that the requirements of the Act, which will come into operation on 1st January, shall be complied with; and whether the Government will grant an extension of time for affixing the Government stamp to all weighing instruments?

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: The Act which was passed in July, 1889, came into operation on January 1, 1890, and provides that persons who use for trade, after January 1, 1891, any weighing instrument not verified and stamped by an Inspector of Weights and Measures shall be liable to a fine. The Government have no power to extend the date fixed, and it appears to me that unless an Inspector considers that a weighing instrument is not correct, and declines on that account to stamp it, there is no necessity for the interference of a manufacturer to adjust it. With reasonable conduct on the part of the Local Authorities and the traders, I do not see why any difficulty should arise.

PRESUMPTION OF LIFE LIMITATION (SCOTLAND) ACT.

MR. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he will introduce legislation to amend "The Presumption of Life Limitation (Scotland) Act, 1881?"

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): During the Recess I shall be happy to consider whether there are any considerable number of cases not covered by the Statute.

IRELAND—THE CONGESTED DISTRICTS.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Reports made by the Inspectors, as to the state of the Congested Districts, will be presented to Parliament?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Yes, Sir; it is my intention to include the Reports of the Irish Local Government Inspectors among the Papers to be laid upon the Table on the subject mentioned.

THE LAND PURCHASE BILL.

MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as the moneys of the Sinking Fund are to be all re-lent or re-lendable for long periods under the Land Purchase Bill, if he would state what monies will be available for the redemption of the original land Stock?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The moneys of the Sinking Fund are not to be re-lent. They are to be applied as a Sinking Fund. Supposing £1,000,000 had been lent, in the first year there would be £40,000 payable on the £1,000,000 as an annuity, of which £10,000 would go to the Sinking Fund and might be employed in cancelling £10,000 of Guaranteed Stock. In consequence, at the beginning of the next year there would be only £990,000 of that Stock, and there would be £10,000 to lend again, bringing up the sum to the original £1,000,000. By such a process the amount of the Guaranteed Stock not covered would never exceed the £1,000,000. Or, again, the £10,000 might be invested in Consols, and the Consols themselves and the interest thereon would stand as an asset in favour of the Fund.

MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is not the case that under the system which he has described it would be necessary to issue fresh Stock on the occasion of re-lending?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Yes; it would; £10,000 would be cancelled, and £10,000 would be freshly issued. Consequently, the total would stand as it was at the commencement. Under that process the total would never exceed £30,000,000, which would be covered by the security.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): Will the right hon. Gentleman lay on the Table a Return showing the effect of the accumulated Sinking Fund under the Land Purchase Act?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I will confer with my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, and see what we can do.

SOUTH-EAST AFRICA—AFFRAY IN MUTACA'S COUNTRY.

MR. BRYCE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can now give the House any further information regarding the recent reported affray near Mutaca's Kraal, in South-East Africa, between the police employed by the British South Africa Company and the Portuguese; and if he can make any statement as to the progress of negotiations with Portugal, regarding her relations to Great Britain, of the two countries in South-East Africa, and the means to be taken for averting disputes and collisions between the subjects of the two Governments?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No information has been received from the Cape except the telegram already quoted. Portuguese reports give a different version, stating that the British were the aggressors; but we have no reason to doubt the accuracy of the statements forwarded by the High Commissioner. The latest step in the negotiations is the conclusion of the modus vivendi. The necessity of observing this has been strongly impressed on the South Africa Company, and it is understood that the Portuguese Government is equally anxious to secure its observance. It is hoped that there will be no more collisions between the employés of the rival companies, but they are beyond the immediate control of the Governments.

MR. BRYCE: May I ask whether Papers will be laid upon the Table before the House re-assembles?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I cannot say when the Papers will be produced, as it is manifest that the Government must wait until the Despatches arrive before laying the Papers upon the Table.

MR. BUCHANAN: Will the Papers referring to the modus vivendi be laid upon the Table?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No doubt those Papers will be presented.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the governing body of Christ's Hospital has been appointed, and when the names will be gazetted?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to answer this question. The time fixed by the scheme for Christ's Hospital, for the completion of the body of almoners, has been extended by an Order of the Charity Commissioners to the 15th inst.; and the like time for the completion of the body of governors so constituted (in which body these almoners are included) has been similarly extended to the 1st of January, 1891. No provision is made in that scheme for the publication in the London Gazette, or otherwise, of the names of the persons appointed in pursuance of the scheme to be governors or almoners.

PROFESSOR KOCH'S CURE FOR TUBERCULAR DISEASES.

MR. ERNEST SPENCER (West Bromwich): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture if he has yet received any of Professor Koch's fluid for the cure of tubercular diseases; and whether it can be obtained, on application to the officials of his Department, by the authorities of recognised public institutions?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The Board of Agriculture has applied for a small quantity of Professor Koch's fluid for purposes of experiment upon animals, but we have not yet received it, and, consequently, it cannot be obtained on application to the officials of the Department.

"MITCHELL V. REGINA."

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Attorney General if he will lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Allocatur or taxed costs of the Crown in "Mitchell v. Regina," amounting to £160 15s. 6d., and dated 8th May, 1890, and inform this House if it is true that the following is written on it:—

"By consent of the parties I hereby cancel this Allocatur.

"(Signed.)

"W. F. ARCHIBALD, June 18th, 1890.

"A Master of the Supreme Court of Judicature."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): There is no necessity to lay upon the Table a Copy of the Allocatur. The Crown did not press for the costs of the proceedings out of consideration for Colonel Mitchell, and at his request, on the distinct arrangement in writing that Colonel Mitchell's supposed claim should not again be raised in any shape.

THE CROFTER DISTRICTS.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government are now able to state what action they contemplate to give effect to the Report of the Commission appointed to inquire into the question of Public Works in the Crofter Districts of Scotland?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Report in question is receiving careful examination by the Secretary for Scotland in conjunction with the Chancellor of the Exchequer and myself, and we believe that we shall be in a position to submit proposals to Parliament with reference to the recommendations made by the Commissioners shortly after the re-assembling of the House.

WATER SUPPLY OF LONDON.

MR. LAWSON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, on the re-assembling of Parliament, he will ask the House to appoint a Select Committee to consider the various Public and Private Bills affecting the water supply of the Metropolis, and the method of assessing the charges thereon, introduced this Session?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government are not in a position to state what course they will advise the House to adopt with regard to the various Bills affecting the water supply of the Metropolis until the Bills have been printed and are before the House.

LOANS TO IRISH TENANTS.

MR. FINUCANE (Limerick, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether the Government will lend money to the Irish farmers at the same rate of interest charged by a previous Government to the landlords in the year 1879, for the purpose of—first, executing useful works on their farms; and, secondly, of giving employment to the agricultural labourers during the next six months?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am obliged to the hon. Gentleman for having given me notice of his question and for the letter with which he accompanied it. I do not, however, think it would be advisable to comply with the implied suggestion which it contains. In most of the districts where serious distress may be apprehended there are no large farmers, and relatively few agricultural labourers, the population consisting almost entirely of small occupiers. Moreover, many of the objections which apply to the system adopted in 1879 for lending money to landlords apply, though with less equal force, to the proposal made by the hon. Gentleman.

MUSIC AT FRIENDLY SOCIETY MEETINGS.

MR. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Home Secretary whether at the meetings of lodges of Masons, Oddfellows, Foresters, Druids, and other Societies on licensed premises, when only members of the Society are present, piano playing and singing are forbidden; and, if so, under which Act are the members of those Societies (who number many thousands) precluded from participating in such innocent amusement?

MR. MATTHEWS: The question is hardly definite enough for me to give a very satisfactory answer. I may say, however, that the only general Act bearing on the subject is the 20th George II., c. 36; and, speaking generally, the penalties in that Act fall upon the owner of the house, and not upon the visitors. Moreover, the police do not in practice interfere unless there is proof of actual disorderly conduct, immorality, or real mischief.

MR. W. ISAACSON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that last week the police summoned members of one of these Societies for playing the piano and singing?

MR. MATTHEWS: No; I am not aware of it.

NATIONAL EDUCATION BOARD (IRELAND).

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.), for Dr. KENNY (Cork, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether a vacancy is expected in the post of Catholic Chief of Inspection, under the National Education Board, Ireland; whether such vacancy, both by right and custom, belongs to the Catholic Inspectors of National Schools; and whether it is the intention of the Government to go outside the ranks of Catholic Inspectors in making the appointment; and, if so, will he consent not to make any appointment to the expected vacancy during the Recess, in order that the matter may be discussed in the House?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no immediate prospect of any vacancy.

RAILWAYS IN COUNTY DONEGAL.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if any decision has yet been come to for the construction of the railway between Buncrana and Cardonagh, in County Donegal?

MR. JACKSON: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone the question for the present.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LAND DEPARTMENT (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 112.)

Bill considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Committee report Progress, to sit again upon Thursday, 22nd January.

PURCHASE OF LAND AND CONGESTED DISTRICTS (IRELAND) [ADVANCES &c.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"1. That it is expedient to authorise—

(a.) the temporary advance out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of any sums that may be required for making good any deficiency in the Land Purchase Account for the payment of dividends on guaranteed Land Stock and payments to the Sinking Fund;

(b.) an annual Exchequer contribution of £40,000 out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom to the Guarantee Fund.

(c.) the payment out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of the salaries of the Land Commissioners.

"2. That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of the salaries, remuneration, and administrative expenses of the Congested Districts Board, in pursuance of any Act of the present Session relating to the Purchase of Land in Ireland, the Land Commission, and the Congested Districts in Ireland."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

(4.32.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I understand from Her Majesty's Government that the pledge of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury was that no further stage beyond the Second Reading would be taken of any of these measures. We have allowed the Government in connection with these two Bills to take another stage—one that I understood was reserved for after the Christmas holidays.

(4.33.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Progress cannot be made in Committee with this Bill until a formal Resolution has been passed, which Resolution was included in the programme of the Government—that is to say, the programme of business to be taken before the adjournment for the Christmas holidays.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I refer not to the arrangements of the Government, but to the pledge of the right hon. Gentleman. I apprehend that the right hon. Gentleman stated that the Government would not press these Bills beyond the Second Reading stage, but they have now achieved a further stage, which has prevented Instructions being moved on going into Committee.

(4.34.) MR. W. H. SMITH: The pledge I gave to the House was that no progress should be made in Committee on the Bill until after the Christmas Recess, but it was distinctly understood that all the steps necessary to get the Speaker out of the Chair should be disposed of, and the Money Resolution is one of those steps.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I will say no more on the point, but I hope the Irish Members will have sufficient notice given them of the intention of the Government to make effective progress in Committee on the Land Bills. I understand from the Government that the early part of the January Sitting will be occupied with the Tithe and the Scotch Private Legislation Bills. That is, no doubt, right and proper; but I think we should have a few days' notice of the Irish Bills, so as to enable us to put down our Amendments. We do not want to spend our Christmas in preparing Amendments. We cannot be expected to devote our whole lives to work of this kind. We ought to have ample notice as to when effective progress will be made with the Irish Bills in Committee.

(4.36.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I will undertake that the effective notice which the hon. Member requires shall be given. I think the hon. Member will agree that that is a course which has always been adopted by the Government, at the request of the Irish Members. No Bill other than the Scotch Private Legislation Bill and the Tithe Bill will be proceeded with in Committee before January 29th; and if the Tithe Bill is not through Committee on that date, no other Bill will be proceeded with in Committee on that date. The hon. Member will see by the progress made with the Tithe Bill and the Scotch business whether the attendance of himself and his friends will be requisite. However, I will undertake that ample notice of the Land Bills shall be given.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported upon Thursday, 22nd January.

TRAMWAYS ORDER IN COUNCIL (IRELAND) (ATHENRY AND TUAM RAILWAY) BILL.—(No. 157.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(4.39.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Owing to this Bill not having been printed yesterday the House was not able to pass it through all its stages, as was intended. Even if the House agrees to pass it through all its stages at the present Sitting, it cannot become law before Parliament re-assembles in January, because it will be impossible to pass it through the House of Lords. Still, if all the stages are passed by this House, I think action may be taken on the Bill by the company, although it has not formally become law. I therefore suggest that all the stages should be taken at once.

Bill read a second time, and committed; considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT (CHRISTMAS RECESS).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House, at its rising, do adjourn till Thursday, 22nd January, 1891."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

(4.42.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berkshire): I would point out that great inconvenience will be caused to Scotch Members if the Scotch Private Legislation Bill is taken on the day of the meeting of Parliament. It has always been the custom to put off measures affecting the extreme parts of the Kingdom to some day after the day of the meeting of the House. Scotch Members have no sort of idea of offering undue or obstructive opposition to the measure. I think Thursday, January 29th, would be a more convenient day.

(4.43.) Mr. A. ELLIOT (Roxburgh): I consider it inconvenient not to go on on the earliest possible day with a measure we are interested in, and I may say, on behalf of the Scotch Members, that we have reason to feel considerable disappointment at no progress having been made with Scotch business before Christmas, seeing that there has been time and to spare. We could have made progress with Scotch business, and could have resumed the consideration of the Bills at the stage at which they were left when we met again after the holidays. I would protest against taking away precedence from the Scotch measure dealing with Private Bill legislation, as it is desirable that it should be passed with the utmost expedition. The Bill has been before the House year after year, either in the hands of private Members or in the hands of the Government, and yet we have made no progress with it. Scotland is anxious that the Bill should pass, and there are not many signs that it is likely to be opposed on its merits by Scotch Members; therefore, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury to keep the measure well to the fore, giving it the earliest possible place on the Paper.

(4.45.) Mr. COX (Clare, E.): Before the House adjourns it would be satisfactory—to the Irish Members, at any rate—to know from the Chief Secretary whether he intends placing on the Table of the House the Reports of the two engineers he has appointed to make inquiries as to remunerative and useful works for the relief of distress in Ireland. I think it would be useful if he would state whether the Report will be submitted during the Recess or after the re-assembling of the House.

Mr. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): I think the Ashbourne Act has been more in operation in East Waterford than in any other district in the South of Ireland. I have received four large Memorials from tenants who have purchased on various estates. One Memorial is signed by tenants who purchased on Lane Fox's property, another by tenants who purchased on property owned by Mrs. Curtis, and I have an immense Memorial here signed by nearly all the tenants on the Curraghmore Estate. The tenants on the Marquess of Waterford's Estate say they are in arrear. Many of them are very largely in arrear. Though the potato crop has not been a complete failure, the yield has been much below the average. The yield of butter, too, has been very small. There have been several sales on the Curraghmore property owing to the tenants' failure to pay their instalments, and in some cases the Marquess of Waterford has re-purchased the holdings. I take it that when the Bill became law it was intended that landlords should not re-purchase holdings. At a Board of Guardians' meeting last week a man who had purchased his holding at 18 years' value applied for relief. He was unable to keep up the instalments, and those conversant with the property say his is only a typical case, and that before many years pass many more men will be compelled to apply for outdoor relief. Some people will say they made the bargains with their eyes open, and they have no one to blame but themselves. But we must acknowledge that when a person is in arrear, and likely to be thrown on the roadside, he is not in a condition to make a fair bargain, and many men in that position will accept terms which conscientiously they cannot fulfil, in the hope of putting off the evil day. The prayer of those who have signed the Memorials to the Land Commission is that the term for paying their instalments should be increased from 49 to 69 years. Some may say that is a very unreasonable proposal. Yes; but I presume you want dual ownership to end. I submit that in the interest of the community, and of the carrying out of the spirit of the Ashbourne Act, the prayer of the memorialists is worthy of the serious consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

(4.49.) Mr. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I hope sincerely the First Lord of the Treasury will not accede to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks) with regard to the Scotch Private Bill Procedure Bill. I trust that this Bill, which the burghs of Scotland are extremely anxious to see passed into law, will receive the assent of the House, but there will be considerable difficulty in attaining such an object if the Bill is put behind other very important Bills with which the Session is already weighted.

(4.50.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I desire to refer to another Scotch Bill—the Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill. The other day the Lord Advocate renewed the offer of the Government to take the Bill if it could be taken unopposed. The right hon. and learned Gentleman also said the Government could not see their way to give any time for progress with regard to the Bill. I cannot help thinking that the Government are somewhat unreasonable. The Bill consists of 531 clauses, and therefore it is not unreasonable to expect the Government to give some time to its consideration. I wish now to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, if a private Member brings in this Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, the Government will give him some benevolent assistance, so that the measure may be passed if possible. It interests the whole of the smaller burghs in Scotland and some of the larger burghs too, and under these circumstances I hope more reasonable counsels will prevail with the Government.

(4.52.) DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to yield to the appeal which has been made to him by my right hon. Friend. I do not do so on the ground of the convenience of the Scotch Members. The convenience of some of us must be sacrificed, and I should be sorry to find Scotch Members making more of their convenience than others. But the Bill is a most important one in view of the principle it involves. The question has never been threshed out in the House at all. It was the subject of debate last Wednesday, but has never been debated as a Government measure and in a full House. It affects not only Scotland, but every English Railway Company that has running powers over Scotch lines. I am as little enamoured of the system of Private Bill legislation as anyone in this House, and should be glad to see it amended, but I think that when the question is dealt with it should be discussed by all the Members of the House, as embodying a plan which sooner or later will be extended to the other portions of the kingdom. It would certainly not be a wise thing to proceed with a measure of this sort in an empty House in the first days after the Recess.

*(4.55.) MR. C. S. PARKER (Perth): I so far agree with the hon. Member who has just sat down that I think it would be a mistake on the part of the Government to insist on great haste in dealing with a Bill that is generally approved of in point of principle, but which it would be scarcely safe to pass rapidly in a very thin House. If it should be put forward on the first day of the resumed Session I intend to be in my place to take part in the Debate upon it. It is, however, a Bill that ought to be discussed by English as well as Scotch Members. With reference to the Burgh Police Bill, the City of Perth is much interested in its becoming law. It has been exhaustively discussed both in Parliament and locally in Scotland. The opposition to it is limited to a very few Members, and it appears to me that if Scotland is to have confidence in the Imperial Parliament for Scottish legislation the Government ought to make an effort in favour of a Bill so well supported by Scottish opinion.

*(4.57.) MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I wish to support the appeal to the Government that the Private Legislation Bill should be postponed for a few days. I think the popularity of the measure is considerably exaggerated in the minds of those who have spoken in its favour. No doubt, a change of some kind is required, but the Bill deals with questions of great difficulty and importance, and it would be very undesirable to let it be rushed through a thin House. I should think the Tithes Bill will fully occupy the attention of the Government at the beginning of the next Sittings, and it is only reasonable to ask that the Bill to which I refer should be postponed for a week or so. As to the other measure, it is a Government Bill, and is almost unanimously approved in Scotland. It was considered for two months by a Select Committee, and when it was ripe for passing and ready to pass, it was only prevented from becoming law by a supporter of the Government putting down two or three pages of Amendments when there was only one day left. Under these circumstances, I think we have a somewhat special claim upon the consideration of the Government.

(4.59.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): There are two sides to the question of the Burgh Police Bill. I quite agree that it contains much valuable matter and many useful clauses. If the Government would consent to make the Bill permissive, as many people in Scotland meant it, I for one, and I think many of those who oppose it, would be inclined to withdraw our opposition. If, however, it is to be imposed on all the small burghs the Government must expect strong opposition to it.

*(5.0.) MR. J. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I desire to elicit a piece of information from the Chief Secretary with regard to a very important matter raised to-day by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre). He has on the Paper a Motion in which he moves for a Return, and we have just heard the Chancellor of the Exchequer in replying to my right hon. Friend intimate that he would give some sort of Return, though I did not exactly gather whether or not it would, as promised, satisfy the terms of the Motion of my right hon. Friend. In this connection I wish to fortify the Chief Secretary in making this Return as full as possible, and in doing this I would remind the House of a circumstance which is not likely to be forgotten, namely, that, on the occasion of bringing in the former Land Purchase Bill last Session, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, or the leader of the House—I have forgotten which—gave a pledge in response to the request of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, who expressed the desire that the Government would, in asking the House to deal with such a complex measure, lay as many Returns and Papers as possible on the Table so as to enable the House to arrive at a correct judgment on the many involved and important points in the Bill. The Government gave the desired assurance, and produced certain Papers on the last occasion when this Land Purchase question was before us. Reminding the Government of this, I now beg them to give us an assurance that the Return the Chancellor of the Exchequer has promised shall give information in full, so as to satisfy the terms of the Motion and completely meet all the points raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford.

(5.2.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I wish to make an appeal to the Chief Secretary on the matter raised by my hon. Friend the Member for East Waterford (Mr. P. J. Power). He has informed the House as to the condition of the tenantry of the Lane Fox estate and Lord Waterford's estate, and what I ask the Chief Secretary to do is this. The right hon. Gentleman has assented to the Motion of the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) for laying before the House the Judgment given by Chief Baron Palles in the well-known case of Mr. O'Brien Dalton. Will he also lay upon the Table of the House two Judgments of Mr. Commissioner Lynch in relation to certain of Lord Waterford's tenants, delivered a couple of years ago in the cases of "Welch v. Waterford" and "somebody else v. Waterford"? These Judgments show the genesis of the difficulties on Lord Waterford's estate. I learn from a report in a local newspaper that one of the tenants on the estate has become a pauper a year after he became the purchaser of his holding. The man was made a freeholder, he was rooted in the soil, and in consequence of the manner in which this operation was carried out he became an applicant for Poor Law relief. He went into the Land Court to buy under crowbar pressure, and the Land Court Judge gave his Judgment that this crowbar pressure was not duress. Mr. Foley went before the Guardians of the Union for relief as a destitute and evicted tenant. He was evicted by the Land Commission, and observe, no sooner was he evicted than Lord Waterford bought back from the Commissioners his own holding. Now, I call this "bulling" the market. The landlord having parted with his shares—I call the land his shares—his shares in Irish land at a high price, I will call it par; then, they having fallen in value, say 50 per cent., he purchases back the shares from the Commission, and pockets a handsome dividend by the transaction. Now this is a very serious state of things, and we prophesied that it would arise. We pointed out what would be likely to happen, and in the result you have the Waterford tenants evicted, and one of them appealing to the Carrick-on-Suir Board of Guardians for out-door relief. Is this not a painful position? Mr. Foley was asked several questions as to his tenure, and questions elicited the information that he purchased at 18 years on the old rent, which was reduced by £10. He was asked to purchase or to give up the land. Mr. Thompson, a Tory Guardian, asked how much rent was owing to Lord Waterford, and Mr. Foley said two years. Lord Waterford forgave him I suppose, as it is called, the 10 years' rent. He got 18 years' purchase on the old rent from the Land Commission. Now, I suppose the Chief Secretary will not pretend that it is acting from a statesmanlike view or from purely patriotic motives to conceal the truth upon these matters, and I ask him to lay on the Table the Judgment of Commissioner Lynch that it is not duress to compel a tenant, under threat of eviction, to buy at a given rate. I really cannot see the position of the Chief Secretary. He has struck out, I believe, all limitation of years' purchase. I understand in the old Bill the limit was 20 years, but now there is no limit, and we shall see the result. I beg of him, claiming conscientious motives as he does in forcing on this Purchase Bill—in forcing Irish tenants to buy at a rate fixed by the Land Commissioners under landlord pressure—I ask him, in the name of Heaven, if Ireland is to be a going concern under a Home Rule, Liberal, or Tory Government, not to load down under a horrible dead weight of debt miserable, impoverished tenants, forced to buy at a ruinous rate. Some of the Lane Fox tenants came to me and the late Mr. Biggar when we were in the district, and our advice was, Buy if you can get the land at a desirable rate. Mr. Biggar was most emphatic. You may say that dishonest motives prompt this begging for a reduction now, and that the tenants have money in the stocking or the Savings Bank, but I do not believe you have so demoralised the Irish people that a body of them would be guilty of such a course of conduct, except under the greatest stress of circumstances. The Chief Secretary is willing to lay before us a Judgment of Chief Baron Palles whenever it is in his favour, though he refuses it when it is against him; but will he lay on the Table these Judgments of Commissioner Lynch? That the right hon. Gentleman approves of the actions of Mr. Commissioner Lynch we know from the fact that that gentleman's salary is to be raised by £1,000 a year. I do not see my way to support the suggestion that the number of years over which payments should be spread should be extended. I would not recommend it, for this reason: the more the period is extended, and the smaller the payments, the greater will be the bait held out to the smaller tenants to buy on the landlords' terms. I know that on the Duke of Leinster's estates, Lord Waterford's estates, and other estates in which I am deeply interested, there is a feeling in favour of a term of 69 years, and I know this will be an additional inducement to tenants to come to terms with their landlords. I do not advise that now; later on, perhaps, matters may be regarded in a different light upon the general policy of purchase. We may now fairly ask that we shall have laid down and placed before us the exact principles upon which the Land Commissioners will work, and we can have no better guide than the result of the purchases by the Waterford tenants.

(5.12.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I will first refer to the matters raised by the hon. Member for Waterford and the hon. and learned Member who has just spoken. I am asked to lay upon the Table a copy of the Judgment of Mr. Lynch in a certain case—

MR. T. M. HEALY: Two Judgments.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In certain cases connected with sales of Lord Waterford's property. Well, I will at once inquire from Mr. Lynch if any authentic report of his Judgment exists, and I shall be happy to lay a copy on the Table of the House for the convenience of hon. Members who may wish through this means to make themselves acquainted with the methods adopted by the Commission in settling the terms upon which purchases have been effected. The hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy) seems to agree with the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. P. J. Power) in thinking that there was some undue profit given to Lord Waterford by permitting him to buy back land which had previously been sold to a tenant, subject, of course, to the annuity placed on the land by the process of sale. Well, if Lord Waterford gained by the transaction, it is evident that the terms were good upon which he sold to the tenant. He will not be able to sub-let without the consent of the Commissioners; and if Lord Waterford buys back the land, subject to the sale annuity, the tenant would pay, and, subject to the unavoidable difficulties of cultivation by the landlord, it conclusively proves that the tenant to whom the sale was effected must have had an uncommonly good bargain.

MR. T. M. HEALY: He captured the tenants' interest.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: But I do not understand, so far as the facts have been laid before us, that there are any grounds for supposing this was a hard case for the tenant. We are informed that the sale was effected at 18 years' purchase, and, so far as my mental arithmetic goes, it will be found that involves a reduction in the previous rent paid by the tenant of 28 per cent. Now, I do not think the payment of rent reduced by 28 per cent. can be regarded as excessively hard upon the man who pays it. The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. P. J. Power) pressed upon me the desirability of acceding to the terms of the Petition he read to the House, and of extending the term over which the payment is required from 49 to 69 years. The hon. Member for Longford objects to that proposal, and I agree with his objection; and, other terms of purchase being fairly settled, my own view is that the period of repayment should be adhered to. It will be noted by the House that I have no power to interfere. Nothing but legislation can effect the change, and I am sure the House will pause for a long time before making the alteration. Then the hon. Member for Clare (Mr. Cox) asks me to lay upon the Table the Reports of the two engineers in relation to such public works as are intended to be undertaken in the West of Ireland. These Reports are not, I think, of a character to be safely laid upon the Table, because they do not give a list of the works actually going to be executed; they consist of plans and observations on possible works that might, should necessity arise, be undertaken. It would be inexpedient to raise false hopes by detailing a large number of works only some of which, should necessity arise, are ever likely to be carried out. The hon. Member for Elgin (Mr. Keay) asks if I will lay on the Table a full table showing the financial scheme of Purchase Bill No. 1. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated earlier in to-day's proceedings that he would consult with me and endeavour to lay such a table before the House, and the hon. Member may be assured that the pledge so given will be fulfilled. We will do everything we can to make the working of the scheme perfectly clear to every hon. Member. I think I have dealt with all the points that have been raised.

(5.18.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): The Scotch Bill, so far as I can learn, seems to be a very suitable Bill to put down for the first business on re-assembling after Christmas, for the reason that it seems to have little interest to Members generally. But my object in rising is to try to extract from the First Lord of the Treasury a promise that he will show some respect to private Members' nights. During this extra Sitting we gave up our time to the Government in order that this ante-Christmas Session might come to an end as early as possible. But now I hope we may look forward to our Tuesdays and Fridays, and I hope we may have some assurance from the Government that our nights on those days will be respected. It is rather hard, after we have obtained an opportunity in the Ballot, carefully prepared our subject, and secured the assistance of our friends to keep a House, that we should suddenly have our opportunity taken from us at a very few days' notice. I hope also that when the Government do consider themselves under the necessity of asking for a larger share of the time of the House, they will take the whole of one private Members' night, and not as they did last Session—institute Morning Sittings at an early period, thus practically depriving private Members of both opportunities. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, after a Morning Sitting devoted to Government business, it is almost impossible to make a House at 9 o'clock except for a subject of the greatest interest. So far as I am concerned as a private Member, I desire to retain one night; and if the right hon. Gentleman finds he must infringe upon our time, let him lay hold of the whole of one of the nights—Tuesday or Friday—and leave us the other. I think we may fairly claim so much consideration having regard to the spirit we have all shown during the Sittings of the last few days, assisting the Government to make extraordinary progress with their Bills. The Government might, I think, reciprocate by some concession to the rights and privileges of private Members.

(5.22.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I regret that the Chief Secretary is not now in his place, but I am glad to see the Attorney General for Ireland there, for I take advantage of the Motion now before the House to try and get some assurance in regard to two or three public works within my own constituency. I refer to the three light railway works mainly promoted by private enterprise, and in the present lamentable condition of affairs I trust we may have a full assurance that every possible assistance will be given towards the promotion of these works. Also I would invite an expression of opinion in regard to the lamentable condition of the poor in the Schull Union, upon which many representations have been made. Immediate action is necessary; the state of affairs does not admit of delay. The district is not within my own constituency; its Representative is absent through ill-health. Further—and I am putting these matters briefly as thus being more likely to get a satisfactory reply—I would ask that attention should be paid to the representations of Father O'Connor, the parish priest of Achill, as to the starving condition of the poor people there, and that the Government should provide some means of employment and assistance for this population.

(5.24.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): In reference to what has fallen from the hon. Member who has just spoken, I have to say that my right hon. Friend and Her Majesty's Government are fully cognisant of their duty and responsibilities in the matters the hon. Member has alluded to. The hon. Member for Poplar (Mr. Sydney Buxton) has asked me to give a pledge in regard to private Members' nights, such as I think it would be scarcely prudent for me now to give. It is a very serious thing to give such pledges. We have the greatest possible regard for the privileges of private Members, and I desire that they should exercise those privileges to the fullest extent. Hon. Members have it in their power to give to the Government all the time that is considered necessary by facilitating the progress of Government measures, and by assisting the Government to pass those measures into law. If hon. Members opposite will assist the Government to the same extent as no doubt they have done in the course of the present Session, there will be little occasion to interfere with the privileges of private Members on the resumption of the Sittings after the holidays, but the hon. Member cannot expect me to make any engagement which would prevent the Government from carrying forward their own measures with reasonable speed. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks) objects to the consideration of the Scotch Legislation Bill being appointed as the first business when we renew our Sittings, and I am always placed in a position of difficulty when these objections are urged—one portion of the House desiring progress should be made in one direction, other Members in another. Unfortunately, it is not in my power, much as I should like to do so, to meet the desire of every individual Member, but I may remind the right hon. Gentleman that the Government are only going to advance the Scotch Private Legislation Bill to the stage at which the other Bills in the programme of the Government have arrived. We want to get the Bill into Committee, and it will then take its place among our other Bills. The right hon. Gentleman says he and other Members concerned have no objection on principle to the measure, and it is the principle that has to be considered on the Motion for Second Reading. It is not a measure of the first importance, but it is one whose adoption has been urged on the House many times by hon. Gentlemen from Scotland. The Government, therefore, feel bound to make an effort in the course of the present Session to pass the Bill; and I think that, on the whole, I am consulting the convenience of hon. Members and the interest of the measure by asking the House to proceed with its consideration on the re-assembling of Parliament. As the right hon. Gentleman approves of the principle of the measure, he need not be put to the inconvenience of attending on that day. The hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire (Mr. Esslemont) has referred to the Scotch Burgh and Police Bill, and the Government have received information from the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy that if every clause of the 571 the Bill contains, to which he takes exception, were omitted, then there would be no objection to it.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg pardon; that is not what I said. I said that if the Bill were made permissive like the other Bill I would withdraw my opposition.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy and the one or two other Members from Scotland who object to the Bill may be influenced by their colleagues not to avail themselves of the power of obstructing this measure of great domestic interest and importance, so that it may pass into law during the present Session. If hon. Members from Scotland will come to an understanding with one another upon the subject, the Government will certainly afford them an opportunity of passing the measure, giving them that benevolent assistance which is asked for. The Bill has been before the House several times, and has been received on a previous occasion almost without opposition. It ought not to be met by obstruction, which would prevent progress being made not only with that, but with other important measures. I trust that now the House may be able to adjourn, and that we shall meet again in January determined to do our business as well and as efficiently as possible.

Question put, and agreed to.

LAND DEPARTMENT (IRELAND) [SALARIES, &c.]

Committee to consider of authorising the payment, out of the Consolidated Fund, of the salaries, pensions, and superannuation allowances of the Land Commissioners, and the payment out of monies to be provided by Parliament of the salaries, remuneration, and superannuation allowances of the officers of the Land Department, and of the expenses of carrying into effect any Act of the present Session to constitute a Land Department, and to amend the Laws relating to the Purchase of Land in Ireland (Queen's Recommendation signified), upon Thursday, 22nd January.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Six o'clock till Thursday, 22nd January.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 15th December, 1890.

Moved, That the Lord Chancellor be appointed to take the Chair in the Appeal Committee this day in the absence of the Earl of Morley.—(The Lord Watson.)

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned during pleasure.

House resumed.

APPEAL COMMITTEE.

First Report from; read, and agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter past Five o'clock, to Thursday the 22nd of January next, a quarter past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 22nd January, 1891.

NEW PEERS.

The Right Honourable Sir Francis Richard Sandford, K.C.B., having been created Baron Sandford, of Sandford in the county of Salop—Was (in the usual manner) introduced.

Sir Edward Cecil Guinness, Baronet, having been created Baron Iveagh, of Iveagh in the county of Down—Was (in the usual manner) introduced.

The Lord Carrington—Took the oath.

Brought from the Commons; read 1st; and to be printed. (No. 19.)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I take the liberty of asking the noble Marquess whether he can give us any information with regard to the course which is to be adopted in dealing with the business which is likely to come before us.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): I imagine that the course of business in your Lordships' House will depend very much, as in former years, on the action of the other House of Parliament. There are two important Bills now before the other House which are, I think, likely to be here before long. They are the Bill dealing with the tithes—which has been a good deal altered since it was before your Lordships last—and a Bill affecting Scotch Private Business. I have not looked at the Notice Paper, and I do not know what the Notices are; but there is one subject to which I shall have to call the early attention of your Lordships, and that is the question of Standing Committees. I think it is admitted that these Committees have done great good. They have insured the examination not only of the wording and the machinery of Bills, but also of details in which principles are very often involved, and which might be otherwise overlooked. But there has been some question as to the precise arrangement of these Committees in regard to the examination of details which it is desirable should be investigated, and for that purpose I propose to move for a Select Committee of the House to examine into the Standing Orders, and to recommend any changes that may seem desirable. With respect to the further business of the House, I would rather wait to see what other measures are proposed before I reply more particularly to the noble Earl.

CHILDREN'S LIFE INSURANCE BILL.

[H.L.]—(No. 16.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH: In asking your Lordships to be good enough to give a Second Reading to this Bill, I must trouble you with a very few words of explanation. Your Lordships will, doubtless, remember that last year you gave a Second Reading to this Bill, and afterwards referred it to a Select Committee to take evidence and report thereon to the House. The end of the Session came before the Committee were able to report, and it of course put an end both to the Bill and to the Committee. It is, therefore, necessary that the Bill should be re-introduced as a matter of form, in order that they may complete their work. This, my Lords, is precisely the same measure that was introduced by me last Session. I think it right to state, however, that it contains the 2nd clause of the Bill of last Session, commonly known as the "undertaker's clause," and it does so although the Committee resolved that the Bill should be amended by omitting that clause. The reason for its inclusion is not that I desire in the very least the re-enactment of this clause—in point of fact, I was the first in the Committee to move its omission; but having moved its omission, I had no right, until the Committee had finally reported the Bill as amended to your Lordships' House, on my own authority to amend the measure. I therefore feel myself bound to re-introduce the Bill in the same form in which it was presented to your Lordships last year; but, of course, the Resolution to which the Committee came to omit the 2nd clause will take effect when the Bill is reported with Amendments to the House. I thought it necessary to offer this explanation in order to prevent misapprehension out of doors as to the omission of this particular clause, which excited a good deal of opposition, and if it had appeared now without this explanation which I have given your Lordships it might have created misapprehension. I venture, after this explanation, to ask your Lordships to read this Bill a second time, and that it may then be referred to a Select Committee of this House to receive evidence thereon, and to report the Bill with Amendments.

Bill read 2^a (according to order) and referred to a Select Committee.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH: I beg to give notice that to-morrow I shall move the names recommended for the Select Committee.

House adjourned at ten minutes before Five o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 22nd January, 1891.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

IRISH ADMINISTRATION.

MR. PARNELL (Cork): I beg to give notice that on an early day I shall call attention to the administration of the Crimes Act in Ireland, and move a Resolution. I may add that to-morrow I shall ask the leader of the House if he will afford early facilities for discussing the Motion.

QUESTIONS.

HOUSE OF COMMONS SESSIONAL PAPERS.

MR. KNOWLES (Salford, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can arrange that the Annual Index of the Sessional Papers of the House of
The Bishop of Peterborough

Commons shall be so compiled as to include year by year references to all Papers published since the preceding Decennial Index?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I have made inquiry of the officers concerned, and I think it will be possible to give what my hon. Friend desires.

IRISH NATIONAL EDUCATION.

MR. DONAL SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the two teachers who were summoned by the Commissioners of Irish National Education to the July Examination of 1889, as candidates for promotion, and who attended and passed that examination, and whose promotion was deferred, or withheld, have yet been promoted; and, if not, when will they receive the promotion to which their answering at that examination entitled them?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): The Commissioners of National Education report that the claims of both teachers have received careful consideration. One of the teachers has been promoted; the other, owing to want of success in school keeping, could not be promoted.

SAVINGS BANK CLERKS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether two Orders in Council relating to the Civil Service were issued on the 15th August last, only one of which was duly published in the London Gazette; whether the unpublished Order gave special powers to the Postmaster General to place a large number of clerks of the second class in the Savings Bank Department in the Second Division of the Service without their consent; whether the Postmaster General has since availed himself of these powers, notwithstanding the reported protests of the majority of the clerks in question; whether the Treasury was fully informed by the Postmaster General of the objections entertained by these officers to being reduced in rank; whether he will take steps to enable them to regain the rank of which they have been deprived after many years' service; and whether he will give an assurance that all future Orders in Council relating to the Civil Service shall be published in the Gazette in accordance with the usual practice?

*MR. JACKSON: Some of the questions relate to matters not strictly within my Department, but I am informed that of the two Orders in Council of August 15, the one relating to the Civil Service generally only was published. In answer to the second question, the other Order in Council did authorise the Postmaster General, with the consent of the Treasury, to transfer certain clerks to the Second Division, but secured to each officer that he should not suffer in respect of increment, pension, holidays, or allowances. The Postmaster General has availed himself of the power given. I have no official knowledge as regards the protests to which the hon. Member alludes. I see no reason for further Treasury interference, and I do not think that the large body of gentlemen who form the great Second Division of the Civil Service, as now constituted, will agree with the hon. Member that their division ranks below the comparatively small and expiring class to which the question refers. I think it unnecessary to give an assurance under which all Orders in Council, however unimportant, would be published; but I see no reason why, speaking generally, all Orders of importance should not be published.

THE LATE DUKE OF BEDFORD.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Home Secretary a question of which I have given him private notice, and which I hope he will be able to answer at once. It is, whether it is true, as stated in the London Press, that a Coroner's inquiry was held into the circumstances attending the death of the late Duke of Bedford; whether it is the custom in these cases to give notice to the police of the holding of such inquiry; if it was done in this case; whether the right hon. Gentleman will obtain full information of the Coroner of this case being treated different from any other case; and as to the secret nature of the inquiry?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I must ask the hon. Gentleman, if he desires an accurate answer, to be good enough to postpone this question until to-morrow. I have only just reached town.

RAILWAY SERVANTS—HOURS OF LABOUR.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, in accordance with private notice, whether he is aware that, according to the latest Parliamentary Returns, there are 16 railways in the United Kingdom on which in March, 1890, there were 6,171 goods guards and 22,332 engine-drivers and firemen on duty more than 12 hours at a time, the average percentage of the goods guards to the total number employed being 74, and of the engine-drivers and firemen 84·61; whether in varying percentages on those railways guards, firemen, and engine-drivers, after being on duty more than 12 hours, were allowed to resume duty with less than 12 hours' rest; and whether, under existing legislation, the Board of Trade has any power to intervene for the safety of the public to prevent men in charge of railway trains being employed more than 12 hours at a time, and re-employed without sufficient intervals of rest?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The hon. Member's question does not appear on the Paper, but I shall be happy to answer it, as he has given me private notice of it. The figures in the first paragraph of the hon. Member's question are correctly quoted from the Return, but are calculated to give a wrong impression, which I desire to prevent. The number of guards, engine-drivers, and firemen set out in the Return as on duty for more than 12 hours at a time refers to the number of such men on duty in one or more instances during the month. The question might be held to imply that they were on duty habitually or regularly, which is not the case. The answer to the second paragraph is "Yes," but the percentages vary down to nil. With regard to the third paragraph, the Board of Trade have no power to interfere with the responsibility of the Railway Companies for the working of their lines in this matter.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman has received a Memorial from the Town Council of Edinburgh bearing upon this subject?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have received no notice of this question, and I cannot off-hand say whether that Memorial has been received or not, but similar Memorials have been received from more than one quarter. I think they have been sent in ignorance of the fact that the Board of Trade has absolutely no power to interfere.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is in accordance with the promise which he gave before the adjournment for the holidays that any Orders of the Day should precede that for the Second Reading of the Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): There is no intention of taking the Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Advances, &c.) Bill and the Land Department, Ireland (Salaries, &c.) Bill to-night. They have been put down simply as a matter of form. We shall proceed as arranged with the third Order—the Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill.

THE TITHES BILL.

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): May I ask what is the earliest day on which the Tithes Bill will be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It will be taken next after the Bill now before the House.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PRIVATE BILL PROCEDURE (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 114.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(3.45.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I beg to move the Second Reading of this Bill. The subject with which it deals is one which has been before the House for a number of years, and three years ago a Joint Committee of both Houses was appointed to examine into the system of Private Bill legislation. The Report of the Joint Committee was in favour of the devolution upon a Commission of the duties relating to Private Bills that are at present performed by Committees of both Houses of Parliament; and that is one of the essential features of the Bill I have now the honour to move. The Bill now before the House, it is true, relates to Scotland only, but the subject has excited more interest in Scotland than in any other part of the United Kingdom, and probably because in the main the inconvenience of the present system has been more acutely felt in Scotland than in any other part of the Kingdom. It is right to add that a certain amount of national sentiment has been, I think most legitimately and appropriately, infused into the consideration of this question, but in the main the question has been treated as a business one. It is a most remarkable fact, and one quite undeniable, that the chief support which this Bill has received in Scotland has been derived from those Municipal and Mercantile Bodies which are most largely interested in the efficient working of Private Bill legislation. I may add that the sincerity of the support by which the Bill has been backed in Scotland is to a certain extent tested by the ready renunciation that has been made of all those expeditions to London which have been one of the least disagreeable incidents of the existing system. I believe there are three main reasons on which the objections to the present system are founded, and in favour of such a change as is embodied in this Bill. In the first place, to quote the language of the Reference to the Joint Committee upstairs—

"The inconvenience to the suitors has pointed strongly towards local inquiry as being the best method of informing Parliament on the facts of these questions."

It is indisputable that there is an immense amount of time lost by those who are compelled to come to Westminster for the prosecution of, or resistance to, such measures; time which, in the case of many of the Scotch local public men, is of great value, not only to themselves, but to those whom they represent. It is also, I think, demonstrable that a large amount of unnecessary expense is caused by the continuance of the present system, and that in a material sense a reduction of expenditure, and more particularly of that kind of expenditure which is least profitable, may be effected by the proposed change. In referring to the characteristics of the present system, I think it right to say one word of due tribute to those who, in the main, have carried it on. I hope that no one will consider that any reflection is passed by the proposed change, or by any arguments advanced in support of it, upon those Members of Parliament, and especially upon those Chairmen of Committees, who have done most valuable public service in their conduct of Scotch Private Bill legislation. If I cannot altogether disarm opposition, I hope to be able to place the controversy entirely free from any matter of personal reflection, and to say that the country is sensible of the exceeding ability and skill with which the professional men engaged in the Parliamentary Committee Rooms have done their part; and if I do not dwell upon that subject more in detail it is because I find that I have been relieved from the necessity of sounding their praises, because I observe in the public Press that there is a running comment going on in eulogy of the present system, and of the way in which the duties have been discharged. But it is not to disparage those concerned in the present arrangements to say that there are inherent defects in the present system of investigation at Westminster of what are purely local questions which are unavoidable, and which do not arise from deficiencies on the part of the instruments of that system. These questions are local questions, and an inquiry at Westminster must necessarily be deficient in that accurate and definite understanding of such local questions, which could only be obtained upon the spot. There is another feature which cannot escape observation—namely, that there have been observable in Committees of both Houses of Parliament—and, if I may say so, perhaps more observable in those which this House has the appointment of—certain inevitable weaknesses. It is impossible to avoid recognising that the enormously increasing labours which are imposed upon Members of this House diminish the efficiency of the work which is conducted upstairs. There has been most impressive evidence given by various distinguished Members of the House of the exceeding difficulty of constituting Committees so as to efficiently cope with practical and difficult questions of detail. Side by side with that, it has been forced upon the attention of all who have investigated the subject that a double inquiry of the two Houses imposes a great burden upon applicants for Parliamentary powers, and it introduces an additional element of uncertainty and protracted inquiry which ought, if possible, to be avoided. In addition to the expense, the double inquiry has the effect of preventing many useful but comparatively small schemes from being brought forward. There is a third reason in favour of the proposed transfer of jurisdiction which I ought to mention and which probably I ought to have brought forward at first, because it affects the primary duties of this House. It is that unquestionably the long hours of sitting here and the close attention required of Members of the Committees renders the life of a Member of this House so laborious as to be almost intolerable. I have had the advantage of speaking to several Members of the House who are conversant with the subject, particularly with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley), who was a Member of the Joint Committee. The right hon. Gentleman concurs with the result I have arrived at, and sympathises with the reasons to which I have briefly referred. When I turn to the various alternative remedies which have been suggested for relieving suitors and Members of Parliament, I find that there are insuperable objections to them. In the first place, it has been suggested that the system of Parliamentary Committees might be continued as a means of inquiry into local facts by giving such Committees power to sit locally. It is further said that there might also be a system of Joint Committees of both Houses, which would avoid the expense and delay of a double inquiry, and that such Joint Committees might have power to sit locally. But even if that remedy were practicable—owing to Parliamentary considerations—it would not meet all the objections which have been raised to the present system. I will not dwell upon that proposal, however, because I think that anyone who is conversant with life in this House and with the proceedings of the other House will say that it is hardly conceivable that a Peripatetic Committee, consisting of four or five trained Members of both Houses—inasmuch as the whole strength of such a Committee would lie in its Parliamentary qualities—could conduct such inquiries without the assistance of some permanent element in the tribunal, because the absence of one or more of them might bring the local inquiry prematurely to an end. Another suggestion that has been made is more ambitious, but has even more fatal defects. It is said that the House ought to go further in this method of devolution, and should confer upon Local Bodies the power of dealing with these questions. I have seen that suggestion described as being a mere extension of the Provisional Order system, but I should like the House to observe that these very Local Bodies to whom the power of determining these questions is to be given are in the great majority of cases themselves the promoters of the measures which they would be called upon to approve or disapprove of. Take the case of a Town Council or of a County Council. What is the reason that it has to come to Parliament at all? It is because a Bill is necessarily an encroachment upon private rights, and Parliament has to determine in what respect private rights are to yield to local convenience. It may be said that you might give a right to the Secretary of State for Scotland to exercise a veto in such circumstances, but that would be a strong course, which has never yet been adopted. I do not think, therefore, that the difficulty in such cases would be overcome by giving a right of appeal to the Secretary of State for Scotland. The Joint Committee reported in favour of the appointment of a Commission, and there remains the most interesting and important question as to what is to be the relation between the Commission and Parliament. I think the proposal of the Government may be shortly stated as the substitution of the Commission for the Parliamentary Committees of the two Houses. Each House would retain its judgment on the scheme, and deal with the Report of the Commission as they would have dealt with the Report of the Committee of the House. The Commission would, however, have this virtue—that each House should rely on the same Report of the Commission. It has been suggested by some of those who have considered the question, and by some whose suggestions on any subject of that kind are entitled to respect, that the Government might go even further, and that the House should not merely part with the control of the Committee upstairs, but with the Second and Third Readings of Private Bills as well, and that all the control vested in the two Houses should be the right of vetoing any scheme approved by the Commission. On that subject I will only say that it would be a very strong measure in the way of divesting Parliament of its control, and would be a most important interference with the ordinary law. The suggestion has by no means escaped the attention of the Government, but our view is that the better plan would be to substitute the Commission for the Committees as an instrument for investigating facts for each House. In the first place, it is proposed that the Commission should sit in the locality affected by the scheme, and for that purpose they would have the fullest powers of determining the place of sitting, which should be as near the locality as convenience would allow, in order that the Commission might see the state of matters which is to be the subject of the inquiry. In the second place, it is proposed that the Commission should sit out of as well as during the Parliamentary Session. Thirdly, it would sit de die in diem. The Government have had the strongest representations as to the exceeding inconvenience of the state of congestion in the Committee Rooms upstairs. This falls most hardly on the Scotch people, because they are furthest from their homes, and therefore less able to go away and come back again as business is taken up. I come next to a very difficult question, namely, what should be the constitution of the Commission? If we had an absolutely free hand, if money were no consideration, and if the House were prepared to establish an exceedingly strong Commission to do this work, we ought to have four or five very highly-paid Commissioners. But it must be remembered that the amount of such work to be done in Scotland is not so great as to justify or require such an expensive Commission, although it is important and complex enough to make that a question of high importance. The right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Ways and Means has moved for a Return of the number of Bills, in order to ascertain whether the number of Bills is sufficiently large and the subjects of such high importance as to supply continuous work for such a Commission as I have described. I desire to disclaim on the part of the Government, and on my own part, any intention to make it a legal tribunal. I think it ought not to be a legal tribunal, and I will go further, and say that I think the lay element ought to preponderate in such a tribunal. I think there are qualities not always in favour among lawyers which are invaluable in the conduct of this kind of business, but that doctrine must not be overstated. For the work of the Commission some legal qualities are certainly desirable, and I can express what I mean by very authoritative words. Sir Erskine May says that Parliament in passing Private Bills has always retained the mixed judicial and legislative functions of ancient times. That is a correct and felicitous mode of stating the case. The legal element is useful in dealing with evidence and marshalling facts, and ascertaining their net result. I do not suppose any layman will deny that a trained lawyer, other things being equal, is better equipped for this department of the subject than anyone else who has not had that training. But there are other qualities quite as indispensable. There must be business capacity, a knowledge of the great business concerns which are the subject-matter of these inquiries, and I may add that I think there ought to be knowledge of and sympathy with the common-sense view which the public take on such matters. It is also exceedingly desirable that the political and Parliamentary view of such questions should be represented on the Commission. It is well that the inquiry itself should be carried on in accordance with the judgment which would ultimately be pronounced upon the result. I have stated these considerations somewhat abstractly. The proposals of the Government are—first, that a Scotch Judge should be a member of the Commission, and in order that he may be a Judge acquainted with this kind of affairs

we propose the Judge who at present sits on the Railway Commission for Scotland. The second member should be one of the lay Railway Commissioners. The third should be a Member of Parliament selected by the Committee of Selection, and the fourth should be some able, capable, and experienced Scotchman, to be selected by some impartial authority on account of his fitness for this kind of work. The question is, who is to find that man out? It has been said he ought to be appointed by the Secretary for Scotland; but I can conjecture what would have been said on the other side if that suggestion had come from the Government. The Government think the Scotch Judges are removed from all suspicions of interest or partiality, and that their experience and position fit them for finding out who is the best qualified for that kind of work. I have already said it never was the intention of the Government that that member should be a lawyer. This proposal has been much criticised, but I do not think the grounds of the criticism are sound, and I would not be at all surprised if, when the rival schemes come to be examined, that of the Government is found to be the best after all. Various alternative suggestions have been made. One which deserves attention is that, considering there is a Member of the House of Commons on the Commission, there should be also a Member of the House of Lords appointed by the Committee of Selection of that House. That is a proposal which I know finds favour in many of the commercial centres of Scotland, probably because the House of Lords' Committees have been distinguished by the exceedingly able and impartial carrying out of their duties. Upon that, as upon all the details of the Bill, I desire to say that in the Select Committee we shall approach with an open mind the consideration of all this group of questions upon which there ought to be no prejudices on one side or the other, and upon which the right selection should be made upon business grounds alone. There remains the question, what Bills are to go before the Commission? The expression used in the Bill is, "Private Bills relating to Scotland," but the Chairman would have to consider whether the Bill relates exclusively to Scotland, and if it does not, it would have to go through the Committees of both Houses. What should be done with Bills which relate to Scotland, but also relate primarily to England, is one of the difficulties of the situation. But, at the same time, it merely creates a certain diminution from the amount of work which the more ardent partisans of local inquiry might desire to see brought into Scotland. I think that this is one of the inherent difficulties of the question, and not an objection to be urged against the Bill itself. Many may desire to carry this principle further, but as long as we have the separation of the two countries in this respect we cannot expect that Scotland should sweep in English concerns any more than an English tribunal could sweep in Scottish concerns. That, however, is a subject to which I have no doubt ingenuity will be applied. With regard to the future stages of the Bill, I have given notice that I will move that the Bill, after Second Reading, should be referred to a Select Committee, which I hope will, to a large extent, be composed of Scottish Members. It is a subject primarily relating to Scottish matters exclusively, and one on which I hope to have the frank opinion and also, I hope, the strong support of Scottish Members. When, in 1889, the Government took up this subject, they did so in response to what I believe was a genuine Scottish demand, and I now propose this Bill in the same spirit and on the same grounds. We rely on the reiterated and strongly-expressed opinion of Scotland on this subject. I and my colleagues have received deputations on the subject, which showed by their composition that this is not a measure confined to any section of the community, either in a political, social, or professional sense. It is a subject upon which convictions have matured during the discussions of the last few years, and the future of this Bill must necessarily depend on the cordiality with which Scottish Members respond to the strongly-expressed opinion of Scotland. If the Government receive the same amount of support in this House as has been expressed in Scotland, I believe that the Bill will rapidly be placed upon the Statute Book, and will constitute a great improvement in Private Bill procedure with regard to Scotland.

I beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Lord Advocate.)

*(4.20.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): The right hon. Gentleman has expressed with his usual clearness the motives of the Government in bringing in this Bill, and, for my own part, I think I shall best explain the position which I assume on this matter by saying at once that I will conclude my observations by moving as an Amendment—

"That the subjects dealt with in Private Bill legislation ought not to be remitted for inquiry to a Commission until it has been shown to be impracticable to remedy the evils now complained of by amending the present system of inquiry by Parliament, and by extending the powers of Municipal Authorities in counties and burghs."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would beg to remind the House that this is not exclusively a Scotch question. In its Scotch bearings alone it is a very large and important question, but, besides that, it embodies a totally new departure from old lines on the part of Parliament, and it may also in future years be applied to the branch of public business as well as that of private business. I hope, therefore, that other Members besides Scotch Members, who may take a different view of the matter, will join in the discussion. I may at once say that, at first sight, the Bill would seem to appeal to the sympathies of many of those who sit on this side of the House. It is a decentralising measure; it recognises the principle of nationality; it proposes that certain Scotch business should be disposed of at home in Scotland by Scotchmen, and it professes to be a devolution of the powers of Parliament. Those of us who are of opinion that a movement in the direction of what is known as Home Rule would be advantageous to the proper government of these countries may be expected to jump at these proposals, but I am afraid we shall find that there is only a false flavour of Home Rule about this measure. The first question which we must consider is, What is the nature of the business dealt with in this Bill? Private business which comes before Parliament may be roughly divided into two classes. First of all, there are all the schemes put forward by Municipal Authorities in the various localities in connection with water supply, gasworks, the extension of harbours, the widening of streets, the disposal of sewage, or any other municipal purpose for the health and convenience of the citizens. Such proposals constitute, I believe, about one-fourth of the mass of the private business coming before Parliament; the other three-fourths are made up of the more ambitious proposals of the great Railway and Canal Companies for the extension of works and lines. It is a remarkable fact that all the parties concerned in this second division have expressed themselves in the main as being perfectly satisfied with the tribunal which at present has the disposal of these matters. A great amount of evidence from Scotland was taken before the Committee of 1888, especially from those representing Corporations and Local Bodies in that country, but the evidence was almost entirely devoted to the first of these two classes of private business. The witnesses complained with earnestness, and, I admit, with a great amount of justice, of the serious impediments put in the way of local improvements owing to the cumbrous and costly system of having to appeal to Parliament for approval of every little proposal of this kind—impediments which in many cases absolutely prohibited Corporations from taking steps. That is, no doubt, a very substantial complaint; but I would venture to point out that all that class of business might be, if not entirely disposed of, at all events greatly reduced, if we had the courage to give Local Authorities full powers in this matter. Whatever may be said on the subject of such a proposal, it cannot be said that it has any Party flavour, because the Party opposite are proud—and justly proud—of having extended municipal government to counties in England and Scotland. As we have granted power to them, let us make use of those authorities and trust them, and give them powers to take land for these purposes. This would dispose of a large part of the grievances urged before the Committee of 1888, and local schemes which are of such magnitude that they could not be so dealt with could still come before Parliament. I now come to the question of expense. With regard to expense, the evidence given before the Committee of 1888 was very strong, especially with regard to the great expense involved in the inquiry being conducted in London, and witnesses having, therefore, to be brought there. I think, indeed, that witnesses are brought up to London in excessive numbers for any useful purpose; but, as a matter of fact, I believe that the expense of witnesses before Committees of the two Houses only amounts to one-tenth of the whole cost of the procedure. The real source of unnecessary expenditure is, in my opinion, in the high fees charged, and in the somewhat pedantic rules laid down with regard to the preliminary proceedings—with regard to originating notices, advertisement, &c. It is in that direction, and not in the mere carrying backwards and forwards of witnesses and their maintenance in London, that the real source of excessive expenditure is to be found. I think I have said enough to show what my opinion is as to the manner in which these municipal questions ought to be dealt with. I quite admit that when you come to Railway Bills you enter upon a totally different field. The promotion of great railway schemes is necessarily very costly, and although the cost primarily concerns the companies themselves and their shareholders, the public are no doubt more or less indirectly concerned in such schemes. But I believe the Railway Companies at least are satisfied that the expenses of a local inquiry would be greater than those of an inquiry in London—that the cost of taking expert witnesses to Scotland would be greater than that of bringing local witnesses up from Scotland. As to the proposed Commission, notwithstanding the somewhat open mind which the Lord Advocate has indicated on the subject, a good many of us on this side are directly opposed to that Commission as it is now proposed to be constituted. I wish to speak with every possible respect of the Judges of the Court of Session and of the Faculty of Advocates, and the other learned gentlemen who carry on so much of the business of Scotland in Edinburgh, but I would say that there is not throughout Scotland such universal confidence in their judgment and their capacity to meet the wishes of the public as would justify us in entrusting to them the appointment of members of such a Commission as this. The Lord Advocate said naturally enough that if it had been proposed that the appointed members of the Commission should be nominated by the Crown, there would have been some fear among us respecting the exercise of the Crown patronage. But whilst we do not wish to give more power to the Crown, we desire that, if this appointment is to be made at all, a Minister should be directly responsible for it to Parliament. This is the course followed in the Railway Traffic Act of two years ago, and it was the course followed in the rival scheme put before Parliament last year by some of my hon. Friends. What sort of man, I would ask, is the fourth Commissioner to be under the scheme of the Government? The Lord Advocate says he is not to be a lawyer. Is he to be a railway expert or an engineer, or is he to be merely a man in the street? I should have no confidence in a man appointed haphazard to such a position, and especially if he was chosen by Judges of the Court of Session. Disguise the fact as you may, the new Commission now suggested will be regarded in Scotland as nothing more than a new "Edinburgh Board"—as one of those bodies of which we have had too many already, in which are placed powers which ought rather to belong to the Representatives of the people, and which certainly do not enjoy that complete confidence in Scotland which is desirable in view of the important duties they have to perform. It is said the Board is to be peripatetic, and is not necessarily to meet in Edinburgh, but its head-quarters will be in Edinburgh, and I suspect it will be gradually stereotyped and crystallised into the forms which such Boards are wont to assume in Scotland. Why, after all, should we have any such tribunal? Why is Parliament to be called upon to part with its powers in these respects? Even a great Railway Bill involves public interests, and therefore it ought to be dealt with by the Representatives of the people unless it is found absolutely impracticable so to deal with it. But, in the first place, it must be proved to us that Parliament is incapable of discharging this duty. This is spoken of as a devolution of duty on the part of the House of Commons. My idea of devolution is that it means the parting with some of our powers to a body forming part of ourselves, or to a representative body subordinate to us. But the present proposal is not devolution, but dereliction—it is not delegation, but abnegation. Supposing the tribunal rejects the Preamble of a Bill of which the House has passed the Second Reading. In that case, it supersedes by its action the judgment of the House of Commons. It is a very serious matter, therefore, that we are considering. I believe that while there is a strong feeling in Scotland in favour of facilitating Private Bill legislation, and in favour of having it as much as possible transacted and conducted there, I do not believe it would be any great disappointment to Scottish feeling if the railway inquiries were still conducted in London, even if the costs are excessive. Then there are two things that may be done—there may be a simplification of forms, and we may have recourse to a method which has already been suggested, and that is of having a Joint Committee of the two Houses of Parliament, which would at once considerably reduce the total expenses. Many Members may not be aware that a Committee considered this question many years ago, and that then it was settled against the proposal of a Joint Committee only by the casting vote of the Chairman. It adds to the significance of that fact when I say that amongst those who supported the appointment of a Joint Committee at that time were the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian and the present Prime Minister. As to the expenses of the tribunal, we must remember this, that the present tribunal—the Committees of the House of Commons—is paid for and already exists. It is, in fact, in itself, if we leave out of sight the question of the fees exacted and the expenses of witnesses, and so forth, more economical to the public than any tribunal that could be created. If necessary, an inquiry might be held locally. I do not see any reason why we should not enlarge our ideas on that matter. It was pointed out to the Committee which sat on this subject that the whole of this business is greatly disturbed by the particular Rules of Parliament as to the business of each Session being dealt with in that individual Session, and also by the consideration of the days and hours upon which and at which the House of Commons sits. But surely we might extend our ideas in that respect, and I do not see why a Joint Committee should not conduct an inquiry locally if that course was thought desirable. Now I come to the last argument in favour of the Bill I shall deal with. If it could be supported, it would be a very strong argument—it is the relief that this proposal would give to the House of Commons and its Members. Every Member who hears me will admit that, so far as its Sittings for the disposal of Private Business are concerned, they occupy very little time. There is a considerable period of time at the beginning of each Sitting which is left unoccupied, in order that it may be devoted to Private Business; but the actual business done only occupies a few minutes, and it is only two or three times a Session that we have any discussion in the House on Private Business. I bow to the high authority of my right hon. Friend the Chairman of the Committee of Selection, who says he finds great difficulty in getting Members to sit on these Committees. I do not understand why that should be. There are always a large number of Members who are not employed on Select Committees, who are free to sit on Railway Committees, and who, as Members of Parliament, will have nothing to do except to come here and occasionally vote if this business is relegated to a Commission. I cannot imagine a more useful way of employing the time of these Members than by giving them this duty to perform, and they are chiefly men who are accustomed to semi-judicial duties elsewhere, and who might therefore be trusted to perform the duties pretty well. At any rate, we might reduce the number of Members on the Select Committees; and if the proposal for a Joint Committee of the two Houses was adopted, of course there would at once be considerable relief given. There is another point I wish to urge which is a formidable matter. At present a Bill is brought into this House and is referred to a Committee of Members of the House. When they have come to their decision, the matter is sometimes brought up again in this House, but the House which trusts its Members is very unwilling to upset the deliberate judgment of the Committee. But now the House will part with the power of deciding an inquiry into the particular merits of the scheme. Does any hon. Gentleman suppose that, in the case of a great contested scheme, it will not be brought up again and again in the further course of the Bill through the House of Commons? And as the members of the Commission will not be here, except one unfortunate member, to give the reasons or state any of the facts which led to the determination of the matter, the House will be left to be guided in these questions either by Party considerations or random considerations of one kind or another not perhaps directly affecting the merits of the scheme. Any proposal of this kind, so far from saving the time of the House, will largely encroach upon the time of the House, and questions of that kind will be made more and more political, which is extremely inadvisable. On all these grounds I ask the House to proceed with extreme caution in this matter. I began by reminding the House that this is not a Scotch question—it affects England and Ireland as well as Scotland. Whatever principle we assent to in this Bill must be applied to England and Ireland afterwards. I go further, and I ask the Government why they deal with Scotland alone? because if you are to accept the principle of the measure, if you are to part with your powers in the way that is suggested, it can be much better done, and you will have a much better measure and a stronger Commission, if you deal with it as my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburghshire (Mr. A. Elliot) suggests. What is the annual average number of opposed Bills coming from Scotland? It does not exceed the figure 10, and even some of these could not be classed as exclusively Scotch Bills. Therefore, for the purpose of these few Bills, we are to set up a very costly piece of machinery. I believe you would get a much more effective measure by dealing with the three countries at once, and appointing a strong Commission, recognising, if you think it necessary to recognise it, that Parliament must yield its functions in favour of some body or other. If the modification of our Rules in the two Houses is not sufficient, then I think we might fall back upon the idea of making the inquiry local by the Members of the House, thus maintaining the principle of decision by the House itself. But if this is impracticable, and the duty of inquiry is to be handed over to a Commission, then I prefer such a Commission as has been suggested by the Chairman of Ways and Means and the hon. Member for Roxburghshire. The present proposal appears to sin against Parliamentary precedent, and as I speak of Parliamentary precedent, perhaps I should say I am obliged to discard altogether one precedent which has been set up, namely, the Election Petition Judges. That is a totally different matter. The question whether a certain election is void, or whether it has been carried out according to law, is eminently a matter for a Judge, and is eminently a matter to keep out of the very possibility of Party feeling. We are now proposing to part with our powers affecting questions involving public policy, upon which I do not know any body more entitled or more capable of deciding than the House of Commons. I said this proposal sins against Parliamentary precedent. It ignores constitutional rights, and it seems to me to be a dangerous abandonment of the true duty of Parliament. Therefore, I move the Amendment of which I have given notice, which indicates the alternatives to which I have referred, and ask the House to declare that these alternatives should, at least, be considered fully and decided upon before the extreme course now proposed to us is adopted.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the subjects dealt with in Private Bill Legislation ought not to be remitted for inquiry to a Commission, until it has been shown to be impracticable to remedy the evils now complained of, by amending the present system of inquiry by Parliament, and by extending the powers of Municipal Authorities in Counties and Burghs,"—(Mr. Campbell-Bannerman),

—instead thereof.

(4.55.) Mr. A. R. D. ELLIOT (Roxburgh): The right hon. Gentleman has thought it right to advise us to proceed with caution, and the action he invites us to take in carrying out his cautious notions is to reject altogether a Bill which has been practically before the country for several years, and the subject of which has been inquired into by a very strong Committee of both Houses of Parliament, and the principle of which has been distinctly approved by several of the most distinguished right hon. Gentlemen who sit near my right hon. Friend. If we are to have a discussion upon a Bill of this kind it is satisfactory that we should meet with a frank opposition. I have no fault to find with the right hon. Gentleman in the matter of frankness. He asks us to reject the Bill in favour of an Amendment which, construed by the light of his speech, means that we are to reject the Bill in order to maintain practically the existing state of things. We may be asked to modify the constitution of Committees, to combine Committees of this House with Committees of the other House, but we are really asked to continue the present tribunal of amateurs sitting upstairs, and to fly in the face of every opinion in Scotland at which it is possible to get at. I was asked a year or two ago to take upon myself the burden of looking after the measure which had hitherto been entrusted to and most ably supported by my friend the late Mr. Craig Sellar. I had always supported the project and had my name on the back of the Bill; but I was hardly prepared to discover the unanimity of opinion in Scotland on the part of those entitled to express an opinion upon a matter so important to their country. Some hon. Members, no doubt, have read the letter in to-day's Times upon this subject. That letter represents the strong feeling of a leading member of the Parliamentary Bar in London. We are told that no one is in favour of the Bill except, forsooth, a few busybodies in Edinburgh. Looking through the Memorial which was presented to the Prime Minister last Session, strongly in favour of the proposals of the Government, I find that all the great municipalities in Scotland—Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dundee, Aberdeen, and all the other great towns—are unanimously in favour of the proposals which are laid before the House of Commons to-day. I also find that the Chambers of Commerce one after another take the same view; and looking through the names of individuals, I notice the names of gentlemen of great eminence, principals of Universities, men of standing, men of liberal and educated opinion, to whom in Scotland some deference would naturally be paid in respect of a matter which mainly affects the interests of Scotland. Now it is proposed that there should be inquiries on the spot, and I find it is suggested that inquiries should take place at such centres as Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, Aberdeen, and Inverness. It is said that inquiries can be more economically and better made in London. How far are we to go in this principle? Would it be cheaper, would it effect upon the whole any economy in public time that great commercial causes tried in Edinburgh, or in Dublin, or at Assizes, should all be brought to Westminster because there will be found witnesses who can give evidence as experts, and where there are to be found counsel of great ability? If these matters are inquired into in Scotland, instead of being submitted to a Committee upstairs, there will not, I imagine, be an universal bringing up to Scotland of eminent counsel and engineers, but men of ability in Scotland will be availed of—there are eminent advocates in Edinburgh and Glasgow, and civil engineers will be found there whose opinions will have weight. It is futile to urge that a cause cannot be properly tried unless it is taken to where eminent counsel can be most conveniently found. The great feature of this Bill, no doubt, is the fact that it institutes a local inquiry and a single inquiry instead of a double inquiry. Mr. Littler, in his letter to the Times to-day, insists upon this double inquiry, and he says the second inquiry is necessary, because it takes a first inquiry to enable opponents to find out the weakness of the promoters' case. Well, it is a strong thing to say that it is desirable to keep up this tribunal, and that thousands of pounds are to be spent almost recklessly, with the net result that there is to be a second inquiry before another tribunal, before the strength of the opposition case can be made out. Surely it would be more reasonable to set up a strong tribunal in the first instance; a tribunal fully competent to examine into the rights and wrongs, the policy or impolicy of a proposal. Do not let us insist upon maintaining a second inquiry when we can make the first sufficient. It is, no doubt, a great change setting up a mixed tribunal. I do not pretend to any special knowledge, but as taking part in the proceedings and as an ordinary member of the public I have witnessed the work of Committees upstairs. I do not mean to say that, as a rule, these Committees do not have Chairmen of singular ability; and there are often most capable and experienced members on the Committee; but, still, I must say that I have been struck with the fact that the Bench is not quite strong enough in comparison with the Bar. At the Parliamentary Bar there are men of very great ability, every one of them a specialist, and devoted to his work. But the causes are tried before a tribunal, the personnel of which is continually changing, and the members of which are not professionally devoted to the work, and hence the natural result, the Bench is not strong enough for the Bar. Naturally the Parliamentary Bar has attracted men of first-class ability; the position offers the inducements of short hours, high pay, and long holidays. But we want a stronger tribunal. In ordinary legal procedure the most successful advocates in time find themselves on the Bench, and are specially qualified to deal with the arguments advanced before them; but, remember such gentlemen as Mr. Pope or Mr. Littler never cease to become advocates by becoming Judges. I cannot help a smile as I read the views of those who have taken up a defence of the position of Parliamentary Counsel, the positive contempt, for instance, at the mention of a Scottish Judge unacquainted with the proceedings at the Parliamentary Bar, and who perhaps, as Mr. Littler says, never put his nose inside the gallery of the House of Commons. But I would ask how often is a Member just returned to sit in Parliament appointed a member of a Committee, without having had any experience of barristers at all? What is required on these Committees is the presence of men who understand the ways of advocates and witnesses; and I maintain that a Scotch Judge would be an extremely useful addition to such a tribunal, and certainly would bring a trained experience to bear upon the matter in hand, which would not be the case with a Member elected for a constituency upon the Home Rule or any other political cry. I am afraid those who advocate the successive system of inquiry—the one inquiry succeeding the other on the same Bill—forget the burden this entails upon the poorer class of promoters. To the great Railway Companies this is a matter of little consequence, this expense is but a drop in the ocean compared to their enormous expenditure on works; but there are promoters of useful public works who are deterred by the expense from submitting their proposals to a Committee at all. But I think that they should have the opportunity of submitting their plans for examination, and of showing that their proposals while being profitable to themselves are of public advantage and do not offend against general principles. It has been remarked that we now get the services of a Committee for nothing; but the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) must be aware that at present the fees paid by suitors who bring their schemes before Parliament are largely in excess of the amount required, and are amply sufficient to pay for a tribunal of this kind. It is perfectly true, as the right hon. Gentleman says, that the principle of the Bill extends beyond Scotland, and for my part I greatly regret that the Government have not seen their way to introduce and press forward that larger measure drawn by the late Mr. Craig Sellar. But if the Government had done this, I do not suppose the hostility of the right hon. Gentleman would have been anything but strongly intensified. We should have had resistance tooth and nail, and judging from Mr. Littler's letter, I tremble to think of the opposition that would be evoked by a proposal that not only Scotch Bills, but all Bills, should be so treated by a Commission. The principle, I fully admit, goes beyond Scotland. According to the Bill, only those Bills which relate exclusively to Scotland are to be referred to this Commission, and the Lord Advocate thinks that this is fair and reasonable. But I do not quite see that. Fair and reasonable it would be in regard to a Bill exclusively relating to Scotland; but take the case of a Bill promoted by the Caledonian or the North British Railway Company, nine-tenths of the value of the interests affected might be in Scotland; but there might be some little question affecting a station at Berwick or Carlisle which would take the Bill out of the category of those exclusively Scottish and require its relegation to a Committee at Westminster. That would not, I think, be reasonable, and I should like to see a provision introduced giving to the Chairmen of Committees of both Houses authority to determine the question of venue, after considering whether a Bill mainly or substantially related to Scottish affairs, and if the inquiry would be more cheaply and more thoroughly conducted in Scotland than at Westminster. I should like to see Bills of this nature, though not exclusively relating to Scotland, tried before a Scottish tribunal. Of course, this Bill must be looked upon as being, to a very large extent, experimental in character, and it will depend upon the result how far Parliament will extend the principle. We have been told that the whole inquiry will be raised again in this House, but I do not see why this should be so. If the inquiry before a local tribunal is a more complete inquiry, if those who try these causes are more competent and experienced, I certainly do not think the House of Commons will be so foolish as to rake up the details again in a full House. The House of Commons dislikes to discuss the details of a Private Bill, and I share that dislike. Nothing is more incongruous than for the House of Commons to decide upon the merits of a Private Bill except under such exceptional circumstances as the promotion of a Channel Tunnel Bill or of a Bill affecting a question of general interest. In nine cases out of ten it is most unfitting that the House, imperfectly acquainted with the facts, should re-hear a case decided by Committee, and I cannot see why these re-hearings should be more frequent after the inquiry has been entrusted to a more competent tribunal than the Committee now is. It has been said with truth that these inquiries which are treated as judicial are not altogether judicial in character, for they relate to matters of policy and public expediency, requiring the judgment of business men of common sense and not merely trained lawyers. But then it is said it is desirable that these men should hold a representative position. I, for my part, do not altogether hold that view. A question of a purely local character has to be determined, and I do not see that a gentleman is specially qualified to try that question because the expression of his opinions for or against Home Rule may have led to his election to a representative position. The merits and demerits of a particular Private Bill proposal have nothing whatever to do with representative qualifications. This tribunal will have to inquire into facts, and I must say I look with considerable approval on Clause 18, which contains a provision which will enable the Local Authority to be consulted, not by the representation of counsel, but by a written statement of their views. Thus, County Councils and Town Councils will put their views before the Commission, and I should be perfectly willing to see this provision extended to include other representative Local Authorities. But I must resist any proposal such as that of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell), that we should delegate legislative powers to County Councils and Town Councils. Why, it constantly happens that Local Authorities are the promoters of schemes under which they seek powers to compulsorily acquire property and give compensation, and to give these authorities the right to exercise such powers without further Parliamentary sanction is a conclusion I am sure the House will never arrive at. However competent a man may be, it is asking him to undertake a task for which no man is competent to be advocate and judge in his own cause. I am sure such a proposal will be at once rejected. We have heard much of the constitution of the Commission, and I agree with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) to this extent, that when an appointment to a public office is made, I should like it to be made by some responsible individual whom we may control in this House; and I infer from what has been said, that if the right hon. Gentleman is determined to force this patronage upon the Government, he will not be resisted with any great vigour. The principle of the Bill is this: a local Scotch inquiry into subjects exclusively affecting Scotland, an inquiry before men specially qualified to conduct it, a single inquiry which will take the place of the present double Parliamentary inquiry; but the right of absolute legislation, the power to take away altogether from A or B property in furtherance of some scheme for the public benefit, is reserved, and should be reserved, to the Parliament of the United Kingdom. I do not think, as the Bill is to be referred to a Select Committee, that I need elaborate this point any further. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University (Sir J. R. Mowbray) pointed out before the Committee, where he was both member and witness, the increasing difficulty of getting Members to do this work which some of them consider drudgery, and this was referred to in the Report of the Joint Committee in very strong language indeed. They had in their minds, no doubt, the recommendations of the Committee presided over by the noble Lord the Member for Rossendale, suggesting a large increase in the system of Standing Committees. Well, the result of careful inquiry by men of all parties is that the present system is acknowledged to be most unsatisfactory, and it looks as if these duties must, of necessity, devolve upon another tribunal. The more the matter is opened, the more Members apply their minds to the consideration of the question and look into the evidence, the more they will find themselves urged to the conclusion that a remedy is to be found in the institution of a tribunal such as this now proposed. I have no doubt that the proposal is supported by nine-tenths of the intelligent opinion of Scotland. I can hardly believe that the right hon. Gentleman is going to a Division against the Bill. That is for him to consider, but it surprises me that any Scottish Member should come forward and deny that there is an opinion in Scotland approaching unanimity in favour of this Bill. That I believe to be the case. The right hon. Gentleman did not much go into the question of public opinion; he put that aside; but I challenge any hon. Member to bring forward anything like evidence of Scottish opinion against the Bill to be compared with Memorials and Petitions, and every legitimate expression of opinion in its favour. Since 1872 the Royal burghs have every year declared in favour of a fixed tribunal and a local inquiry. Do not let us have under the guise of caution and inquiry attacks made upon the principle of the Bill. It is now the question of a Second Reading. Are we to defeat the Bill and protract the present system, or act in accordance with Scottish opinion, and adopt a system which after trial in Scotland will, I am convinced, be followed throughout the whole of the United Kingdom?

*(5.27.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E): I shall not follow the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken into the question of what is the intelligent opinion among the people of Scotland; but it may not be out of place to remind the hon. Member and the House that the Town Council of Edinburgh—and they may be accepted as representing intelligent opinion at least, in the Scottish capital, on Tuesday last—came to the resolution not to support the Bill. But perhaps the hon. Member for Roxburgh will not accept this as the opinion of the people of Scotland; he soars above this, and picks out the intelligent opinion for himself. I will, however, make him a large concession. For several years my name has been associated with a Committee which has sought an alteration in the present process of Private Bill legislation, and I am quite at one with the hon. Gentleman in saying that the system of double Committee is unnecessary, expensive, inexpedient, and ought to be done away with. But although committed for years to a change in regard to Private Bill legislation, what I humbly submit to the House is that the people of Scotland have not been looking for, nor do they wish for, a Bill drawn on these lines. I admit the Lord Advocate has indicated a large concession. He says he is not going to stand by the constitution of the Commission as a vital principle of the Bill; and more than that, the right hon. Gentleman is willing, if the Bill passes Second Reading, that it shall be submitted to the sifting and examination of a Committee upstairs, and inferentially any Report from such a Committee will be accepted by the Government. But let me bring to the recollection of the House and the Government this important fact, that since we began in Scotland to agitate in favour of reform in Private Bill legislation very great changes have taken place. Parliament has lately given a large number of additional powers to local government, and the whole policy of legislation on such subjects is to increase the powers given to local governing bodies. Let me ask, with all seriousness, what is the power conceded to Town Councils and County Councils but the right of bodies representing the public to deal with private interests? What we want in Scotland is not a system of appeal to Judges, but the placing in the hands of administrative bodies of certain powers, in the belief that the electors can always be depended upon to exact from them such an execution of those powers as will be in accordance with the sense of fair play to individuals. If we do not act upon that principle we cannot grant devolution or delegation in any respect whatever. It is idle for the right hon. and learned Gentleman to say that under such a system as we advocate local bodies would be judges in their own case. We have in Scotland towns that are counties in themselves, having Councils representing at least 50,000 inhabitants; and we have County Councils representing each from 100,000 to 200,000 inhabitants. These are responsible tribunals created by Parliament, and of such a character that we cannot despise them. If we are to admit the principle of devolution at all, certainly much larger powers ought to be conferred upon these bodies. During the discussions on the Local Government (Scotland) Bill we on this side of the House pressed on the Government the advisability and necessity of conferring much more extensive powers upon them than were conceded by the Government. We are entitled to assume that if any success attends the system of local government at all, these large representative bodies will very soon qualify themselves to be the administrators of much larger powers than we have yet conferred upon them. I do not see why we should not delegate to County Councils in Scotland the power of authorising very small communities to take steps which may be necessary for the administration of their local affairs. I believe that between 75 and 90 per cent. of our Private Bill legislation relates to our large Railway Corporations; and I challenge any hon. Member representing those corporations to stand up and say they desire to have any local body or Commission sitting in Scotland. All railway schemes are so bound up in the ramifications of great lines of traffic that it would be inexpedient, if it were possible, to remit them for consideration to any body in Scotland. A proposal respecting the gas, or the water, or the sanitation of a little town, which is still in its infancy and is just forming a corporation of its own, would be dealt with impartially and fairly by a large County Council. I say that County Councils ought to have powers of this kind, and that small corporations ought not to be put to the expense and trouble of coming to Westminster paying Parliamentary fees, employing counsel, and so forth. The hon. and learned Member for Roxburgh (Mr. A. R. D. Elliot) has spoken about the necessity of having a Judge on a tribunal of this kind. I am not going to follow the hon. and learned Gentleman in his observations respecting the inferiority he feels to the learned counsel who come before Select Committees, nor am I going to reply to his sneering remark about "poor Mr. Littler." Poor Mr. Littler will hold his own against the hon. and learned Member for Roxburgh. What we say is that these experienced and learned and able counsel are not necessary instruments in regard to the little local affairs in our constituencies which it is sought to make the subject of Private Bill legislation. Then, with regard to the constitution of the proposed tribunal, Judges ought, in our opinion, to be confined to the administration and interpretation of the law; and we deprecate strongly any proposal to set up the politically appointed Judges of Scotland—whom we believe to be perfectly impartial, honest and honourable—as exponents of local public opinion, and as Judges of the local interests of communities. We are introducing here a most important, and, in my opinion, a most pernicious principle. We are saying that the learned Judges of the Court of Session and their nominees are to be the judges in the future in Scotland in regard to the carrying out of public works. The Amendment which has been moved by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs, in effect, says that we are not to make this radical and somewhat dangerous change until we have seen to what extent we can remedy the existing evils, and until we have seen how far we can safely delegate the powers to the new County Councils. This seems to me a most reasonable proposal. I think we should give the matter the most careful consideration before we enter upon what is really a reversal of the whole policy of legislation throughout the country, taking the initiative in regard to authorising public works from the popular representatives and Parliament, and giving it up to Legal Judges. Unless the Government see fit to give an indication that they are ready to afford the House some opportunity of considering the most important subject of further delegation of powers to Local Councils in Scotland, Members from Scotland will certainly not be justified in voting for the Second Reading of this Bill. To my mind the new Local Authorities should have a fair trial with enlarged powers. I do not, to a large extent, sympathise with the idea of having an Imperial Commission going over all parts of the United Kingdom. I think the people of Scotland would be more likely to set up a good tribunal for themselves than would be the people of England, Scotland, and Ireland combined, and I am not prepared to say that it would reconcile me to the Bill if it were to be a universal measure for all parts of the United Kingdom. I do not sympathise with the idea that a Scotch Committee must be a very expensive affair; but I think that the body should be maintained in both Houses combined, consisting of Members or persons nominated by the two Houses. This Bill by no means meets the desire of the Scotch people, who would much prefer the present system to that now proposed. They object to be placed under the control of the Court of Session, and would much rather come to London and have Private Bills considered by a Committee of the House of Commons and a Committee of the House of Lords than be at the mercy of a Parliament House clique. When the Scotch people really understand this measure they will rather bear the ills they have than fly to others they know not of.

(548.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Roxburgh told the House, in his usual fashion, that all Scotch opinion—or, at all events, all intelligent, by which I presume he means anti-Home Rule opinion—was in favour of this Bill. When he made that statement he might have reminded the House that at all events one Scotchman who is not in favour of Home Rule is opposed to the Bill. He might have referred to the fact that a very distinguished Member of Her Majesty's Government, a Scotchman, who, unlike most of those who clamour against the present system, has had considerable experience of that system—I mean Lord Balfour of Burleigh—has not only expressed opinion against the Bill, but by facts and arguments has demolished the whole case in favour of it. Whatever popularity this measure has secured has been due to the belief that it is some instalment of Scotch Home Rule. If it were even a small step in the direction of Home Rule for Scotland I should support it, but it is nothing of the kind. This Bill has no more in common with Home Rule than a painted sparrow has with a canary. Home Rule for Scotland means giving the Scotch people control of their own business; but this Bill will take away such control as the Scotch people at present have over Scotch Private Bill legislation. The Bill sins against all principle and satisfies nobody. It does not satisfy the Member for Roxburgh. It substitutes for the control of Parliament, in which the Scotch people are at least represented, a body of gentlemen who, whatever may be their merits, will be in no sense representative of the people of Scotland, and over whom the Scotch people will have no control. A good deal has been said with reference to expenses, and so on, of Private Bill legislation; but let me remind the House of one fact that ought not for one moment to be forgotten throughout the whole discussion. Before the Joint Committee of 1888 there was a general consensus of opinion that far and away the best tribunal for the consideration of Private Bills is a Committee of this House. The people of Scotland have the utmost confidence in these Committees, and it is only those who have little or no experience of them who object to them. It is important to bear in mind that the only complaint against the present system made before the Committee of 1888 came from certain municipalities in Scotland and Ireland, and that the entire Private Bill legislation in which municipalities are concerned is about 5 per cent. Those who are concerned in about 95 per cent. of the whole Private Bill legislation are not only satisfied with the present system, but are entirely opposed to any alteration. What are the grievances alleged? They were stated by one witness. He was asked—

“You do not feel any want of confidence in a Parliamentary Committee?”

No; certainly the reverse. The only ground upon which complaint is made is the ground of expense.”

Now, taking not the larger question of the Empire as a whole, but dealing with Scotland alone, the total amount expended on Private Bill legislation by the Local Authorities in 14 years has amounted to £300,000, whereas the expenditure of other interests in the same period amounted to £1,000,000. The interest represented by the Municipalities is only one-fourth of the whole, and what is the amount of the saving which it is expected will be brought about by this Bill? Not a single word has been said about that, although it is a matter of great importance. The most exaggerated view put forward by any witness before the Committee of 1888 puts the saving to the people of Scotland at £7,000 a year. The total local expenditure of Scotland is £6,000,000 a year, and on this £6,000,000 the utmost amount which anybody in his wildest moments could imagine it possible to save is £1 in a thousand. All the preliminary and other expenses of the present system will be continued, save that of having the witnesses examined in London instead of in Scotland. It has been said that this Bill carries the object which the Scotch Corporations desire. It does nothing of the kind. What the Scotch Corporations desire was well expressed by a witness from Aberdeen. He said—

“We are quite of opinion in Aberdeen, that if you were to hold an inquiry in Edinburgh it might cost as much as if it were held in London.”

But this Bill does not give an absolute right of local inquiry; it makes the local inquiry dependent on the discretion of the Court itself. This will not do, if you desire to meet the wants of the Scotch people, and they will not be satisfied unless you give them a Statutory and Parliamentary right to have inquiry made in the locality. With regard to the question of expense, there are one or two facts of which the House ought to be made aware. A shareholder of the Caledonian Railway was so impressed with the cost incurred by the present system, and the saving that might be effected if the inquiry were local, that at a meeting of the promoters of that company, he made a motion in support of some such proposal as is now before us. But there happened to be at that meeting, as there was not present at the Convention of Royal Burghs nor in the Town Councils, a gentleman who knew something of the subject, who had had large experience in connection with it, and who was able to put the true state of the facts before those present. He pointed out the fallacies of the grounds on which it was supposed that money would be saved by means of local inquiries, and the result was that of the total number of shareholders present there were not ten who supported the motion. I venture to say that the same result would follow all over Scotland if at meetings which might be held on this subject some one were present who could present the real state of the case. It is remarkable that this idea of saving money by means of local inquiries should not have extended to the Railway Companies, all of whom are found impressed with the conviction that, instead of saving money, the adoption of such a system would materially increase their expenditure. If we take the case of Newcastle, that is a city which is in every respect as disadvantageously situated as Edinburgh with regard to inquiries before Parliamentary Committees, and yet no member of the Corporation of Newcastle has complained of the expense of the existing system, or enlarged on the advantages of local inquiries. The same remark may be made with regard to Liverpool. The idea is one that is peculiar to Scotland and certain parts of Ireland. Whence did that idea originate? For some years past there has been a very small, but very active, committee of lawyers in Edinburgh who have been labouring under the delusion that there are enormous fortunes to be made out of the Private Bill business if it can only be brought to their locality. This body is a most active and energetic one. Now, it happens that the Convention of Royal Burghs contains between 20 and 30 professional men, some of whom are exceedingly active, and these persons not only prepared a string of resolutions on this subject, but have also put forward a very plausible story which sounds very well until we have heard the other side—the story being that there is enormous expense incurred in taking witnesses to London. Now, let us see what is the evidence that has been given on this subject. Among the witnesses before the Committee was Mr. Vary Campbell, who is an advocate practising in Edinburgh and the leader of a somewhat small party who have been agitating in favour of the Bill. Mr. Vary Campbell was asked by Lord Monk Bretton, "Have you attended much before Committees?" His answer to that question was, "I have only personally attended before the Referees on locus standi." He was further asked, "You have not followed the Bills from the Referees to the House?" and his reply was, "No, I have not." Here, then, is a gentleman who never could have had the responsibility connected with the passing of a single Private Bill through Parliament; who, in fact, never held a single brief upstairs, and who, therefore, can be no high authority as to what is an extravagant system. On the other hand, the Committee have had the evidence of Sir James Marwick, who has been Town Clerk both of Edinburgh and Glasgow for a number of years, and who has had more experience and better opportunities of forming a judgment on this question than all the Town Clerks in Scotland put together, and certainly more than all the Town Councillors in that country. Well, what is his experience? Sir James

Mr. Hunter

Marwick is just as good a witness as Mr. Vary Campbell is a bad one, and his opinion must necessarily carry great weight where the opposite opinion expressed by Mr. Vary Campbell carries very little. Sir James Marwick expressed in the strongest terms his opinion that the present system was by far the best he had ever heard proposed, as he knew by experience that more money would be expended by taking experts and scientific witnesses to the locality than by taking the ordinary witnesses from the locality to the House of Commons. Now, this argument about expense is just one of those half truths that are in reality more dangerous than falsification; because, of course, if instead of taking witnesses to the Court you take the Court to the witnesses, you thereby save the expense of taking the witnesses to the Court, but, on the other hand, you incur the additional expense which necessarily arises from taking the Court to the witnesses. Those who use the economical argument entirely overlook the fact that there is another side to this question, and that the taking of the Court and counsel, together with experts and scientific witnesses, to the locality would be a source of increased expense. With regard to the cost of witnesses, Sir James Marwick gave figures covering a number of years. The total expenditure at Glasgow over 11 years amounts to a sum which is a very convenient one to make use of, because the total is exactly £100,000, and therefore you can easily arrive at the various percentages. He puts the cost of general witnesses at £5,400, and of deputations at £6,000. So that on those two items the amount of saving that could be effected out of the total would be 11 per cent. On the other hand, he puts it that the cost of taking counsel to the locality would be very serious. But I assume that the Government in their draft have made it optional on the part of the tribunal as to whether it shall hold local inquiries or not. There has been a case in point in connection with the Corporation of Glasgow. An inquiry was made in that city by a Royal Commission as to the boundaries of Glasgow, and that inquiry cost £5,000. But the fees of a single junior counsel from Edinburgh amounted to £1,000 out of the total sum of £5,000. Speaking before the Committee, Mr. Pope stated—

"I have the honour to hold a general retainer from the Corporation of Glasgow, and I have never received such a fee from them. Indeed, in the whole course of my experience the whole of my fees from the Corporation of Glasgow in any one year have never amounted to such a sum."

It is obvious if counsel are taken away from Edinburgh to localities some distance away much larger fees will be required than if counsel were acting in the course of their regular practice in Edinburgh. Counsel always runs the risk of disappointing clients when he goes away, and sometimes incurs the risk of losing them altogether. Therefore, do what you will the cost of counsel must be very high if you have inquiries made in the localities. Moreover, we have ample experience that when people have a choice between a Central Court and an inquiry in a particular locality they find it to their interest to go to the Central Court. The Londonderry case was referred to before the Joint Committee. As I was engaged in that case, I may state what happened. It has been the practice of the Railway Commissioners to hold their inquiries on Irish questions in Ireland. The Londonderry case was one of undue preference, in which a large number of local witnesses would have to be examined. The advocates in the case thought a saving might be effected if it were heard in Londonderry, and, according to the usual practice, the case was heard there. I may tell the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate that the result was not at all satisfactory, and that those who were concerned in the case came to the conclusion that they would have saved money if it had been heard in London, as in the end it had to be heard in order to receive the evidence of certain experts. That is only one case, but there are many others which illustrate the same point. During the last 15 years the Railway Commission has exercised jurisdiction over railway rates in Scotland, and the Commissioners have always been ready to go to the locality where the parties might desire it. Nevertheless, it is a fact that during the whole of those 15 years, although the Scotch people have the choice of having their inquiries made in the locality instead of in London, in no single instance have the parties in Scotland desired to have the Commission sitting in the locality. We have found the same feeling in Scotland with regard to arbitrations relative to purely local matters. Take, for instance, the arbitration in the case of Lord Blantyre's Trust, having reference to the foreshores of the Clyde. That was a purely local matter, but the parties concerned preferred to have the investigation made in London, doubtless because it was more convenient, and also cheaper in the case of the experts and counsel necessarily engaged in the case. Then, again, take the case of the Corporation of Dundee, who, having entered into an arbitration in a matter affecting the burgh, had the arbitration heard in London instead of in Dundee. But with regard to the relative expenses of local and central inquiries, those persons who have had little experience entertain the opinion that a great saving would be effected, while those with large experience are altogether of a different opinion. But either on the ground of expense or the unfitness of the tribunal, these arguments are thrown entirely into the air. We shall be confronted with the Report of the Joint Committee of 1888, appointed to inquire how far the system of Parliamentary Committees might be modified. For 10 days that Committee sat hearing evidence on the merits of Parliamentary Committees without a single whisper being heard of views which were afterwards put before them. On the last day but one the Chairman of the Committee of Selection gave evidence of a totally different character. His evidence amounted to this: that, whether the system was good or bad, the House of Commons had practically resolved to get rid of Private Bill business, and that some alternative must be proposed. I cannot help thinking that it is much to be regretted that that evidence was not given in the first instance, so that the attention of the Committee might have been directed to the question of what would be the best substitute. The only views put before this Joint Committee were, on the one hand, those of the Secretary of State for War, and, on the other, the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees. I do say that, considering the enormous interests involved, the question of the proper substitute for the Private Bill Committees is one which deserves the fullest consideration and inquiry. I do not think anyone can say that there was inquiry as to that, though, no doubt, great consideration was given by Members of the Committee to the subject. The scheme proposed by the Secretary of State for War was in its main features that which has been adopted in the Bill of the Government, with this important and vital distinction: that the Committee recommended a general tribunal and not one for Scotland separately. Upon the question of a separate tribunal for Scotland, the Committee gave no authority to the Government. With reference to the scheme, the only evidence given in the way of criticism was tendered by the Chairman of Ways and Means, who said—

"Any scheme which contemplates that Bills should be read a second time and then sent for examination to some separate tribunal, in my opinion, is subject to such objections that it would be scarcely worth serious consideration."

In the face of that opinion, emanating from so high an authority, the Government are not justified, without further careful inquiry and much more prolonged investigation than they have yet given to the subject, in attempting by a side wind to subvert the system of Private Bill legislation by introducing a measure which applies only to Scotland, and the main principle of which has never yet been adequately considered. The difficulty of finding a substitute will prove to be very serious, because we have no analogy to guide us. In the case of divorce, the House merely restored to the legal tribunal powers which should never have been taken away from it. In regard to corrupt practices at elections, the only reason why the House stuck so tenaciously to its right to decide elections was that in former days the Judges held office by the goodwill of the Crown, and Parliament would not sacrifice its independence by referring disputed elections to the nominees of the Crown. It is true the practice continued long after the reason for it ceased to exist, as very frequently happens. But that was the true reason why the House maintained so stoutly its jurisdiction over election petitions. Of course, in later times, they were very properly referred to a legal tribunal. But the questions raised by the present system of Private Bill legislation are of an entirely different character. What is the question which is at the root of all Private Bill legislation? It is the question of taking land by compulsion. The important distinction between land taken for purposes of private gain and for the purposes of the public good was never considered by the Joint Committee, though it is the governing element in the decision of a case. The distinction is already recognised by the practice of the House. Mr. Warner stated in his evidence that the power to take land compulsorily for private purposes—that is, for purposes of private gain—had never been permitted by Provisional Order; whereas we know that Corporations and Public Bodies have over and over again been allowed to take land compulsorily by Provisional Order. That distinction rests upon sound principle. When it is the case of a private interest, it rests upon the promoters of the Bill to prove that it is for the good of the public that the land should be taken compulsorily. But when we come to a Corporation it is clearly a different matter, for the Municipal Corporation is clearly the proper authority to decide whether or not land should be taken compulsorily. It alone can decide when the public interest is involved, while it has every motive to abstain from indulging too much in the practice of taking land compulsorily. We know that the Lands Clauses Act not only gives compensation to the man whose land is taken compulsorily, but it gives him a certain bonus in addition. The Amendment points out the true solution of this question. I submit that the worst mode of dealing with Municipal Authorities is to appoint a tribunal of any sort which would consist of persons not removable, who did not represent the public, and who were not controlled by the public. I have a word of complaint to make against the Government in respect of this transaction. When the Local Government Bill was before the House, we on this side of the House made strong efforts to enlarge the powers of the County Councils and Town Councils. We brought forward this Motion:—

"That County Councils should have power to take land by agreement or compulsion, for permanent purposes, or for the benefit of the people of the locality."

Forty-nine of the Scotch Members voted in favour of that Motion, and only 11 voted against it. Of Scotch Members supporting the Government there are 26, and you will find that the Government were not able to get half of their Scotch supporters to go into the Lobby against the principle of that Resolution—a principle which is the true key to the whole question of Private Bill legislation. The grievance of Local Authorities is that they have to come to Parliament at all for the majority of purposes, for which there is no need to come to Parliament. What are the grievances of Corporations? A gentleman of the Corporation of Glasgow pointed out that it was a great grievance that they could not enlarge the west end of Sauchiehall Street without paying a ridiculous price for a small piece of land held by one man, who knew that they could not proceed without getting a Private Bill, which would cost £400 or £500. I put it to the Government whether it is not preposterous that the Corporation of a city like Glasgow should be compelled to incur that expense before being able to take a small piece of land necessary for the purpose of a public improvement? Another grievance relates to the running of tramways through the streets. Surely the Local Authority is competent to decide the question, and it certainly does not need a permanent tribunal of Judges. What are the other matters? One is the removal of buildings. Surely that should be within the control of the Local Authority. Let me refer very briefly to one or two of the objects for which Scotch Corporations have had to apply for Parliamentary sanction. A very benevolent citizen of Glasgow presented a large piece of valuable land to the Corporation on the condition that it was laid out and maintained as a park. The Corporation had to come to Parliament for power to fulfil that condition. Surely the President of the Local Government Board will admit that that was a matter which the Glasgow Corporation might well have determined without Parliamentary interference. Again, the Corporation of Glasgow spent £3,084 in obtaining the authority of Parliament to widen one of their bridges by 30 feet. Surely that was a power a Local Corporation ought to have. Edinburgh had to come to Parliament for power to build a bridge; the burgh of Ayr spent thousands of pounds to get power to execute street improvements; and the little burgh of Airdrie came to Parliament, at considerable expense, to obtain powers to provide model lodging-houses. Is it not possible by a General Act to give certain limited powers to Local Bodies to take land compulsorily for public purposes, with or without, it may be, the approval of the Secretary for Scotland? Cannot some provision be drafted whereby a large proportion of the Private Bill legislation would be rendered unnecessary? That is where real economy would come in. The majority of the Bills now brought forward are not opposed; yet you enforce the provisions which entail so much expense. This is a grievance affecting municipalities which your Bill does not touch, and upon that ground I shall not have the slightest hesitation in offering the greatest possible resistance to the present measure. It is not a step in the direction of Home Rule for Scotland, or popular control, but it is a step in the direction of substituting for the proper representatives of the people persons who, whatever their excellence, will very soon be out of tune with public sympathy. I venture to say, with equal firmness of conviction, that the only way in which you can satisfactorily deal with Scotch business is this. The number of Bills proceeded with is very small, for in ten years there have only been 95 opposed Bills. With respect to Municipal Bills, the remedy could be secured by enlarging the powers of the Local Authorities, while as to railway business, you ought to have one railway tribunal for the whole of England and Scotland. Ever since the year 1873 one of the primary objects of Parliament has been to secure the treatment on one system of all the railways in Great Britain. It is impossible to deal satisfactorily with the question of running powers if you have one tribunal in Scotland and another in England. On an average there are 40 Railway Bills a year, and if they were all dealt with by one properly constituted tribunal the whole difficulty would be overcome. I can only say that either in the Select Committee, or when the Bill comes back to this House, I shall move that it be in the option of promoters of Bills to say whether the scheme shall be considered before a Committee here or locally. My contention is that on the grounds of economy promoters are not likely to prefer the local inquiry. As to the constitution of the proposed tribunal I need say little in addition to what has fallen from other Members. But I do hold with the opinion of Sir J. Marwick, that a legal training is the last qualification necessary for the post. I object strongly to the notion that only a Judge could properly preside over the tribunal, for such an appointment would be incompatible with the independence and impartiality of the Board. Again, the appointment of the members of the tribunal ought not to be for one year only. How can a man be expected to give up a lucrative practice for an appointment for one year only? And if the appointments are thus limited may we not see a spectacle such as has been presented in Ireland, where Engineer A has reported favourably on Engineer B's scheme in one county, and Engineer B has done a like turn for Engineer A in another county? To prevent the members of the tribunal being placed in positions calculated to create embarrassment and suspicion their appointments must be permanent. Have the Government asked the Railway Commissioners if they are willing to undertake these duties? I presume they have. I venture, however, to think that if they do undertake them they will be placed in an invidious and difficult position, especially when called upon to deal with questions of law. Now, one of the last proposals of the Bill is to place a Member of Parliament on this tribunal, and a more unconstitutional and monstrous proposition I never heard. In the first place, he is to be the only unpaid member of the Commission. I doubt whether any constituency would tolerate the absence of its Member from Parliament in order to act as an arbitrator in private disputes; while I cannot imagine any Member being willing to give up all interest in the public affairs of the country in order to occupy the position proposed by this Bill to be assigned to a Member of this House. I apologise to the House for detaining it at such length; but this is a subject of wide ramifications, and I feel that it has not yet been adequately discussed. The proposals of the Secretary for War have not yet been subjected to the test of cross-examination. It is said the Bill will enable the House to retain control over its Private Bill business. But it will not do so, for if the Commission do not pass the preamble of the Bill the House will have no voice whatever in the matter. Although the Government have advanced their views in a temperate and reasonable manner, I do hope they will see there is nothing to be gained by pushing forward the Bill during the present Session.

(6.49.) MR. R. W. DUFF (Banffshire): My main objection to this measure is this: that it does not lessen in any degree the expense of carrying unopposed Bills through Parliament. Now, most of the Bills from my constituency are unopposed. A small harbour was recently projected at a cost of £12,000; yet the expense of getting the necessary Act of Parliament, although it was unopposed, amounted to no less a sum than £1,200. These are the grievances we want to get rid of, and these are the matters which stand foremost in the minds of the Scottish people when they talk on the subject of Private Bill legislation. Surely in small matters of public works—such as the harbour to which I have already referred—it is very hard that the community should have these enormous expenses put upon them. The right hon. Gentleman asks how it is to be obviated? Why should not Harbour Authorities have power to acquire land in the same way as School Boards possess it under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act? Surely it would be easy to draft a Bill under which a Harbour Authority could go before the Sheriff and obtain the land, any dispute as to terms to be governed by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. I say that this Bill does not touch the grievances under which we suffer; but if the right hon. Gentleman will apply his mind to the matter he will find it possible to relieve the smaller communities of these burdens. A right hon. Gentleman who spoke just now seemed to think it was an agreeable task to preside over a Railway Committee upstairs. Well I have had some years' experience, and I must say I have not found it very pleasant to have to come down at half past 11 to sit on a Committee till 4, and then to proceed with the business of the House. Still, I do believe that the decisions of these Committees have been, on the whole, satisfactory to the country, and I fear it will be very difficult to find a tribunal which will give equal or greater satisfaction. I rose more particularly to call the attention of the Lord Advocate to what I conceived to be the chief grievance in regard to Private Bill legislation, and to explain the reasons which I feel it my duty to support the Amendment of my right hon. Friend.

(6.55.) MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): As I believe that a strong desire exists in Scotland for this Bill, I am glad that it has been introduced so early in the Session; but I hope that evidence will be called before the Select Committee which will give expression to Scottish opinion, and that before any action is taken on the decision of the Committee time will be afforded for Scotland to declare itself on the evidence. I fear that much of the opinion in favour of the Bill comes from those who are least acquainted with the matter. There are many strong practical difficulties in our path, but I do not think that they are insuperable. I was very glad to hear the Lord Advocate say that the Government would keep an open mind in regard to the Bill, which I trust will be carried through with the same success, and in the same manner, as the Police Superannuation Bill of last Session. There are two points of view from which the Bill must be examined, the Scottish point of view, and that of the House of Commons. The first argument which has been advanced is that of expense, and I think that the Member for Aberdeen has made out a very strong case in that connection; for it seems extremely doubtful whether anything in the shape of economy will be gained by this change of procedure. The Bill does not affect unopposed Bills in any way, although at present an expense of £300 or £400 has to be incurred in getting the smallest unopposed scheme through Parliament. Again, in regard to opposed Bills, I do not see where there will be any substantial diminution of cost. The solicitors' work will remain pretty much about the same under the new system as it is under the present; counsels' fees will remain about the same; and if expense is saved in not having to take the witnesses to London, there will be a fresh expense in calling expert evidence from London, and it may be that counsel will have to be taken from London to Scotland. Of course the real saving will be in changing the system, which enables the opponents of a Bill to contest it before two Committees in succession: before Committees of both Houses. But another Scottish reason in favour of this Bill is one altogether outside the question of expense, for it is to be found in the desire that in these matters Scotland shall be made altogether independent of the Imperial Parliament. If people clearly understand what it is they are going to get, and what it is going to cost, and they still have a strong desire for a local hearing, by all means let them have their Bill. The change will benefit certain classes with regard to whom one thinks more about expense than with regard to rich companies or Corporations. At present, opposition to a Bill that is going to affect a person to a very slight extent is an extremely serious matter. A man does not care to incur a considerable certain expense for a problematical chance of getting some good out of it. If there were a local inquiry, one's own agent would be able to conduct one's case at extremely small expense. There is one provision in the Bill in favour of Local Bodies that seems to me a very dangerous one. By the 18th section any County Council or Town Council may make a report in writing to the Commissioners respecting the Preamble of a Bill, and the Commissioners are to have due regard to the request contained in such report. I do not see why County or Town Councils should have privileges given them that are greater than those given to individuals. I think it is very dangerous to give more weight to their opinions than to the opinions of any other class of opponents. Town and County Councils are elected to champion the interests of the ratepayers. That you may trust them to do with perfect success, but they are not likely to look at matters from the larger point of view of the general public interest and consider whether a railway or any other big scheme will be of advantage to the community generally. What they seek is to get the best terms for their own ratepayers. This has been the experience of those who have had to deal with the largest Corporations in Scotland. It is clear that Bills of certain kinds—such as Gas Bills, Boundary Bills, Harbour Bills, Tramway Bills, and Water Bills—are of a local character, and might be fitly dealt with locally. But it is different in regard to railways, and it is very hard to lay down any hard and fast line of discrimination between those railways which are completely local and those which affect the general interests of the Kingdom. I was once interested in a little railway which appeared to be one of the most innocent pieces of local extravagance that could be imagined. It was about four miles long, and ran from one village to another. But when one got below the surface and came to know the meaning of it, one found that it was a step in the great campaign of railway strategy which is going on continually between the Caledonian and North British Companies over the whole of Scotland, and it would have been very difficult indeed to say that a measure dealing with that little scheme was exclusively Scotch. The provisions of the Bill with regard to the constitution of the Court need amending in my opinion, and I hope we shall find the Government not unwilling to receive amendments of them. If a sufficiently strong Court can be obtained to command public confidence, and we can set it free from the trammels which, under the present scheme surround it, and save it from the rush on counsel or experts which is the greatest difficulty of the present system of Parliamentary procedure upstairs, I believe we may obtain satisfactory results. But there is another point of view from which one has to look at the matter, and that is the point of view of the devolution of the powers of Parliament. The strongest argument urged in favour of a scheme of this sort in 1888 was that of the difficulty of finding Members of this House to do the work. That does not apply to the present Bill, however. The amount of Scotch

private business is so small that it would really be an entirely inappreciable relief to take away from English Members the duty of sitting on Scotch Bills. If there was any probability of the bringing forward of a scheme like that of the hon. Member for Roxburgh (Mr. A. Elliot), applying to the whole of the country, I should much prefer to let Scotland wait, because I believe the establishment of such a general Court would be a much more satisfactory way of dealing with the railway schemes, at any rate, than setting up a small Court with very little practice like that proposed by the Government. One has to look at two points with regard to devolution—one having reference to the saving of the time of Members, and the other to the saving of the time of the House. The House almost invariably accepts the decisions of its Committees, and it does not think it necessary, on the Second Reading of a Bill, to go into the question of merits. But I am afraid that if you hand over the discussion of a Bill to a body outside this House you will not have the same confidence in the decision, whether it be in favour of or against the Bill. I should be afraid of Third Reading Debates upon Private Bills in this House, or of attempts to re-commit Bills. I should even be more afraid of Second Reading Debates. At present, on Second Reading, the House of Commons does not really commit itself upon the merits of the Bill in any way, but merely says a prima facie case has been made out to be inquired into upstairs; but if a Bill, after the Second Reading, is to be sent to a Commission for investigation, things will be very different. Then the House must be taken, on the Second Reading, really to affirm the principle in a way it does not now, and, in fact, this is the main argument of the right hon. Member, who is really the father of this scheme. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Mr. Stanhope), in his evidence before the Committee, said—

“ I think it very desirable that before the parties are put to the expense of a contested inquiry Parliament should have pronounced to a certain extent an opinion upon the principle of the measure submitted to Parliament.”

That seems to me to be putting the cart before the horse. You could not have a Debate on the principle of a Private Bill before the inquiry, because the real principle at stake does not come out clearly till after the full discussion in the Committee. Whenever you want to oppose a Private Bill you can find some fine big principle on which to oppose it. I was concerned in a Bill for making a tunnel under the Clyde at Glasgow. That was opposed by the Corporation on the ground that the harbour of Glasgow was essential for the prosperity of Glasgow, and that to interfere with the harbour in any way would be absolutely fatal, and therefore it must not be allowed. The real difficulty lay in the question whether the scheme did in any way affect the harbour of Glasgow, and it took a fortnight upstairs to make it clear to the Committee that the harbour of Glasgow was in no way interfered with. In proposing a scheme of this kind, why make two bites at a cherry? Why do you have these preliminaries—the expense of the House fees, the chance of delay on the Second Reading, the chance of delay on the Third Reading—when your intention is to put the decision practically into the hands of an outside Commission? Why do not you go a bit further? Why not let the whole thing come before the outside Commission from the first, and without restrictions as to Parliamentary time and notices? Why not let the matter be brought up at such time of the year as will suit the parties interested? Why not let a Bill be discussed before the outside Commission, and then have it laid on the Table of the House—the course adopted in the case of an educational scheme? The House could then express its opinion upon the measure. That was the scheme put forward by the Chairman of Committee of Ways and Means before the Committee of the two Houses, and that seems to me to be a far more satisfactory scheme than the present. I believe that if the present scheme be not amended it will lead before long to the adoption of such a scheme as that of the Chairman of Committee of Ways and Means, because of the extent to which it will be found to hamper the House of Commons.

(7.17.) Mr. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): I do not think that anyone who intends to support the Motion of my right hon. Friend the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) will be disposed to dispute the statement that there exists in Scotland a very strong demand for reform of the system of Private Bill legislation; but, on the other hand, I am inclined to demur to the assumption of the hon. Member for Roxburghshire (Mr. A. Elliot) that public opinion in Scotland is decidedly in favour of the particular measure which is now before the House. I believe it will be found that the people of Scotland are by no means desirous of having another Commission or Board added to the numerous Boards which already exist and which hamper many of our local institutions and authorities. This Bill proposes to withdraw from this House the function of supervising Private Bill legislation. I do not think that public opinion in Scotland will be satisfied until they have all Bills relating to Scottish private affairs inquired into locally, and I do not think it is possible, as has been urged by some Members, to differentiate between Railway Bills and other Bills, so far as local inquiry or local administration is concerned. It is obvious that wider powers might be given to Local Authorities in the sense of them being enabled to carry out operations in the public interest, without reference to any legislative body whatever. It is absurd to say that in a case of this kind a Local Authority would be acting as the promoter of its own Bill, because a Local Authority would, by a suggestion of this kind, have the power to deal with the questions which came before it, of course being obliged to give fair compensation wherever private rights were interfered with. With regard to railway legislation, if it be possible to send one Member of the House of Commons to Scotland to inquire of this kind, it would surely be possible to find two to go, and it might reasonably be expected that two Members of the House of Lords might be found to go there also. A Committee composed of Members of Parliament sitting in Scotland would be in no way different from the Committees who consider the railway and other Bills upstairs. I can quite imagine that the great railway companies may be able to conduct their business as cheaply in London as in Edinburgh or any other locality in Scotland, but that is not so in the case of the smaller railway companies, or in the case of those people who oppose the Bills of the great companies. I have personal experience in this matter beyond serving on Committees of this House. I have had to slightly oppose a railway Bill, and have found it an extremely extravagant undertaking. I have also been engaged in the promotion of a Bill, and I have found that in consequence of another Bill engaging the attention of the Committee for a longer period than was expected, the cost of promoting the Bill was trebled. That trebling of the cost arose through the necessity of keeping hosts of witnesses hanging about London so long. No words can express too strongly the feeling in Scotland in favour of a change in the present system. That feeling has been considerably strengthened of late by Home Rule sentiments. No doubt a considerable number of municipalities and Chambers of Commerce have petitioned in favour of the Bill, but the Town Council of Edinburgh has not petitioned in favour of the Bill. The Town Council of Leith, the port of Edinburgh, has petitioned in favour of a local inquiry, but objects to the constitution of this Commission. It is realised in Scotland that by this system of a Commission you are taking away from representative bodies the power of deciding questions of local concern. You are embarking in the direction of a bureaucracy. You are embarking on a course that will lead to the bitterest opposition in Scotland. This is a Bill which ought to be opposed tooth and nail, because of the principle that this Commission, which is practically a judicial body, will supersede the representatives of the people. We do not denounce the Bill without having an alternative course to propose. That alternative course is that the local authority should have the power to deal with such matters as gas, sewage, the acquirement of land, and so forth, by virtue of their own Acts—of course subject to the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidated Act—and that any matters of graver import should still remain within the category of private Bill legislation. We also suggest there should be either a Committee of Members of Parliament, or if it should be necessary, some general Commission, which should deal with the whole Private Bill legislation of the three countries. I think there might well be a mixed Committee of Lords and Commons.

(7.25.) MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): I only wish to say a very few words. Although I agree with many of the criticisms of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Munro Ferguson), I am not able to arrive at his conclusions. I think that the Bill is by no means an exhaustive Bill; that in many respects it is defective, and ought to be greatly improved in Committee, but I am not prepared to vote against the Second Reading of a Bill, the purpose and effect of which is to give to localities facilities for bringing their Bills before a local tribunal and at a far lesser expense than is at present incurred. I think there is considerable weight of opinion in favour of the Second Reading, at all events, of this Bill. We have the recommendations of a Committee in favour of the Bill, and we have received Petitions from a large number of Public Bodies in Scotland in favour of the measure. I am not aware that there is any substantial opposition. Then it has been stated most emphatically that no words are too strong to express the disgust and discontent of the people at the delay and expense and inconvenience and worry which is caused by the present Private Bill system of Scotland. We must remember that the House is overcrowded with business, and that the present system is extremely expensive. No one will persuade me that it would cost as much money to inquire into a Scotch Bill in Paisley or Perth or Dumfries, or anywhere you like to name, with local counsel and local solicitors and witnesses at hand, as it would cost to inquire into it before a Parliamentary Committee here. The feeling against the present system is certainly increased by the tendency of what we may call Home Rule sentiment, which is greatly increasing in Scotland. Therefore, it is obvious that some change must take place, and the question is, what change should it be? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stirling (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), with whose speech I agree, though I do not agree with his conclusions, would have us extend to municipalities power to acquire land for public purposes. Now, upon this we had a discussion last year and a Division in which the Government could only secure a majority of 16, a majority which, I think, under more favourable circumstances we might convert into a minority. I am certain it will be necessary to confer this power, that it can be done with security, and that it ought to be done as soon as possible. But because I cannot get this now am I to vote against the Second Reading of a Bill which confers certain present advantages to Railway Companies and Municipalities for the purpose of getting their Bills through? I do not think I am justified in voting against the Second Reading. I also think that the criticisms of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) and of the hon. Member for Aberdeen upon the composition of the Commission were powerful and unanswerable. I noticed that the Lord Advocate said it was not intended that this should be a Commission composed of lawyers, but he proposes there should be a Judge upon it, and I assume that the other Member to be named by the President of the Court of Session will be of the legal profession. Now, I must express my strong dissent from the proposition that lawyers or Judges should take part in practical legislation. The business of a Judge is to decide between man and man according to law, of which he is an honest and capable interpreter, but he is not necessarily the wiser in deciding legislation. Indeed, for my own part, I do not entertain any great confidence in the political judgment of Her Majesty's Judges here or in Scotland. These are the views I entertain, and largely agreeing, as I do, with the observations of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), I look upon his Amendment as a non sequitur. It is not necessary to throw out this Bill instead of amending it, because we entertain the opinion that Municipalities ought to be entrusted with increased powers. Under the circumstances, I hope the Government will, in Committee, enable us to improve the Bill in accordance with suggestions made from this side of the House, and certainly I am not prepared to oppose the Second Reading.

(7.35.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): The House is listening to a rather singular Debate this evening. The discussion is entirely conducted from this side, no Member of the Government rising to answer the arguments advanced, and there is a very scanty attendance of English Members. This is a matter of some importance, because, after all, though the Bill relates primarily to Scotland this is not by any means a purely Scottish question. The Lord Advocate has admitted it is a sort of trial trip—an attempt to apply an experiment to Scotland which afterwards may be used over a larger field in England. Therefore, it is a question which ought to command a good attendance of English Members, and upon which English Members having large experience of the proceedings of Private Bill Committees might give us their views. Hardly anything has been said except in dispraise of the Bill. No doubt, several Members have announced their intention of voting for it; but all have indulged in very drastic criticisms. There is scarcely any part of the rigging through which shots have not passed. Under the circumstances, it becomes worth while to consider whether the Bill ought to be proceeded with, and whether it would not be better to wait for some more adequate measure to be presented. One hon. Member has suggested that the inquiry by Select Committee should include the whole question whether or not the Bill should be extended by carrying out, not the plan of the Lord Advocate, but the plan of the Chairman of Committees, which was to refer the whole of the proceedings on a Private Bill to a Commission which should deal with all its stages—the First, Second, and Third Readings. When the hon. Member for Partick (Mr. J. P. Smith) suggests that the scope of the Bill should be so largely altered, his speech cannot be regarded as one in favour of the principle of the Bill. I should like to recapitulate our objections to the Bill. In the first place, we object in toto to the constitution of the Commission, and it is worthy of notice that no single Member who has supported the Bill has said a word in favour of this point, and, in fact, the Lord Advocate has given up this point, and says the Government are willing to agree to a complete alteration in the composition of the Commission. This is one of the points upon which public opinion in Scotland is unanimous. I have tried to ascertain what is the feeling in Scotland, and I have made inquiries from my colleagues, and, I think, they all agree that while there is a strong desire in Scotland that there should be a change by the cheapening of the present process, and if possible provision made for local hearing, there is an equally strong objection to throwing the whole matter into the hands of what is known in Scotland as Parliament House. When the present occupant of the position, now of advanced age, of President of the Court of Session vacates his office, and we hope it may be at a distant date, whoever succeeds him will probably be a much younger man, and he may have uncontrolled possession of the valuable piece of patronage this Bill would confer for perhaps 35 years to come. The next point I should like to submit is, there is no provision in the Bill for dealing with the question of instructions to be given to a Committee or Commission. This is of more importance than at first sight appears. It is not at all uncommon when a Bill is going to a Committee, for the House to give instructions to the Committee to deal with particular matters which, according to the ordinary rules of procedure, it would not have been competent for it to entertain. I remember such instances as the preservation of buildings and antiquities within an area to be dealt with by a Railway Company, and even the question of how the scenery of a district might be effected by a railway has been made the subject of an Instruction by the House, and has been dealt with by a Committee. A Commission sitting at Glasgow or Edinburgh would be a very different body to a Committee sitting upstairs, and it would be more difficult to make an Instruction applicable to the Commission. This is important, particularly in regard to Railway Bills where a Railway Company is empowered to take land; it is a point which has often been fought out here, and companies have often been defeated. As a safeguard it is very important that the House should have the power of giving these Instructions, and of seeing that the body appointed to deal with a Bill is, so to speak, attuned to the temper and feeling of the House, not looking at a question as a purely legal tribunal, but understanding the sentiment the House entertains on the matter. But this is a point that seems to be entirely ignored in the Bill. Then I come to the distinction my right hon. Friend (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) has drawn between the classes of Bill to which the Bill shall apply. Speaking broadly, there are two classes of Bills—those promoted by Railway Companies and Bills promoted by municipal and similar bodies. Now, as regards railway Bills, there is no general complaint from Scotchmen; it is a question for Railway Companies. It is no public grievance that Scottish witnesses are brought up here to give evidence; but, on the contrary, I think it is regarded as rather a pleasant opportunity for a sojourn in London during the season. But I should like very much to have information from the Lord Advocate as to his view of the distinction to be taken between Bills exclusively relating to Scotland and Bills which might also affect English interests. Several Members have given instances of Bills which at first sight might appear to be of an exclusively Scottish character, Bills involving some local extension in the very centre of Scotland, which yet may be found to involve the interests of English companies in relation to running powers, so that these English companies could establish a locus standi before a Committee. It is material to know what is in the mind of those who prepared this Bill as to the distinction to be drawn between Bills which are exclusively Scottish and Bills partly Scottish, partly English. It might turn out that Bills exclusively Scottish would be comparatively small in number, and the value of this measure, so far as Railway Bills are concerned, would be very largely lost. With regard to Municipal Bills, there is almost a universal consensus of opinion on this side of the House that the proper way of dealing with these matters is by enlarging the powers of Local Bodies. The Lord Advocate seemed to think it was a sufficient answer to say that Local Bodies are themselves promoters of Bills, but surely that is not a sufficient answer. Railway Companies have their private interests to serve, but Municipalities represent the interest of the community. Our Scottish Local Authorities are honest bodies. It is not personal interest that is sought by Town Councils, but the interest of the ratepayers. Why, therefore, should they not have the power, under proper safeguards under general Statutes which lay down principles, to take land themselves after conducting an inquiry, instead of coming here for the purpose? Nobody will allege there is any likelihood of any peculiar abuse of such power by Scottish representative bodies. Of course this opens a large question, but it is a question which should be dealt with, and the Government should have reasons to show that it would not be possible to have general legislation imposing proper safeguards, which would sufficiently define the powers Local Bodies might exercise without continued recurrence to Parliament. There are countries—for instance, the United States—where such powers are exercised; and surely it does not pass the skill of Parliament to provide an Act, which, while guarding from all dangers, would remove the difficulties and expense of promoting a Bill for local purposes in this House. The question does not rest entirely on the ground of expense. There are many small improvements, but yet of some importance to the inhabitants of localities, which would be carried out if it were not for the formidable aspect which an application to Parliament presents, not only in the prospect of opposition to be encountered, but in the fees which have to be paid. Altogether, therefore, I think that I may fairly say that this is a point as to which Scottish opinion is most agreed, and for which a remedy is most wanted. I will not repeat arguments which have been addressed to this point, but I think I am not going too far when I say that the result of the Debate seems to show that although there is a strong wish in the minds of the Scottish Members that the question should be dealt with, there is at the same time a general conviction that this Bill will not substantially advance the question, and that it ought to make way for a more complete scheme.

(7.46.) MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): My hon. Friend has referred to the character of the Debate, but I think we may congratulate ourselves that the Government have brought forward this Bill rather as a useful than a popular measure, and the criticisms have been intended rather as of a useful than as of a disputative character. This question of Private Bill legislation was originally taken up by the late Mr. Craig Sellar when no difference had arisen in the Liberal camp, when it was not then, and need not now be, discussed in a Party spirit. My hon. Friend has referred, as other speakers have referred, to an alternative measure to give further powers to Municipalities by which they would be able to do these things which they now have to come to Parliament to obtain powers for. The arguments of my hon. Friend would be true with regard to a certain set of subjects, but not with regard to all. We have been told about the necessity of powers for acquiring land, and it would be perfectly possible to enable Municipalities to obtain such powers under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; but take such a class of cases as is involved in the desire of a Municipality to obtain an additional water supply. In such a case a Municipality would require to go outside the boundary of the locality, and it is impossible to imagine that power should be granted to any Municipality to deal with such a question as that. There must be another and extraneous power to look into the whole question, and to see that the rights, not only of private individuals, but of other Public Bodies are respected. I believe that there is a general consensus of opinion in Scotland in favour of a measure of this kind. I do not say that there is an opinion in favour of all the details of this measure, because they have not yet been laid before the country as they will be by this Debate; but practically I think that, so far as they have been discussed, the details are only opposed by Glasgow, while the larger towns and cities of Scotland are hesitating and doubtful; but all the smaller Municipal burghs are very favourable to the proposals contained in the Bill. Speaking on behalf of my own constituency, I can say that I have already presented from two burghs I represent petitions in favour of the Bill, and at one period or another I have presented Petitions in favour of the former measure of the Government dealing with this subject. The principle of the Bill which the House is now asked to affirm is this, that there shall be a local inquiry into local wants. All else is matter of detail—important detail, I admit, and the manner in which the Government have approached the subject, expressing their willingness to consider these details, is, I trust, an earnest of the manner in which the Committee to be appointed will look at the measure, and that we shall have it enacted into law in a shape to advance the interests of localities and of the country generally. There undoubtedly may be cases where it would be desirable to have inquiries at Westminster rather than in localities, and I think it would not be difficult, foreseeing such cases, to provide for them as they arise, and I would propose to the Government that they should seriously consider whether an Amendment should not be introduced whereby, if the promoters and opponents of any scheme unite in desiring that the inquiry should be held not in the locality, but at Westminster, the option should be allowed. I believe an Amendment of that kind would commend itself to the country; it would not often be required, but occasionally it might be useful. Undoubtedly, the people of Scotland do desire that the expenses of obtaining Local Bills should be greatly reduced, and the fact, I think, was mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stirling (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) that the average number of Local Bills presented is only 10 annually. In the case of Ireland, if we except railway projects and Bills promoted by the Municipality of Belfast, we scarcely have an Irish Private Bill brought under our consideration. It is most unfortunate that the expenses of unopposed Bills should be so great; and if it were possible for the Government to draft some proposals by which those expenses should be reduced, a great advantage would be conferred on the community. The hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce) has referred to the advantage there is on the Second Reading stage of giving an Instruction to a Committee, and, so far as I understand, it will still be possible under the Bill to issue such an Instruction. I believe that with Amendments suggested from various quarters, and those I have alluded to, a measure may be passed into law which will be received with great gratification in Scotland, and that it will ultimately work for the benefit of the whole community. (7.55.)

Mr. Sinclair

(8.30.) MR. SHIRESS WILL (Montrose, &c.): It occurs to me that there are three fundamental mistakes which lie at the root of the measure we are now discussing. It is agreed that there is a strong opinion in Scotland in favour of cheapening the expense of Private Bill legislation, and I also gather that there is a considerable feeling in favour of local inquiries, although that feeling is not for local inquiries entirely as such, but rather as a means to an end, that end being the lessening of the cost of Private Bill legislation. It appears to me that the first fundamental mistake that has been made is the entire disregard of the first and foremost item in the cost of that legislation, namely, the question of the fees exacted by this House, which, as the House must have seen, are very heavy. The second mistake made by the framers of the Bill is that they have omitted to consider the propriety of curtailing the initial expenses attending the issue of the various notices which are requisite before a Bill can be proceeded with. The third mistake is that, assuming a Commission to be necessary, the framers of the Bill have chosen the most cumbrous and most costly form of Commission that could be devised. In regard to the first point, we have had some figures put before us in the Return moved for by Lord Monk Bretton three years ago, a Return showing the amount of fees exacted by this House over a period of 11 years, the total cost during those 11 years having been £380,000, while with the cost of the fees charged by the other House, the annual amount of fees exacted by Parliament amounted to between £50,000 and £60,000. Well, what is the result? Is all this necessary for the purposes of the work of Private Bill legislation, or does it act as a tax on public enterprise? It has been so described, and I submit that it is such a tax. Attention was incidentally called to this point by the Commission of 1888, and I take it from their Report that the annual surplus of the fees received by the two Houses is £40,000. Now, I feel quite sure that the House will see that it is neither dignified nor just, nor do they mean it in that sense, to exact so large a tax from those engaged in public enterprise as to produce an annual surplus of

£40,000, after all expenses are paid. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate has told us he has a free mind on the subject of this Bill generally, and I will ask him whether he has a free mind on this particular question of the House fees? I know that it will be said that, so far as regards the House fees for daily attendance before Committees, they will be saved; but it must be kept in view that there will be a counterbalancing expense placed upon the promoters in the cost of carrying the Court down to the locality where the inquiry will have to be made. My next point is that the expensive notices which have now to be published by the promoters of Private Bills are entirely unnoticed in this measure. There is no provision for dealing with these notices, and I doubt whether it would be competent for us to go into that matter in Committee, seeing that it is not within the general scope of the Bill. We are, I think, pretty generally agreed that the notices which have to be published in October or November are of unnecessary length. Granted that they are necessary, as no doubt they are, I think that experience has shown that other means might be adopted instead of those lengthy notices of calling attention to the provisions of Private Bills. Notice, of course, must be given; but what I especially desire to point out is the undue length of the notices as at present published. They are so long that nobody reads them, and they have to be inserted over and over again in a manner that adds immensely to their cost. Indeed, we have heard of one case in which the cost of those notices, prior to the deposit of a Bill, amounted to upwards of £200. I think that the omission of this matter is a very grave defect in this Bill. With regard to the Commission which is proposed by the measure, let us see what it is that the Bill proposes. Towards the end of the inquiry before the Select Committee of 1888, a scheme was shadowed forth by the Minister for War, which is in reality the scheme upon which this Bill has been framed. That scheme, however, is one which was not considered by any of the witnesses, and it has been imported into this Bill en bloc without due consideration. I will not repeat the arguments that have been brought against the proposed Commission, many of them with great justice; but I will say that having had some experience in regard to Private Bill legislation, I think that the tribunal here proposed is not likely to be found satisfactory. However fair and just the Scotch Judges may be, I think the principle of putting a Judge to preside over such a Commission is most objectionable, because you put him in the position of dealing with matters of policy, whereas he has hitherto been accustomed to deal only with matters of law such as, for example, the construction of deeds and Acts of Parliament. It is said, however, that a Railway Commissioner is to be associated with the other Commissioners. The Railway Commissioners are chosen for a very different purpose. They are selected because of their great knowledge of questions affecting railway traffic and railway rates, and I ask the House how can this knowledge possibly render them specially adapted for dealing with the thousand and one questions of policy which affect matters of railway enterprise, gas, harbours, sewage farms, and things of that kind? They are no more specially fitted for dealing with such questions—and I am sure they do not claim to be—than their neighbours. It is also stated that a Member of Parliament is to be associated with the Commission; but although the House may approve of this appointment, what, I ask, is one amongst so many? The most objectionable appointment of all is that of the fourth Commissioner, and it is this appointment which creates so much suspicion in Scotland. Even now we do not know the special class from which he will be taken, and we have no suggestion as to who that Commissioner is likely to be. As regards the responsibility for his appointment, it is an objectionable feature that it is placed in the hands of the Court of Session, the consequence of which will be that no one in this House can be held to be responsible for his appointment. Beyond this, the Commission is to be a migratory one, the great fault of which is that, instead of diminishing the cost of those inquiries, it will in reality add to that cost very largely. Let me ask the House what will happen when notice has been given of the Bill for a particular locality, say Aberdeen? The Post Office and Telegraph Office will at once be put in motion for the purpose of bringing down the Railway Commissioner from London; then the same process will be resorted to for bringing down a Member of Parliament from London, while the Judge will start with his staff from Edinburgh to Aberdeen. When these persons get down there, they may, first of all, be called upon to deal with a question of locus standi, and it may be that when they have heard the objections on that point, they will find that there is no locus standi, so that the whole of the expense which has been incurred will have been absolutely thrown away. Then, assuming the locus standi question has been got over, and the Commissioners are called upon to inquire into the merits of the case, how often does it happen that the moment the case is begun, it becomes transparent that the petitioner has misjudged his rights, and that there is nothing of substance in the opposition. Again, in that case, all the expenses incurred are so far wasted. Under all these circumstances, I do press upon the House the fact that the scheme now proposed will, instead of lessening the cost of these inquiries, very materially increase them, both in the case of the promoters of Private Bills and in the case of those who have to appear against them. I quite admit that the saving of expense to the opponents of Railway Companies' Bills ought also to be taken into account. Another defect in the Bill is that every Bill, no matter what its nature may be, is to be tried by this Commission so long as it exclusively relates to Scotland. There may be a class of cases proper for local inquiry, and some Committee—whether the Committee of Selection or some other, such as a Joint Committee of both Houses—may select those and send them down for local inquiry, under suitable conditions. With reference to increasing the powers of the Municipal Authorities, I quite agree in much that has been done. But I think due attention ought to be paid to the remark of the hon. Member for the Falkirk Burghs, who pointed out that a Local Authority might come for a Water Bill, which proposed an enterprise into the domain of some other Local Authority. We do not intend that cases of that kind are to be left to the municipalities to do exactly as they please. The Lord Advocate would, therefore, be entirely mistaken if he fancied that that is the class of case to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs referred. If I thought that this Bill was one which would conduce to the fulfilment of the desires of the people of Scotland in lessening the cost of legislation, I, for one, would give it my support. But it is because I believe that it would have the contrary effect, and that it is deficient in fundamental principles, that I support the Amendment which has been moved.

(8.50.) SIR A. ORR EWING (Dumbarton): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that this Bill has the unanimous support of the people of Scotland. The hon. Member for Aberdeen laughs at that statement, though the city which he represents is in favour of the Bill. I believe I do not make a mistake when I say that every burgh in Scotland is in favour of the Bill. True, Leith has not spoken, and Edinburgh has not spoken—I think the hon. Member for Aberdeen said that Edinburgh has spoken. The Parliamentary Committee of the Edinburgh Corporation, to which all Bills are referred, recommended to the Town Council that a Petition should be forwarded to this House to day in favour of the Bill. But a certain portion of the Town Council, men who bestow the freedom of the city and then want to take it back—men who I do not say are the highest intellectually, or highest in any way whatever—have prevented this Petition from coming before us. But if the hon. Member says that Petition was against the Bill, I utterly deny the statement. I think the House should follow the example and advice given by the hon. Member for Dumfries. He does not altogether approve of the Bill, but he says it is not a measure which ought to be thrown out on the Second Reading. He thinks it is the kernel of a good Bill, and he trusts the Second Reading will be passed, and that when it is sent upstairs it may be modified, so as to meet with the general approval of the Members for Scotland, and so confer a great benefit on the people of that country. The great objection to the Bill is raised that England is not included. Well, we have a great cry in Scotland for Home Rule, and here is a Bill which gives to our country Home Rule; yet because England is not getting it Scotland is to be denied it also. Is that a position for hon. Members to take? I believe that if this Bill passes England will not be long without a similar measure being conferred upon it. Had it not been for the death of an hon. Member (Mr. Craig Sellar), I believe a Bill would have passed this House including England, Ireland, and Scotland in respect to the passing of private measures. Another great objection to this Bill is that it savours too much of Parliament House in Edinburgh. Parliament House is an institution of which all Scotchmen ought to be proud, and I believe it never stood higher in the estimation of Scotland than it does at the present moment. But if you object to this Bill the Lord Advocate has frankly stated that he is prepared to consider and meet objections in Committee upstairs, with a view to bringing it into accordance with the general feeling of those who represent Scotland. I think you will make a mistake if you attempt to throw the Bill out on the Second Reading. It may not be all you want, but, at all events, it is the kernel of a measure which has the approval of all loyal Scotchmen to whom I have spoken. You may be able in Committee to put the Bill into that form which will enable you to give it your unanimous support; and I trust that Scotland will no longer be without this measure of self-government, which all feel would be of great benefit to that country.

(8.56.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): Sir, I have to congratulate the hon. Baronet on becoming a Scotch Home Ruler, and that he is able to bear testimony to the popularity of that movement. And I must congratulate the Lord Advocate upon also becoming a Scotch Home Ruler, though probably he is not without cognisance of the circumstance that he is to be opposed by a Conservative who is likewise a Scotch Home Ruler. Two years ago, when the question of Scotch Home Rule was raised, the right hon. Gentleman introduced four Bills, in consequence of which I had to make my Motion on the subject much stronger than I had intended. Of the four Bills, two are passed, and this is the third. The fourth is still in the position in which it was two years ago—I refer to the Bill for the reconstruction of Parochial Boards. The Lord Advocate says the present Bill is based on the National sentiment of Scotland, throughout which country there is a demand for it, which has been matured during the last three years. The right hon. Gentleman has said some strong things which could be used in support of a greater degree of devolution than this Bill proposes. He said that we could not expect in London that vivid and accurate understanding of these questions which were to be found on the spot. Sir, I have to congratulate the Lord Advocate upon his position, and I hope it may not be necessary for his young opponent to fight him in his constituency. Probably he has been studying history since we discussed this question last, and he has changed his views. This proposal is very interesting. Look at the question from the historical standpoint. Two centuries ago every Private Bill was referred to the Judges, who heard the witnesses and reported everything. Why did we change that method? Simply because the Judges were not in accord with the developments taking place around them. They were bound by precedent, and the result was that the thing was taken out of their hands. Well, now, I am not going to enter into an historical description of the affair. This question came up in 1846, and if you look at the reports of the Debates in this House in that year you will find that the arguments then used are those which have been advanced to day. On that occasion a Royal Commission sat, and recommended this system of local inquiry—the system which, as I take it, constitutes the principle of the Bill. That recommendation was carried into effect by legislative enactment in 1847. A large number of local inquiries were held, with the result that the system was found not to work successfully, so the Act was repealed. In the present Bill the system has been somewhat modified. Now, the Act of 1847 was destroyed by one fact, and that was that the local inquiry system was found to be too expensive. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War laughs at that assertion; but I repeat that that was the great blot, because under it promoters of schemes had a double battle to fight—one at the local inquiry and one before a Committee of this House. Probably we shall be told that by a certain sub-section the House will be prevented in the future from appointing a Select Committee on a Private Bill; but even then you will have the merits of the scheme discussed on the Motion for Second Reading, and thus you will be going back to the old position of debating these matters in a full House, with the result that you will give a splendid opportunity to those who wish to obstruct business, and there will be an intolerable waste of public time. At any rate, the system adopted in 1846 has been shown to have failed on the ground of excessive cost. It may be that the modifications proposed under this Bill now before us will do away with the necessity for second appearances here, but that will only be at the cost of a Debate on the Second or Third Reading in a full House. The Lord Advocate has argued in favour of this Bill on two grounds. First, that of the convenience of suitors; and, secondly, that of cost. Now, I do not think that if this Bill is carried there will be fewer trips to London, and consequently less cost, as he suggests. On the contrary, I expect you will have more of them. There will be an intolerable amount of lobbying, and we shall have Municipal Committees and others coming up to town to interview Members, so that the new system will prove quite as costly, if not more so, than the one now prevailing. The hon. Member for Roxburghshire did not discuss the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Stirling Burghs. Instead of that he replied to the letter of Mr. Littler, and if he had devoted himself to the Amendment, I think he would have utilised the time of the House more satisfactorily. I am not opposed to the principle of local inquiry, but I am strongly opposed to the establishment of a Commission such as that which is shadowed forth in the Bill. If it had been proposed to appoint two Members of this House at the beginning of every sitting, and two Members of the other House to act as a Joint Committee to consider these matters, with power to make local inquiries, then I think the scheme would have been a reasonable one, but I shall certainly vote against the appointment of a Commission. I strongly prefer to support the scheme shadowed forth in the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Stirling Burghs. What is that scheme? That scheme is to carry out what the people of Scotland want, and in a fashion that will suit the Scotch people. We are asking for some system that will lessen the time and cost now entailed in carrying Private Bills through Parliament, and you are simply offering us instead a system which will increase both time, trouble, and cost. We want in the first place the present cumbrous methods to be got rid of; and we want, in the second place, the intolerable and absurd costs now enforced to be abolished. Why should we pay for the Second Reading of a Bill in this House as much as 15 guineas, and why should we pay from 81 guineas to 135 guineas for a Second Reading in the other House? We know that at one time the fees used to be given to the clerks and officials, and that even in this House the Speaker had a large proportion of them; but we do not now require to raise money in this way for the payment of the officials, and I do not think that the enterprise of small Municipalities should be burdened as it is burdened under the present system. Now recently a public-spirited gentleman in Thurso was anxious to make a little harbour of refuge there, and he had to come to this House for Parliamentary sanction. The Bill was an unopposed one, but he had to pay £81 for the Second Reading in the House of Lords, and he also was called upon to pay all other preliminary fees. In fact the expenses ran up to something like £700 or £800. Now, we want to have a system by which the promoters of unopposed Bills will not have to pay these heavy sums, which amount sometimes to as much as 10 or 15 per cent. of the entire cost of the projected undertaking. This is a grievance which you are not touching by your present Bill. What does my right hon. Friend the Member for Stirling Burghs propose to do in order to amend this form of procedure, to lessen the intolerable burden of costs, and to give greater powers to Local Bodies? He would have a general measure very much on the lines of the Police and Public Health Acts of last Session. We know that in Glasgow some vast socialistic experiments are now being tried, as, indeed, they are being tried in other Municipalities. We are aware that some of these Municipalities have their own tramway systems, their own gas-works, and their own waterworks. They have trusts of various kinds in which millions of money are invested. They have lodging-houses for hundreds of people, at which a night's lodging can be obtained for a sum of 4½d. The example which Glasgow has set in this direction is being followed by many other towns; and all we ask you to do is to give us a Bill which will grant the Municipalities more extended powers, and relieve them of the burden which is now imposed upon them when they wish to carry through any new scheme. We really want a system of Provisional Orders—a system at once easy and cheap—by which the Municipalities having control of matters of local government will be able to carry out whatever public-spirited schemes they are willing to undertake, and which will enable them to expend the public money simply, for instance, with the consent of the Secretary for Scotland. If this concession is made to us we shall be able to push forward many valuable improvements. The First Lord of the Treasury and the Lord Advocate are already both pledged to consider the possibilities of adopting some method by which County Councils will be able to erect piers and to create harbours without having to incur the heavy expense of passing Private Bills through this House. That is what we in Scotland want. We have been told by the hon. Baronet who last spoke that this is the first effort of the Government to give what all loyal Scotsmen want, and that this is the power of determining their own affairs. But you are not doing that. You are keeping up a barrier; you are maintaining costly barriers, which prevent desirable internal reforms. I very strongly object to the appointment of this Commission. Every Committee of this House which has sat to consider this question has almost unanimously reported against these questions being handed over to a Commission, on the ground that legislation conducted by means of such a body would be more cumbersome and more costly than under the existing system. One argument against the Commissions is that they lay down certain principles of law and stand by them; they are bound by a system of red tape. Mr. Dodson (Lord Monk Bretton) and Mr. Leigh Pemberton both strongly opposed the system of appointing a Commission, and supported the decision of these Bills by Committees of this House. An hon. Baronet spoke of the Parliament House at Edinburgh. I say that the proposal to govern one of the most democratic countries in the world by means of irresponsible Boards was a most objectionable one. I desire to see the rulers of Scotland responsible to the Scotch people. It is a mistake to suppose that by handing over this business to a Commission the conduct of Public Business in this House will be facilitated, because in nearly every case there would be an appeal brought from the decision of the Commission to that House. Either the House ought to maintain its unfettered control over private business, or else it should delegate the whole of its power over such business to the Commission. But it seems to me you are doing neither the one nor the other in this case, for you are simply reverting to the bad system of 150 years ago.

*(9.26.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I intervene with some reluctance in a Debate which has hitherto been conducted exclusively by Scotch Members, but I do so because I venture to claim to have some little experience with regard to Private Bill legislation, and I hope that I may usefully bring some points under the notice of the House. The first question that I should like to reply to is why the Government have not brought in a general measure applicable to the three Kingdoms rather than one which is applicable to Scotland alone. I think that the discussion that we have listened to to-night is a sufficient answer to that question. Although I myself would have gladly seen a general measure introduced, still I think that the Government have acted prudently in introducing in the first instance a measure dealing only with that portion of the United Kingdom in which there is an urgent desire on the part of the people that some legislation of this character should be effected. That being so, I come to the scheme of the Government as it has been presented to the House. I do not think that it is possible to exaggerate the interest and the importance of this proposal, because if it is successful in Scotland there is every prospect that a similar system will be applied to England and to Ireland. It is therefore somewhat disappointing for the Government to find that many of the Scotch Members appear to be hesitating as to whether they will accept this Bill or not. The right hon. Member for Stirling has suggested that the Government should have exercised great caution and should have directed inquiries to be made into the subject before they laid this Bill before Parliament. I should have thought that there has already been sufficient inquiry made, and that the Government have waited sufficiently long before introducing this measure. Year after year the subject has been brought before Committee after Committee, and the whole question has been discussed and reported upon by a strong and influential Committee on which were placed the most prominent Members of the House, and the decision at which that Committee arrived was that the House ought to give up to a large extent its control over private legislation. In consequence of that Report several Bills have been introduced in this House. Those Bills have been discussed over and over again, and I well remember that the principle in the Bill proposed by my hon. and much lamented Friend the late Member for the Partick

Division (Mr. Craig Sellar) was received very favourably here, and whenever it was mentioned in Scotland was immediately seized upon by Members and candidates as something they desired to carry through for the purpose and intention of getting Private Bill legislation to some extent away from this House. A Committee of great importance, composed of Members of great acquaintance with the subject, chosen from both sides of the House, and representing every portion of the United Kingdom, came unanimously to the conclusion which is embodied in this Bill. It is, therefore, impossible to say that the Government are not dealing with the matter after it has been thoroughly investigated, and in accordance with the mature judgment of, at any rate, some of the most important Members of the House. In these circumstances it does seem most remarkable, when a Bill is brought forward for accomplishing the object in view, that now Scotch Members who up to the present time have unanimously been in favour of the general principle—[Cries of "No!"] Well, they have said so in the country—that they should now turn round and because it is the Government that has brought in the Bill, should be almost as determined in their opposition to it as they have formerly been in their support of its principle. The Government adhere to the recommendations of the Committee presided over by Lord Monk Bretton, and they do not desire to get rid of the jurisdiction of the House in matters of Private Bill legislation. [An hon. MEMBER: "It was not unanimous."] It was, except on one point. One Member of the Committee voted in favour of the proposal of the Chairman of Committees, and all the other Members for the principle contained in the present Bill. The utmost possible respect is due to any opinion put forward by my right hon. Friend the Chairman of Committees, but I believe the House generally will agree that it is not right at once to make so drastic a change as would be involved in depriving the House of its control over Private Bill legislation, while they would be prepared to take a step that might possibly lead in that direction and yet left the control of the House unimpaired. The adoption of this middle course has the inconvenience of not touching unopposed Bills, which are undoubtedly expensive. If they wanted to deal with unopposed Bills they should not do so by legislation. What they should do would be to take care that the fees of this House and of the other House are revised and reduced. I should like to see the cost of obtaining an unopposed Bill largely reduced, so far as it can reasonably be reduced. But what is the change we propose? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) allowed his imagination to run riot. He talked about ignoring constitutional rights and about the rights of the representatives of the people. Is he prepared to contend that in all private business the representatives of the people alone and no one else are to pronounce an opinion.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I said unless it was proved that it was perfectly impracticable that it should be so.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: How does the right hon. Gentleman explain the fact that referees are paid members of Committees? They are not Members of the House, and yet they vote.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: They do not decide questions of public policy.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: They do vote in the Court of Referees. They are paid, and are not Members of this House. They violate that tremendous constitutional principle of the right hon. Gentleman, and are entitled to express an opinion on Private Bills. Now let us come to the grounds on which we advocate this Bill. First of all, we advocate the Bill on the ground that it has become so difficult to find Members willing to serve on Committees, a point on which conclusive evidence was laid before the Committee. Before the Committee presided over by Lord Monk Bretton, my right hon. Friend the Member for the University (Sir J. Mowbray) stated that if there was any extreme pressure at the present time it would be absolutely impossible to carry on the Private Bill legislation of this House. Of course if it is necessary for this House to do this work we must give up something else, and we must sit longer or in some way or other devote ourselves to carrying out private business. But is it necessary? I think it would be easy to show it is not necessary by any means, and that by the proposals we make it would be perfectly possible to create a tribunal that will relieve the House of functions that press unduly upon it, and at the same time maintain the right of the House to regulate its own private business. In all but one minute particular the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) opposes local inquiry. Railway Bills and the larger part of the remaining Private Bills he would not refer to any system of local inquiry, but retain them within the jurisdiction of Parliament. As to the Bills other than Railway Bills, he says frankly, if important, he would withdraw them from Municipalities, leaving to Municipalities only that minute fraction which deals with the very small objects of local utility. Let me for a few moments grapple even with that minute fraction of Bills the right hon. Gentleman thinks might be dealt with by extending the powers of Municipalities. He did not attempt to touch for a single moment the argument of the Lord Advocate that, if Municipalities desires to acquire the property of private individuals, they will be at the same time the promoters of Bills and judges of the terms on which the property is to be acquired. I do not believe that is a proposition that Parliament is likely to confirm, and it is not one which commends itself to us. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Banffshire (Mr. Duff) said, "Give us the same powers you give the School Boards." The hon. Member is ignorant of the fact that no School Board can buy an acre of land without Parliamentary sanction.

MR. DUFF: I beg pardon. An Act was passed after the Education Act giving power to Local Authorities and School Boards to acquire land subject to the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Certainly. What is to be done? A Provisional Order is to be framed, and the House has to give its sanction to the scheme. If the hon.
